Provided, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed with an opening over the center of the channel of such width as the Secretary of War shall determine, and which shall be at least one hundred feet in the clear, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current, and the draw of said bridge shall be over the main or deep channel of the river, as may be fixed and determined by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 4, after the word "thereof," to insert "or the corporations or persons controlling the same;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, or the corporations or persons controlling the same, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRUSTEES OF ISAAC R. TRIMBLE.

The bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let it be read.

Mr. CONGER. I have been looking for the report through my list of reports, but it did not happen to be filed there. I wish this bill might go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, until the report can be examined.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] having the bill in charge can explain it. There is a full report. It is a proposition that received the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. It gives these petitioners a chance to be heard before the Court of Claims on the equities of their claim. The Senator from South Carolina understands the case better than I do.

Mr. CONGER. May I inquire of the Senator whether this bill makes the decision of the Court of Claims a final judgment, or whether it is to be reported to Congress again?

Mr. HAMPTON. I have the bill——

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read again. It is short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble against the United States for the construction and use by the War Department of Howe's patent truss in the bridge over the Potomac River be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for hearing and adjudication; and to that end jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court to proceed as a court of equity and to render judgment therein.

Mr. CONGER. I think the bill should be amended so as to direct the court to report the result of their findings to Congress. That is the form of the general law.

Mr. PLATT. You want it under the Bowman bill?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir. It could go there for examination and a report of the findings of the court without the passage of this bill, unless there is some limitation.

Mr. PLATT. I understand what is called the Bowman bill to be this: that any committee of either House, or either House of Congress, may refer any claim pending before it to the Court of Claims to hear the facts and report the facts to Congress. The chairman of the Committee on Claims may correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator has stated it a little broader than it is.

Mr. PLATT. I understand also that the Court of Claims has recently determined that the fact that more than six years have run against a claim does not deprive them of jurisdiction under the Bowman bill. They have rendered a decision to that effect.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not to that effect exactly. If the Court of Claims ever had jurisdiction of a claim, and more than six years has elapsed, the court holds that under section 3 of the so-called Bowman act it has not jurisdiction to hear that claim. If it never had jurisdiction, then of course no statute of limitations ever has run against it, and I suppose it never had jurisdiction of this case; I do not know whether it had or not, but if it never had jurisdiction to hear and try this case, then there is no statute of limitations in the way.

Mr. PLATT. I may not be able to state exactly just what the court has decided with reference to the question whether it has jurisdiction in these cases, but I think it is this: In claims for the use of a patent by the Government, if there was anything which looked to a license or an agreement on the part of the patentee that the Government might use it with the expectation of compensation, they hold that in those cases there was an implied contract within the meaning of the original act of jurisdiction; but where it is simply a case where the Government has used a patent without any consent whatever of the inventor or the owner of the patent, I think that question is still open, and that it is undecided in that court whether they have jurisdiction in those cases or not. Several cases have been heard which have been leading along toward a decision of that question, but I think it is still open.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will direct the Secretary to read the third clause of Rule XV for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

3. Whenever a private bill is under consideration, it shall be in order to move, as a substitute for it, a resolution of the Senate referring the case to the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It might be in order to move to refer it, but it is possible that the Court of Claims would have no jurisdiction even if Congress did refer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Minnesota to call for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONGER. The report is very long.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I withdraw the request for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest to the gentleman making the report that the bill be amended so that the case may be examined by the Court of Claims, as provided in this bill, but with no authority to render judgment, and that the court report its finding to Congress. My objection is to leaving to the decision of the court by this bill the finding of an unlimited amount of damages for the use of any patent. I have no objection to the court finding the facts in the case and the right of the party and reporting to Congress, and then an appropriation may be made, if one is needed.

Mr. MAXEY. The original report in this case adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs was submitted by myself on behalf of the committee at the last Congress, and that report after very careful consideration by the committee was adopted without dissent, and the bill was presented to the Senate and was passed by the Senate unanimously in hæc verba as it is now reported. The bill failing in the House, it was reoffered in the Senate and referred to the committee, and came back from the committee with a favorable report at the present session.

The report itself shows quite clearly that this is a case where the Court of Claims should hear and determine as a court of equity, and in that view, as it is a question of fact, the committee directed the bill to be reported conferring upon that court the authority to hear and determine the case just as any other case of a disputed claim between the Government and a private individual. I think myself that if the Senator from Michigan would hear the report read he would find that the bill is properly worded as it is now, and that the Court of Claims ought properly to have jurisdiction. The bill itself is framed upon a decision of the Supreme Court involving the title and right to this truss in the Railroad Company vs. Trimble, in 10 Wallace. The title was found by the court to be in the assignees of Trimble. This claim is for the use by the Government of a patent precisely like the use by the railroads. In that case the assignees recovered. In this case the United States is the user of the truss; and the claimants, the assignees of Trimble, simply ask that the Court of Claims take this case up as any other claim against the United States and hear and determine it.

That was our view of it, and I will suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that the bill as it is is properly drawn and should remain as reported.

Mr. CONGER. The committee report that—

In the opinion of the committee, the claimants have a right to establish the use by the Government of their patent; that they have not been paid therefor, and the reasonable value of use, and to introduce evidence of ownership and loyalty. In short, the examination made by the committee shows a state of case which, in the judgment of the committee, entitles the claimants to a hearing in the Court of Claims.

I have no objection to a hearing in the Court of Claims if it be according to the general law applicable to other parties. Let there be a hearing and a finding of the facts reported to Congress. In order that an amendment may be drawn to that effect for the consideration at least of Senators, I ask that the bill go over by common consent without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over informally, holding its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

DAVID WOOD.

The bill (S. 1553) to remove the charge of desertion against David Wood was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that David Wood, a boy under 11 years of age, was constantly with the Sixth Missouri Cavalry for over one year, doing efficient work as orderly, and was mustered for pay on two occasions as bugler of Company A, Wood's Battalion, Sixth Missouri Cavalry, and was with the Army through Arkansas to Batesville, Clarendon to Helena, and was taken sick with malarial fever at Helena, Ark., in August, 1862, and his attending physician declared that his immediate removal to a northern climate was necessary to his restoration to health; that his father, in command of the regiment, resigned and obtained leave of absence and took him to his home in Kansas, not knowing that he had been mustered for pay as a soldier; and that David Wood was afterward reported as a deserter, and so stands upon the muster-roll of the battalion. The bill therefore directs the Adjutant-General of the United States to place the name of David Wood upon the Army-roll of the United States, and issue to him an honorable discharge from the Army of the United States, to date from August 12, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

VACATION OF AN ALLEY.

The bill (S. 869) to vacate an alley in square 234 in the city of Washington was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia, in their discretion, to convey to the owners of abutting lots the ground occupied by the alley running east and west in square 234, between certain lots described in the city of Washington, D. C., and to vacate and close up the alley if the owners shall appropriate for public use, as an alley, an area of ground in the same square equal to that in the alley to be conveyed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM G. WALKER.

The bill (S. 1691) referring the joint claim of T. A. Walker and Augusta C. Todd for proceeds of cotton to the Court of Claims for adjudication was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report had better be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GARLAND March 3, 1884:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of T. A. Walker and Augustus C. Todd to have their claims referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, beg leave to report:

That heretofore, as a rule, they have reported adversely to individual petitions for the removal of the bar of the statute of limitations, but this case arises on an exceptional state of facts.

First. The matter complained of was committed by the unauthorized act of the guardians or tutors of these petitioners when minors, and whose duty it was to protect them and their estate instead of squandering it.

Second. Petitioners were minors when the acts complained of occurred, and remained such until the statute bar accrued, and both of their guardians or tutors have long since died and their estates are entirely insolvent.

The Treasury Department heretofore passed adversely on the claim, but upon the want of testimony and the conflict of testimony as well, and on no other grounds.

Under these circumstances the committee think this a meritorious case for the Court of Claims, and can not form a precedent for the future for action in such applications, and that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, and therefore report a bill to that end.

Mr. CONGER. This is one of the old cotton claims, and there is nothing in the report to show any facts or circumstances connected with it. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to goes over.

Mr. GARLAND. I hope the Senator will not object to that. The Committee on the Judiciary has, I believe, since I have been connected with it, enforced the rule, and this is the only case where it has relaxed the rule as to the statute of limitations. The report shows that these were two minors at the time the acts took place and were minors long after the application was made to the Treasury Department, and that their guardians, who disposed of the cotton, have died and their estates are insolvent. The Treasury Department simply denied relief; but, without committing the United States in any way, we simply send the parties to the Court of Claims, removing the bar and letting them be heard there. The report was unanimous from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It does not appear from the report what was done with the cotton, whether it was sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury or not.

Mr. GARLAND. The report was not made at length on those points, but I can state that their guardians, as alleged in the report, sold this cotton—at least that is the statement—and the Government got possession of it under the act of Congress, and it was sold and the proceeds paid into the Treasury. They petitioned the Treasury Department for relief. The Treasury Department passed upon the case, holding that there was a conflict of testimony as to the ownership, and there being a conflict the Department refused to grant relief. In the mean time the statute bar applied against these minors. It is a very exceptional case, and it is the only one since I have been connected with the Committee on the Judiciary where they have reported in favor of removing the bar of the statute.

Mr. CONGER. Under the usual custom and rule of the Senate, I do not know how this case ever got to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is purely a claim against the Government, belonging to the Committee on Claims, and I think the report should state the facts, especially as the bill provides for sending the case to the Court of Claims for final judgment, and there is an adverse report of the Treasury Department against the claim. I do not feel willing to let it stand under the five-minute debate, and I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to, goes over.

ESTATE OF FRANK SOULÉ.

The bill (S. 336) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLATHEAD, KOOTENAY, AND UPPER PEND D'OREILLES INDIANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1706) to accept and ratify an agreement with the confederated tribes of the Flathead, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriation for carrying out the same.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, March 4, 1884:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1706) to accept and ratify an agreement with the confederated tribes of the Flathead, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana, required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same, have examined the same, and report as follows:

On the 22d of July, 1882, Joseph K. McCammon, Assistant Attorney-General, was directed by the Secretary of the Interior to proceed to the Flathead (Jocko) Indian reservation, in Montana, for the purpose of conferring and arranging on the part of the United States with the Indians on said reservation for the extinguishment of their title to so much of the land of that reservation as is required for the right of way for the Northern Pacific Railroad through it.

The act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat., 365), incorporating the Northern Pacific Railway Company, besides granting that company a right of way across the public domain, also provided that the United States should extinguish, as rapidly as might be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians, the Indian title to all lands falling under the operation of the act and acquired in the donation to the road.

By the second article of the treaty between the United States and the confederated tribes of Flathead, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Indians, concluded at Hell Gate, in the Bitter Root Valley, July 16, 1855 (12 Stat., 975), duly ratified and proclaimed, it is provided that "if necessary for the public convenience, roads may be run through the said reservations, and on the other hand the right of way, with free access from the same to the nearest public highway, is secured to them, as also the right in common with citizens of the United States to travel upon all public highways." This provision was extended by a subsequent treaty with the same Indians.

In 1881 the Northern Pacific Railway Company, through its president, requested the Secretary of the Interior to proceed, in accordance with the act of 1864, to extinguish the Indian title to a certain strip of land, designated in plats filed in the Department, running across the Jocko reservation, which land was required for the road-bed of the company.

Mr. McCammon was thereupon sent out as a commissioner to secure the cession of this land.

The terms of the agreement made by Mr. McCammon with the confederated tribes of the Flathead, Kootenays, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Indians, resident on the Jocko or Flathead reservation, in Montana, are, briefly stated, that a strip of land not exceeding 200 feet in width, aggregating about 1,300 acres, together with about 130 acres for station purposes, are ceded to the United States, the consideration being $16,000, which is at the rate of $11.18 per acre. And further, the United States agrees to pay to individual Indians $7,625 as compensation for damages to improvements of fenced or cultivated fields which may be sustained by reason of the surrender and relinquishment of the lands above described.

The bill reported by your committee is approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and provides for the ratification and confirmation of the aforenamed agreement.

The amount of $7,625 for the payment of damages to individual Indians was paid by the Northern Pacific Railway Company to the Secretary of the Interior, and was by the Secretary's orders disbursed to the Indians referred to by Major Roman, their agent.

The remaining sum of $16,000 was paid by the company to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him it was deposited to his official credit in the Treasury of the United States. The bill reported contains a clause ratifying the action of the Secretary of the Interior in disbursing the $7,625 to individual Indians for damages incurred, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is further authorized and directed to deposit the said sum of $16,000, which now stands on the books of the United States Treasury to his official credit with the Secretary of the Treasury, to be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the confederated tribes of Flathead, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Indians, to be expended in manner provided for in said agreement.

The agreement was undoubtedly made in strict conformity with the act of July 2, 1864, and was in compliance with all existing treaty obligations. It was duly ratified by the chiefs and headmen and heads of a majority of the families, being a majority of the male members of the tribes interested, and seems to have been drawn with a due regard to the interests of the Indians.

The committee think the agreement should be affirmed, the previous action of the Secretary of the Interior ratified, and the $16,000 paid by the company placed to the credit of these Indians. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I move, in section 3, in the proviso, after the word "may" in line 14, to insert "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to read:

Provided, That the said United States Attorney may, with the approval of the secretary of the Interior, accept such sum of money in satisfaction of any such injury or damages, &c.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In section 4 there is a provision in regard to the money received for damages hereafter by reason of fires caused by the Northern Pacific Railroad running through this reservation, and the provision is that in the case of an individual Indian "the amount covered into the Treasury shall be expended for his sole benefit." The Flathead Indians of Montana are in an advanced stage of civilization compared with the other Indians. They had missionaries among them fifty years ago, and they have farms along the route of this railroad and own a considerable amount of stock. I visited the reservation last summer as part of the Indian Committee and held a council with them.

This clause refers to the damages that may be recovered hereafter from the North Pacific Railroad by reason of damages to stock, or by fires produced by the company. I never read this bill before; but I submit to the Senate that where an Indian is so far advanced in civilization as to have cultivated land, fenced it in, built him a house, and is able and competent to manage a farm, the money should be paid to him directly, and let him do what he pleases with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. VEST. I do not want to stop the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. We can finish this Indian bill in a few moments, and I move that we continue its consideration. I will not delay it a second. It is an important matter to these Indians, because they distrust the Government of the United States, and this is one of the principal grievances they brought up in the council last summer, that this money had been promised them and had not been paid. I tried to explain to them that Congress had adjourned before the money was actually paid by the railroad company, but they did not understand it and said we had broken faith with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The shipping bill being under consideration the Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill last up.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator to request that it be informally laid aside.

Mr. VEST. Very well, I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senate proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 1706. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is again before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out the last two lines of sections 4, 8, and 9, as follows:

Covered into the Treasury shall be expended for his sole benefit.

And insert:

So recovered shall be paid directly to said Indians.

So as to read:

To be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as he may deem for their best interest, except in the case of an individual Indian, when the amount so recovered shall be paid directly to said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SHANNON.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider a bill which was indefinitely postponed. On the 1st day of April the Committee on Pensions reported back the bill (S. 1114) granting an increase of pension to William Shannon adversely. The RECORD shows that I requested that the bill be placed on the Calendar, and it was done; but the Journal says the bill was indefinitely postponed. Some testimony has been now furnished, or is ready to be furnished in that case, and I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate indefinitely postponing that bill may be reconsidered, and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the bill referred to by him was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. Are there not three of those bills?

Mr. PLUMB. No; I am not alluding to the cases the Senator from Illinois has in mind.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope this will be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed is reconsidered.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 28th instant approved and signed the act (S. 264) for the relief of F. G. Schwatka and wife, and on the 29th instant the joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read by sections for amendment, amending each section as reached, if there are amendments to be offered to it, and not going back to it after it has been passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the first reading of the bill shall be by sections for amendment, not to return to a section after amendments to it have been considered. Is there objection?

Mr. BECK. I doubt whether any member of the Senate outside of the Committee on Commerce has carefully considered the bill, or would be able to understand the scope of the amendments to the law unless the bill is either read or explained in the first place. It was explained by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] a month or six weeks ago, but we all know how rapidly such explanations pass away from the minds of Senators engaged in a variety of other things.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, as each section would be reached I should very briefly state what was the amendment proposed to the existing law.

Mr. BECK. Many of the amendments meet with my cordial approbation, but as we pass along they seem to bear upon others, what may be good or bad depending upon what shall be done at last. There are toward the close of the bill mail contracts provided for which seem to me to be only a change from the old name of subsidy; and there are other amendments offered by the Senator yesterday, some of which I regard as the most valuable parts of the bill, particularly the first section of the amendment that he offered in regard to the discharge of seamen when they arrive at an American port.

I understand that some action has been taken in the committee this morning in regard to amendments that we do not yet understand except by information from members of the committee, some having been agreed to and perhaps others not. The amendment which I think will control my vote on a good many other matters is the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] at the time the bill was originally reported, which really reaches further than any of them.

Unless there shall be some explanation made by the Senator from Maine as to the general scope of the bill, I would rather that it should be read, because I desire to be heard in regard to the scope of the bill and especially as to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill ought to be read in full, so that the country may understand what it is we are legislating upon. I shall insist upon its being read.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection if it is desired to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate, after which the bill will be open to amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and having read the first two sections,

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is there any particular necessity for the reading of the bill except to read it by sections?

Mr. MORGAN. I have called for the reading under the rule. I insist on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That question has been propounded to the Senate, and the reading of the bill has been demanded. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BECK said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I desire to have read from the Secretary's desk, as a part of the remarks I propose to make, the amendment offered by the minority of the committee through the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment indicated by the Senator from Kentucky.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as additional sections to the bill:

SEC. —. That section 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows, namely:

"SEC. 2513. All or any part of the materials, whether wood, steel, iron, copper, yellow metal, bolts, spikes, sheathing, trenails; canvas for sails, whether flax or cotton; rigging and cordage, whether hemp, manila hemp, or iron wire; anchors and cables; iron plates, castings, and forgings; angle-irons, beams, masts, yards, rivets, bolts, nuts, screws, engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery, and all other materials and appliances which may be necessary for the construction and equipment, in whole or in part, of vessels, whether steam or sail vessels, to be built and furnished in the United States after the 1st day of January, 1885, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be collected or paid thereon."

SEC. —. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1885, any citizen or citizens of the United States may purchase the whole of any steam or sail vessel, no matter where said vessel may have been built, whether within the United States or in a foreign country, or whether said vessel may have been owned in whole or in part by an alien or aliens; and said vessel shall be registered free of duty, as to her hull, spars, appliances, outfit, and equipment (including boilers, engines, and machinery, if a steam-vessel), as a vessel of the United States, by the collector in any port of entry of the United States to whom application for such registry may be made by said citizen or citizens, in the same manner as though said vessel had been built in the United States.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have caused the proposition submitted by the minority of the committee to be read, because I regard it as the most important question that we either have been or will be called upon to consider during this session. Our action will determine whether we intend to compete hereafter for our share of the ocean-carrying trade of the world, or whether we propose to surrender it absolutely to foreign nations; whether we intend in time of peace to train sailors for our defense in war, or be content to prostrate ourselves at the feet of other maritime powers.

I assume that we will not be guilty of the folly of maintaining by needless taxation 100,000 sailors in idleness in costly public armed ships, waiting for strife, simply to parade our flag in foreign ports, where it is never seen at the masthead of a merchant vessel. That exhibit would add nothing to our dignity as a people or to the restoration of our "prestige" as a maritime power. We might with as much propriety obtain permission to erect liberty-poles in foreign ports on which to flaunt our flag, unless we have merchant ships to guard and protect.

Mr. Jefferson commended, as one of the fundamental needs of the Government, "a well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace and for the first moments of war till regulars may relieve them."

Our sailors in the merchant marine are the militia of the sea, easily converted into regulars. The maintenance of such a marine, convertible, in part at least, into efficient cruisers, is the best "encouragement to agriculture and of commerce as its handmaid."

We are now seeking to construct a new navy, modeled on the idea of preventing war by having a class of armed ships capable of running down and capturing the merchant ships of our enemies. I do not understand that either the cruisers now being built or those proposed to be constructed are expected to enter into a conflict with the great ironclads of European nations, nor do I understand that we propose to build such a naval armament as they maintain any more than we think of keeping up a standing army equal to theirs. We must rely upon land batteries with great guns, capable of penetrating any armor, such as Krupp is making for other people, aided by gunboats, torpedoes, and such appliances as the skill of our engineers can develop.

I desire, above all things, a well-equipped, convertible merchant marine, which costs the Government nothing, which earns money in time of peace instead of squandering it; the ships and sailors of which will be ready for the service of the Government if we should ever be engaged in war. Such a fleet we can obtain; but it can only be done by liberalizing our policy and giving our people every facility for purchasing and running the ships they buy at the cheapest possible rates. There is no sentiment in business. Success in trade consists in the dollars and cents to be made or saved by the individuals who engage in the ventures. It is no consolation to an American ship-owner, who is handicapped by the high price he had to pay for his ships, to know while he is losing money in competition with foreigners who use cheap vessels that some shipbuilder on the Hudson or the Delaware made money by selling to him the ship he uses at the high price he paid. He would rather be unpatriotic enough to take and run a ship built on the Clyde which cost him $200,000, and make money by it, than lose money on a duplicate of it built on the Delaware which cost him $300,000.

He sees our manufacturers, railroad managers, Bessemer-steel makers, and all others buy their machinery, rails, and patent processes in any country in the world where they can buy them cheapest and best, and employ their operatives upon the best terms they can, while he is prohibited by law from even raising the American flag or claiming the protection of his Government for his ship, if he buys her from any other than an American ship-builder, and even if he does he can not hire sailors to man her, except upon conditions which make them cost him 30 per cent. more than his competitors pay the same men when they employ them. Of course these unjust laws have destroyed the American merchant marine in the foreign carrying trade, and it can not be revived until they are repealed. It is no answer to say that the navigation laws are time-honored, or that they were enacted by the fathers of the Republic. Conditions have changed. All our ocean competitors then had the same or more stringent restrictive laws; now they have repealed them all.

What would the world think of an American turfman who would insist on weighting down his horse with one hundred and fifty pounds, when all his competitors of the same age carried ninety pounds, and when distanced and his money gone insisting on repeating it, and refusing to change because his father and his grandfather had always put up that weight. Then, the forefathers of his competitors put up one hundred and fifty pounds on their horses also, but because the present generation of turfmen have reduced the weight to ninety pounds, that, he insists, is no reason why he should abandon the time-honored and long-established rules of his ancestors. I assume that the world would think his conduct as absurd and ruinous as it now regards the conduct of the American Congress in adhering to barbarous navigation laws which all the world but ourselves have repudiated and abandoned.

It must not be forgotten that trade and commerce are carried on by private individuals and not by governments. The citizen makes or loses; he must consult his private interest, but his government should see to it that he has fair play in his competition with other people, and that he is not handicapped, oppressed, or discriminated against by either foreign or domestic legislation.

I know that all the interests in the country that either are or are seeking to be subsidized protest against free ships. Of course they do; and the great political parties of the country are dividing on what shall be our future policy in regard to these great questions.

The propositions of the majority and minority of the Committee on Commerce in regard to our foreign carrying trade illustrate fully and fairly the fundamental difference between the principles of the parties they represent; both agree that our shipping interest has almost disappeared from the high seas. All unite in efforts to remove the comparatively trifling obstacles now in the way; but when they come to discuss the fundamental cause of the admitted decay and the means of restoration of our merchant marine, they fall back upon, or rather seek to push to the front, the principles and the policy of their respective party organizations. The majority ignore the baneful effect of the high protective tariff on our carrying trade. They refuse to consider the real evil; they cling to obsolete navigation laws which the world has abandoned; they demand subsidies for American ship builders and owners, the exclusion of cheap free ships, taxation of the people to make a crippled business profitable by bounties outside of it, protection by Congress against even home competition from that class of ships not favored through pretended mail contracts, which only American steamships of a certain class are to have, that being only another name for subsidy, pension, bounty—call it what you will—to a privileged few. The minority propose to remove all possible restrictions from ship-building and ship-owning in our foreign trade; they propose to allow our own citizens to buy their ships, as all their foreign competitors do, where they can get them best and cheapest, and allow them when bought to be registered as American property, entitled under the American flag to all the protection the Government can give; they propose to give our own ship-builders free materials of every sort needed to build and equip ships; they propose to open up trade and intercourse with all the world by diminishing restrictions to the lowest point possible consistent with the wants of our own Government. In short, they propose, without increasing the burdens of taxation, indeed by reducing them, to place the people of the United States at least upon an equal footing with foreigners in a contest for our own and the world's carrying trade. We have by treaty with England, France, and Germany, indeed with every respectable foreign government, Spain excepted, provided in substance that no other or higher rate of duties shall be imposed or collected on vessels of foreign governments, whencesoever coming, nor on their cargoes, howsoever composed, than is or may be payable on vessels of the United States and their cargoes.

I need not occupy the time of the Senate by proving that all nations except the United States now buy their ships where they can buy them cheapest, or that the difference in the cost of ships, with the sharp competition for freights, often makes a profit or loss in the business. It must be apparent from our treaty stipulations that none of the schemes so often suggested of giving advantages to American ships by exacting lower duties on goods brought in them than when like goods are carried in foreign bottoms are practicable or permissible. It is painfully apparent that we have lost all our foreign carrying trade except about 16 per cent., and that the poorest and least profitable, most of it in an inferior class of wooden vessels, which even the protectionists do not propose to subsidize through mail contracts or in any other form. Indeed, the form of subsidy now advocated, whether so intended or not, must inevitably drive from the ocean all the sailing vessels we have left. What would the constituents of any State Legislature say to their representatives if, upon any pretense, they should pass a law taxing the people of a State or county to pay the running expenses of one of two competing lines of stages, steamboats, or railways, and leave its competitor to pay its own? Of course freight and passage would be cheapened on the subsidized line to those who used it for a while, but the unsubsidized line would soon wind up and cheap rates would end on the other when competition ceased. The next Legislature would, I think, be composed of new men. That will happen in Congress when the people learn the true intent, meaning, and effect of these subsidy propositions. No matter how plausibly they are disguised, the people will some day learn that class legislation, protection, and the selfishness of subsidized interests have driven our ships from the seas, surrendered our carrying trade to foreigners, left us defenseless where alone we need defense, made us beggars and suppliants at the feet of foreign powers who are interested in crushing us when they can not use us, and who reluctantly maintain relations with us now only because we sell them food cheaper than anybody else will, and because their people are our ocean carriers, our commission merchants, our factors and brokers, our secret partners, who take all the profits from the producers of our agricultural products, which must find foreign markets or are regulated by their prices. One hundred and fifty millions of dollars (a sum larger than our much-lauded balance of trade) is annually paid by us to foreigners to carry our goods to and from their markets, while we have given up to other nations our share of the carrying trade of the outside world.

The American sailor has almost disappeared from the ocean, on which, it must be apparent, all our strifes with other nations will hereafter be had. I need not parade our defenseless condition. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], when he laid the majority report before the Senate, asserted that 95 per cent. of the sailors who man the few ships we now have are foreigners. They are generally the most ignorant and worthless of the class to which they belong; so ignorant and worthless that they cannot find employment in the valuable ships of their own nationalities.

Mexico is now buying abroad, as cheaply as she can, a respectable merchant marine large enough to carry on all the trade between our ports and hers, and between us and the ports of the West Indies and Central America. It is therefore absolutely certain that our foreign carrying trade will go on in cheap foreign-built ships whether we permit our people to engage in it or not. And I think the Senate will have great difficulty in seeing how our home ship-building industry is promoted or protected by Congress refusing to allow our own citizens to buy and run ships under the protection of our own flag in the foreign trade upon the same terms that all other people with whom we have treaties are now allowed to trade with and for us. Surely the prohibition injures only ourselves. Foreigners buy no ships from our ship-builders now; they get enough elsewhere to do nearly all our work as well as all the work of other nations. Why, I ask, should they have that right and Americans be deprived of it, unless they work under the cover and protection of foreign flags in foreign-built ships? I hope some one will answer that question. I observe that the New York Republican State convention the other day resolved to favor "the removal of all unjust restrictions upon American shipping interests." I shall note with some interest the votes of the Senators from that great State on the proposition to allow American ship-owners to purchase ships on the same terms as their foreign competitors do. Their votes may throw some light on the value of such resolutions. Platforms and practices are often hard to reconcile; the facts are so patent in regard to our defenseless and dependent condition on the high seas that patriotic proclamations and glittering platitudes will not satisfy the intelligence of the country any longer.

The object of the bill I have had the honor to lay before the Senate several times and to discuss at some length on this floor on the 27th of January, 1881, which is substantially the proposition of the minority of the committee, reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], seeks to give to our people the same rights by law that our treaties give to the people of all other countries, and I confess I am unable to see why that right should be withheld from them or what interest is subserved by withholding it. I assume that our experience with Brazilian and Pacific mail subsidies has satisfied Congress that it is folly to impose additional taxation on the whole people in order to raise money to subsidize any private enterprise. Indeed I may safely assume, as I did in the speech I referred to, "that whatever aid any business receives that does not naturally pertain to the business itself is in the end detrimental to it, or when government seeks to support it by outside subsidy it ends in failure. Whatever lightens the burdens on ships or anything else that inheres in the business helps it." Certainly American ship-builders with a monopoly of the coastwise trade can not complain because Congress gives our own people the same rights that foreigners now enjoy in the foreign carrying trade.

The question practically is, shall we by law prohibit American citizens from competing on the high seas with foreigners by preventing them from buying ships as all their competitors do, and thus perpetuate the monopoly of our carrying trade in the hands of foreign nations, any of whom may at any time become our enemies or the enemies of each other, which would be equally fatal to our commerce, for our goods on their ships would be destroyed to as great an extent as their own when the cruisers of each sunk the merchant-vessels of the other? I need not tell the Senate that the seas are free. Congressional prohibition or protection, however desirable to some people, can not reach that trade or protect that industry against foreign pauper competition, which is now the fashionable way of expressing all reasons for asking Congressional aid. Even Congress can not force a foreign ship-owner to pay $400,000 to an American ship-builder for a ship when he can buy a duplicate of it elsewhere for $300,000. Is there, I again ask, any propriety or sense in prohibiting our own citizens from placing themselves on an equal footing with their foreign competitors? We build no ships, or none worth speaking of, for the foreign trade. Foreigners furnish foreign ships now manned by foreign crews, sufficient to do our work, and pocket the profits, and will continue to do so as long as Congress prohibits our own people from competing with them. American ship-builders will reap no benefit from this dog-in-the-manger policy; but $150,000,000 a year will continue to be taken from us and our posterity forever to enrich men who at any moment may become our enemies and use the money we furnish them and the sailors we support for them to humiliate and impoverish us.

If an exigency should arise that would enable the American people to realize the truth in regard to the present condition of our foreign carrying trade, the antiquated navigation laws, to which we alone of all civilized nations adhere, would be swept from our statute-books, and the most ultra-protectionist in this body would not venture to oppose the repeal.

Times change and men change with them. Situated as we are on a yet sparsely settled continent, with every variety of soil and climate, surrounded by oceans, gulfs, and lakes; with great navigable rivers traversing our land in every direction; with a railroad system more extensive than that of all Europe; and with a people at least the peers of any other in all that constitutes greatness, individually and collectively, it is a shame and disgrace to have all our commercial energies so crippled by our own legislation that we are prostrate at the feet of even half-civilized countries. We might as well insist on manufacturing our clothing with the hand-loom of the last century, and reject steam and all its appliances as destructive of human labor; exclude the light of the sun from our homes and shops as a foreign pauper and a free-trader in light and heat, and yet seek to compete with people in production and transportation who had seized upon and appropriated every newly discovered force in nature and every invention in art and science to lessen human efforts in cheapening products—with any reasonable hope of success as to insist on competing with other people for the ocean-carrying trade successfully under the miserable navigation laws of past centuries to which we still cling after all the world has discarded them.

The people I have the honor in part to represent are greatly interested in safe and cheap transportation; they know that all the cost of carrying the products of their labor to the markets of the world by land and sea is deducted from the (foreign) market price. This cost falls upon the producer, when he is compelled to meet competition in foreign markets. They know that the ocean is a continuation of the highway over which their grain, provisions, and stock have to be carried, and is the only free, God-given part of it. As one of their representatives I protest against the American Congress giving to foreign nations a monopoly of the trade on that great highway. They are too intelligent to be deceived by the denunciations of a press subsidized by our home monopolists that free ships are advocated in British interests. They understand that the nation that makes over $100,000,000 annually out of the monopoly Congress has given her in our ocean trade and travel, as against our own people, and can thus afford to keep in training for her navy, when needed, even against us, 100,000 of her native sailors, while we can have neither ships nor sailors, is not anxious to have these conditions reversed.

I was impressed by the forcible language in which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] expressed his contempt for the bill reported by a majority of the Committee on Commerce, when he said that its provisions were "insectivorous compared to the deadly blight which had stricken down the merchant marine of the United States."

I am amazed that anybody who is disinterested should seek longer to maintain the navigation laws, and I confess that I have very little patience with, and less respect for, that class of men who have the impudence to come before the committees of Congress and impugn the motives and even the patriotism of representatives of States and people who ask that American citizens may be allowed with their own money to buy ships as cheaply as foreigners do in the trade, which, by treaties, we authorize them to engage in upon the same terms with ourselves. Is that an unreasonable request? Are we to lie prostrate forever at the feet of foreign powers because our ship-builders can not build the ships needed in modern commerce as cheaply as they are furnished elsewhere to all our foreign competitors?

Nobody proposes to repeal our existing commercial treaties. We first proposed them and urged their adoption by other nations. So long as we had a revenue tariff and could trade with the world on fair terms, in ships that cost our ship-owners no more than other people paid for theirs, we were prosperous ocean carriers. Wages were as much higher with us then as they are now as compared with those paid by other people, yet the skill and intelligence of our seamen more than compensated for the difference in wages. It always will. England to-day pays from 25 to 50 per cent. higher wages to her operatives of all classes than the continental nations of Europe pay their laborers for like work; yet she is underselling them all, and they are seeking to protect their pauper labor, by protective tariff laws, against her skilled workmen. She tried restriction, protection, and exclusion till starvation and discontent, amounting almost to revolution, compelled her to abandon her unprofitable restrictive policy. She removed taxation from her labor, cheapened the food, the clothing, and all the necessaries for her workmen and their families, doubled the purchasing power of their wages, shortened their hours of toil, threw open her ports to all competitors, put her people upon their manhood and their muscle, declared her policy to be free-trade, free ships, free seas, and equal rights to all men in honest competition for the world's commerce. Under that policy she has sprung to the front, and holds to-day 62 per cent. of the carrying trade of the world. Her ships earned for her last year $380,000,000, and employed over 250,000 of her citizens as sailors, all of them ready and trained to become part of her naval force in any conflict with a foreign foe. She has nearly doubled her steam tonnage in the last few years; added 60,000 sailors to her merchant marine, and nearly $100,000,000 to the earnings of her ships. She had less than half a million of steam tonnage in 1860, less than a million in 1870, 2,820,551 tons in 1880, and 5,120,000 tons in 1883.

What do the tables show as to our position, even in our own carrying trade? We have surrendered all else. In 1856 we carried more than 75 per cent. of all our exports and imports in American ships, and perhaps more than half our tonnage was employed in the trade of other nations; in 1883 we carried a fraction over 16 per cent. of our own goods and did nothing appreciable outside of our own trade. We had about 90,000 of the best sailors in the world in 1859–'60; now we have hardly any. The Senator from Maine said, when he reported this bill the other day, "that 95 per cent. of the sailors now manning American ships were foreigners, while formerly they were nearly all Americans, and many of them fit to be officers." Therefore I might say we have no sailors on the high seas.

Mr. Roach, in a speech before the House Committee on Ship-building on the 24th of last January, says:

> Is it not strange that a nation which before the rebellion was the second nation on the sea, carrying 84 per cent. of our own commerce, is now carrying only 16 per cent., while at the same time the American people are considered the most practical people on earth and have solved the greatest problems of modern times? They have united all parts of the country by railroads; they have built up a vast manufacturing interest; they have developed the agricultural resources of the country—all to the astonishment of the world. The supremacy of the Government has been established and our flag has been restored to its proper place except on the ocean. A nation with more surplus products to carry on the ocean than any other; with more coal, iron, and timber for building of ships; with able financiers, skilled mechanics, and daring sailors, yet with no ships, and paying out $150,000,000 a year for freight on its carrying trade, thus giving employment to thousands of foreigners where our own people might be employed, must be in a wrong state. We began as a ship-building and a ship-owning nation with a population of 3,000,000 of people, an almost bankrupt Treasury, and a wilderness to develop. We were self-reliant and we succeeded. The nation or man who is not self-reliant will not succeed.

That is a vigorous statement of our condition. Of course his remedy is to subsidize ship-builders and those who buy their ships. My remedy is to allow our ocean carriers to buy their ships wherever they can buy them best and cheapest, to authorize them to employ their sailors upon the same terms that manufacturers and railroad managers hire their operatives, to give our ships free stores, and the free services of all our public officials at home and abroad, to give them a national register and prohibit all taxation of anything pertaining to them as commercial instrumentalities, and to pay them liberally for all services performed for the United States, including mail services.

In short, I seek to give our people fair play on the free ocean highways of the world.

When the naval appropriation bill was before us the other day the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] interrupted me to say that I had somewhere assumed that we had no commerce to protect, which I of course denied, remarking that I hoped he was aware of the difference between the load of wheat and the wagon that hauled it to market, and I might have added that the wheat would be of little use to the producer in procuring clothing or needed supplies for his family if he was prohibited by law from buying or hiring a wagon to haul it.

The rebellion was for years held responsible for the decline of our merchant marine. That pretense was at last abandoned by all except the most ultra protectionists who can not and will not open their eyes to the patent facts that our navigation laws and protective tariff laws combined have done infinitely more to destroy our shipping interest and foreign carrying trade than the war. I ventured to say so in the debate we had in 1882 on the Tariff Commission, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] declared that as being "a most amazing assertion in the light of history."

He proceeded to show how extremely absurd that amazing assertion was. He gave us the benefit of the light of history, and of course, having England on the brain, the Confederate States were in his opinion simply her agents. The decline since the war from 33 to 16 per cent. of our carrying trade in American ships, nobody who can reason will charge to the war. I will, however, give his own language. He said:

> The destruction of our shipping was immediate, and the effect upon our commerce terrible. For years we had been increasing our ocean tonnage immensely; from 1830 to 1840, 60 per cent.; from 1840 to 1850, 75 per cent.; from 1850 to 1860, 60 per cent., and in 1861 had reached our highest point, having afloat 2,700,000 tons, and occupying the second place among the nations of the earth in the extent of ocean tonnage. A few years more of such advances would have given us the proud position of mistress of the seas. England saw this, feared it, and these cruisers were only doing her will.

That was quite a handsome tribute from a protectionist for protection's sake to the old Democratic revenue-tariff policy, so far as our shipping interest and foreign carrying trade is concerned. He proceeded thus:

> From 1861 to 1866 more than a million tons of this shipping was lost to us; more than 100,000 were burned by English cruisers, sailing under the confederate flags, and more than 900,000 sought protection under foreign flags, principally under that of England. The value of the remaining was crippled by the perils of the cruisers, the risk of sailing under our flag being so great as to drive a large proportion of the carrying trade into foreign bottoms.

Stripped of its verbiage and Anglo-mania, he proved my assertion to be true. One hundred thousand tons captured from an aggregate tonnage of 2,700,000 tons, or less than 4 per cent., was the actual loss by the war, whether it was a war with England or the Confederate States.

Nine hundred thousand tons out of the 1,000,000 were lost to American citizens by the navigation laws—I was about to say the miserable, barbarous, infamous navigation laws—which are still maintained to protect ship-builders, and are even now lauded as the safeguard of the American merchant marine.

Can anything be imagined more absurd, more shameful, than to punish citizens whose property the Government could not protect because they sold or transferred it to friendly powers to prevent its destruction in time of war? What public interest has been subserved by prohibiting them from ever reclaiming their ships which they were obliged to transfer to a foreign flag even if the friendly holders offer to return them after the danger is over, and when these citizens who were, without any fault of theirs, deprived of the ships they had but could not save because of the inability of their Government to protect them, ask the privilege from Congress to be allowed to buy other ships in which to continue to prosecute their business, upon the same terms that the Government allows foreigners to engage in it. Is it not, I ask, absolutely impertinent that they and all who think that citizens of the United States should have equal rights with foreigners in the ocean carrying trade should be denounced as enemies of their country by men who are seeking to put money in their own pockets by the maintenance of laws which prohibit our own people from buying ships anywhere except from them, at such prices as they see fit to ask for them? These patriotic ship-builders assume to be the special protectors and guardians of American labor, and insinuate that all efforts to allow our people to buy ships except from them and at their prices are anti-American, and that we are working in the interest of England.

England, they assume, is building nearly all the ships now engaged in our foreign carrying trade. Concede it. What difference, I ask, does it make to her, or her operatives, whether the price of the ships she builds is paid by an American, a Mexican, a Frenchman, a German, or an Englishman? Or how would American ship-builders or their operatives be affected if an American bought an English ship to put into the trade instead of a Mexican, a Frenchman, a German, or an Englishman? The English workman gets the same number of days' work, and receives the same wages, no matter who buys the ship; and as the American workman gets none of that work to do, and will get none so long as ships are built cheaper in other countries, and foreigners can carry our goods under treaties, it makes no sort of difference to him what the nationality of the ship-owner is. Yet the American ship-builders, with an absolute monopoly of our coastwise trade, with the exclusive right to build ships for it at their own price conceded to them, have the audacity, I might say impudence, to denounce all men as unpatriotic who deny their right to exclude American citizens from entering into competition for a fair share of the world's commerce on the high seas unless they pay them, say, $300,000 for a ship that they are offered elsewhere for $200,000, and which all their foreign competitors buy at that price. The truth is that American labor is used by them, and all other protected pets of Congress, as the cat's-paw to pull their chestnuts out of the fire. They buy their ores, their machinery, everything abroad when they can get it cheaper than they can buy at home. They dismiss an American citizen from their service if they can hire a foreigner cheaper. There is no tariff protection against the free import of competing labor, and ocean freight on that is cheap and the time of transfer short. When these patriotic monopolists find that they have produced more than the country will or can buy at the price they ask they close their shops, oil their machinery, clamor around Congress for the maintenance of laws which prohibit all our people from buying the articles abroad which they have for sale, and which they refuse to send abroad to get rid of at free, open market prices; and all this time the laborer and his family, whose welfare they pretend to have so much at heart, are starving from enforced idleness. The wolf gave the lamb that sort of protection, and did not put on lamb's clothing to deceive him. The wolf has title to respect over these Pharisees and hypocrites in this regard at least, that he was a bold marauder and not a false pretender.

But is it true, can it be true, that England is interested in Americans having the right to buy ships abroad, so that she may build them? The ocean carrying trade of this country and of the world needs only enough ships to do the work. The work is done now. England builds the ships to do it. The exclusion by our laws of our people from it does not withdraw a single ship that can be profitably employed. The money of the Mexican, the Italian, the Frenchman, or the German is as good as ours, employs as many men, feeds as many mouths, keeps open as many ship-yards; the only patent effect being, as Mr. Roach shows, to compel us to pay to foreign nations annually, to England principally, $150,000,000, which, with the same rights as we by our treaties give to foreigners, our people could earn and keep at home and make by the superiority of American sailors, which all nations conceded when we had them, even with our high wages, many millions more out of the trade of the world, as they did in ante-bellum days. The $150,000,000 we pay annually to enrich and strengthen foreign nations would buy a magnificent merchant marine. At $60 a ton average of steam and sail, it would purchase 2,500,000 tons of shipping, which would employ not less than 50,000 American sailors, the only defenders we will ever need hereafter. I repeat, can it be possible that England, whose interest, pride, and power is centered in her dominion over the high seas; who controls 62 per cent. of the world's trade, and more than that of ours; who gets from us annually three-fourths, at least, of the $150,000,000 of tribute that Congress compels us to contribute to support foreign nations; who knows that we under fair conditions are her only formidable commercial rival, should seek to restore our prestige on the ocean and destroy her own?

We maintain and support to-day, by the surrender of our carrying trade to her, 100,000 English trained sailors and their families, who would be our most dangerous enemies if England so ordered. We are content to lie prostrate at her feet, almost without a ship, a sailor, or a gun, and representatives of the American people who honestly and earnestly deplore and seek to reverse that condition are taunted by men who seek to make money out of our unfortunate condition with being bought with British gold and as emissaries of England. If protectionists and restrictionists have made one impression on the American mind stronger than any other it has been by the catch-words, "In time of peace prepare for war." That pretended policy has controlled the country. We have had nearly twenty years of peace, and in many regards of prosperity. Our wars in the future will be on the high seas. Have they prepared for war? Is England really interested in helping us to prepare for war in spite of the protests of patriotic American protectionists and restrictionists, backed by the pets of Congress, whose highest and most patriotic aspiration is to pile taxation mountain high on all the labor of the country and on all it absolutely needs, to enrich themselves by law and not by honest work. No man fit to be outside of an institution for the feeble-minded can be deceived by such assertions.

Mr. President, I do not believe that it is possible in the prostrate condition of our merchant marine, under our treaty obligations, to build up an ocean carrying trade by any system of subsidies. Subsidy in any form under our tariff laws simply means an increase of the burdens of taxation directly or indirectly on the goods which our people have to carry to market and sell, and on those they buy abroad with the proceeds of what they export, in order to give the tax thus collected to a few people to help sustain a losing or unprofitable business.

Can anything be more unreasonable than to require the Western farmers and their laborers to pay increased taxes on all the goods they are compelled to have, and are obliged to take in exchange for the wheat they must send abroad and sell in sharp competition with the pauper labor of Russia and India, in order to enrich a few American ship-builders who have already a monopoly of our coastwise trade, with free coal for their ships, which is denied to the laborer on shore? If the present depression in the price of wheat, which it costs 65 cents a bushel to raise here while it costs 38 cents in India, causes the men of the West to inquire how more taxation to give subsidies to ship-builders is to benefit them by still further diminishing the purchasing power of their wheat product, it may prove a blessing in disguise. They will learn that their American industries, upon which all others depend, are loaded down with cunningly devised burdens, and while their pockets are being picked they are even now singing pæans of praise to the jugglers who are robbing them.

The truth is, Mr. President, before we can again become a great commercial people and regain our lost prestige on the ocean and in the marts of foreign nations we must reverse our system of taxation even though we follow the example of England. She pursued for centuries the policy of taxation to which we still adhere. She taxed the food, the clothing, the wants and needs of her laboring people till starvation and oppression had brought her workmen, pent up as they were, with few privileges, in a small country not half the size of Texas, to the point of revolution. The aristocracy and other favored classes felt that relief must be given to labor or destruction of their own privileges would follow, and that quickly. They appreciated the situation and reversed their cherished policy; they removed all possible burdens from labor; they required wealth, property, and luxuries to furnish the needed revenues. Now an English operative who does not drink liquor or use tobacco, with the exception of a small tax on tea and coffee, both of which articles are cheaper there than here, does not pay one penny under any form of taxation toward the support of the British Government. His wages have their full purchasing power. He can buy in the cheapest markets of the world all he needs for the support and comfort of himself and his family.

We cling to the old protective policy. Over 40 per cent. of the purchasing power of the wages of our laborers is taken from them by the Congress that professes to be their representatives, friends, and protectors, which is given to favored classes. Taxation is so cunningly adjusted that the wants and necessaries of life bear all the burdens.

Little wonder we are driven out of the markets of the world when our labor is so heavily burdened. Yet there are men who think they are statesmen earnestly urging the removal of all taxation on whisky and tobacco, every dollar of which, amounting to about $135,000,000 annually, goes into the Treasury, less 3½ per cent. cost of collection. These are taxes which no man is obliged to pay; they constitute no burden on the necessary wants and needs of the family of the laboring man; the repeal of these taxes is sought in order to increase the taxes on the wants and necessities of the workers for wages; and yet they parade themselves before the country as the special protectors of American labor. Free whisky and tobacco, with taxes doubled on clothing, blankets, and sugar, is the rallying cry of the protectionist for the next campaign. And oppressive and unnecessary taxes must be maintained at such rates as will not only support the most extravagant and wasteful administration of the Federal Government which an overflowing Treasury always fosters, but they must produce annually a surplus of over $100,000,000 beyond all they dare spend to be patriotically and benevolently expended in donations of the most questionable character; in short, it must be expended in schemes to consolidate and centralize all power and authority in the Federal Government through pretended benefices from money wrung by an insidious and unintelligible tax system from poverty and labor, to the destruction of the legitimate authority of the States and the manhood and independence of the people. Relief from these extortions is the first step toward commercial prosperity.

The next indispensable step is, without increasing taxation on the goods to be carried, to allow our ocean carriers to buy the cheapest ships they can. That done, give the ships a national register from Washington; free them from all taxation, Federal, State, or municipal, so long as they are engaged in the foreign carrying trade; allow them free material and machinery for repairs, to be stored in any American ship-yard ready for use; give them free stores and supplies of all sorts; in short, reduce their expenses to the lowest possible point, and require all our foreign consuls and commercial agents to aid them free of charge in every possible way in foreign ports.

When all that is done I am not prepared to say that we will build up our merchant marine very rapidly. We certainly will not under the present high protective tariff, but I trust that will soon be changed. Then my hope is that the managers of the great railroad lines centering at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and elsewhere may, with the advantages they have to control and secure passengers and freights, engage to carry our exports from the place of production to their ultimate foreign markets by sea as well as by land; it would be but an extension of their lines over a road that costs nothing and needs no repairs. The 600,000 immigrants starting from European ports annually would virtually be on their lines of road during the ocean transit, while our system of inland transportation of goods in bond to the cities of the West would induce Western importers to patronize a continuous line, which carried their goods under one contract on one line from the place of purchase to their place of business.

With free materials and machinery for building and repairs, authorized to be stored in readiness for any emergency, navy-yards for repairs would spring up, which would soon be converted into yards for building under the most favorable auspices, as work is always done best and cheapest when men are repairing or building for themselves. The Germans, with not one-tenth of our facilities, have illustrated the truth of that statement.

We are sometimes told that there is not profit enough in the ocean-carrying trade to induce our people to engage in it, no matter what we do here. If that is so, no ships will be either bought or built; no American industry will be injured by the right to buy ships at cheap rates. The privilege may, however, prevent combinations among foreign carriers to increase rates, as they have often done, notably and oppressively in 1873. Such combinations can not be prevented if we have to wait till ships can be built here to break them down.

It is too obvious to need more than a statement, that, if England should engage in war with any foreign country, the great bulk of our agricultural exports, notably live-stock and provisions, would be absolutely lost or rendered valueless, if our people are prohibited from buying ships, and must wait till they can be built here. President Grant saw how we were handicapped, even with English ships undisturbed, when the Franco-Prussian war broke out, and promptly sent a message to Congress urging the repeal, for a time at least, of the navigation laws, so that our people could buy ships abroad in which to maintain our trade with France and Germany. But the dog-in-the-manger policy of the protectionists was too strong even for him, and Congress adjourned in twenty-four hours after the President's message was received. As they could not answer it they ran away from it. I sometimes wish that England had been involved in that strife long enough to have made our people realize what a humiliating position the policy of the Republican leaders had placed the country in by their restrictive and protective policy. We would have been relieved long before now from many of the cunningly devised schemes of taxation which still oppress the people.

Mr. President, I had intended to support my views in favor of free ships by those of distinguished Republicans in both Houses of Congress, especially by those of Hon. Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan, in a very able speech delivered on this floor on the 28th of May, 1870, and of Hon. James A. Garfield in the other House on the 25th of May, 1870, as both of them will be recognized as patriotic men even by the ship-builders and their advocates; but I am content to stand on the merits of the propoosition. I will however make a quotation from a letter written some years ago by the ablest living American statesman, Hon. Horatio Seymour, of New York, to Hon. Erastus Brooks, which I have read before in this Chamber. He said:

> There is no reason entitled to respect to be given for our navigation laws, so far as they forbid our merchants to buy ships elsewhere for the purposes of foreign trade. The governments of Europe, more wise, do what they can to build up their commerce, and their flags are seen in our harbors waving over vessels bought by their merchants where they can get them upon the best terms. Every such flag seems to reproach the folly of laws which practically forbid American citizens to carry American produce across the ocean or to share in the great profits of the world's commerce. There is an alarm about communistic principles. What are they? Some wild theorists claim that it is the duty of Government to give labor to workmen, and to take care that property shall be so held in common that what one earns may be given to another. We frown upon these men and denounce their purposes. But what do they claim more than a few builders of steamships get under our navigation laws? These demand that such vessels for foreign trade must be made by them; that the buyer, besides paying for them what they are worth, must divide some of his property with the builders by giving them more than they are worth in the markets of the world. It will be found in the end that communism which lurks in laws which force men to buy of certain classes, and to pay more for what they want than they can be bought for elsewhere, and which also divides men's estates under cover of taxation, which indirectly go to favored individuals, is more hurtful and dangerous than the communism which says what it means, and which destroys itself by an open declaration of its purposes.

Mr. President, a few words more and I am done. Some years ago when I urged the importance of these propositions in this body my views received little consideration. Now a very pronounced majority of the representatives of the American people agree with me. We may differ as to details. Indeed in regard to many needed reforms I will follow the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], assuming that the Committee on Commerce has investigated and informed itself concerning them. I now give notice that whenever a proper opportunity offers I will insist that we shall so amend existing laws as to open our ports as storehouses for the world's goods. London is to-day the commercial center of the world mainly because all people are allowed to store their merchandise in her warehouses, whether it is intended for English consumption or not, where it can be held securely at the owner's risk as long as he pleases Thousands of her people are employed in these great warehouses, hundreds of ships find profitable freights in hauling goods to and from them, bills of exchange are drawn upon the property they contain, till the world looks to London as the regulator of its exchanges. New York ought to be, and if we are wise will be, the world's commercial emporium. No reason can be assigned why all people, especially those of Central and South America and the West Indies, should not be encouraged to deposit their goods in American warehouses if they regard them as safer here than at home. Why should we not have the carrying trade, the warehousing profits, the exchanges, and all the pecuniary and commercial benefits now reaped by England? I admit that these questions can not be considered in this bill, and perhaps Senators may regard even the suggestion of them as out of place, but they have been urged by at least one very far-seeing Secretary of the Treasury.

I will supplement these remarks by a quotation from his official report. In December, 1848, Hon. Robert J. Walker, in his report to Congress, after showing the possibilities of the extension of our commerce with the countries of Eastern Asia consequent on our acquisition of California, said:

We would in time receive the productions of the East in exchange, not only for our own consumption but to be warehoused in our ports as entrepôts for the supply of Europe. And so far as European fabrics should reach Asia and the western coast of America they would ultimately pass chiefly through our hands as factors and in our vessels, events which would very soon give us the command of the trade and specie of the world. From these great events the whole country would derive vast benefits, but especially the city of New York. It would become the depot and storehouse and entrepôt of the commerce of the world, the center of business and exchanges, the clearing-house of international trade and business, the place where assorted cargoes of our own products and manufactures as well as those of all foreign countries would be sold and reshipped, and the point to which specie and bullion would flow as the great creditor city of the world for the adjustment of balances, as the factor of all nations, and the point whence this specie would flow into the interior of our country through all the great channels of internal trade and intercourse. With these great events accomplished, and with abundant facilities for the warehousing of foreign and domestic goods at New York, it must eventually surpass in wealth, in commerce and population, any European emporium, while as a necessary consequence all our other cities and every portion of the Union and all our great interests would derive corresponding advantages.

Again he says:

I renew the recommendations contained in all my annual reports for the establishment of a branch of the Mint of the United States at the city of New York. That city, our great commercial metropolis, is advancing to its ultimate position, so important to the whole country, as the emporium of universal commerce, the center of international exchanges, and the storehouse of the products of the world.

Further on he says:

If we would command the commerce of all nations it must be through some one American commercial emporium, the great center of our own trade and business. The history of trade demonstrates that some such great point is indispensable to enable any nation to command universal commerce, and that such concentration at some one city, instead of injuring other cities or parts of the same country, is of immense benefit to all. There can not be two or more financial centers of the foreign commerce of any one nation any more than there can be two or more centers of a circle. The same principle of the center of the trade of a nation applies to the trade of the world. There can be but one such center for the world and but one for each nation, which in this country, from natural causes, must be New York, where the competition must soon commence with foreign cities for the control of international commerce.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. He expressed the hope, as I understood him, that there would be some improvement or reformation of our warehousing system to bring about the results he has mentioned. I desire to ask if he has prepared a bill on that subject. I hope that he has.

Mr. BECK. I have not. I have suggested it to a number of Senators, especially the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and promised to do so if I could, but I have failed, because I do not know that I am quite capable of drawing the proper sort of bill. But that it should be done and will be done, and that it will add more to the commerce and carrying trade of the country than all else, I have no doubt; and I do hope that the time will come very soon when under the lead of some distinguished executive of the party to which the Senator from Alabama and myself have the honor to belong we shall be better able to liberalize trade than we seem to be able to do now.

I thought I would not say any more, but I will read the conclusion reached by a portion of the Joint Committee on American Shipping of the last Congress, being Report No. 1827, second session Forty-seventh Congress, in which the minority say:

The decadence of our shipping and its causes are all too familiar to the public mind. The selfishness which prevents its resuscitation are no less familiar. It is an old, old story. The minority of the committee would repeat it in detail were it not known to every tyro in commerce and economy. They would rehearse it if, by studying the causes of the decay, we could remove the effects. The simple truth is, the removal of the causes of decay would not revive shipping. Our shipping interests have been choked by other interests, choked to death. Restrictions cumber our statutes. In a country so abundant in production as ours, which seeks every market, and is unlimited in its range of enterprise, the capital policy is, mare liberum. Give us a free sea and freedom to trade upon its bosom, permit us to buy in the best market the materials to fashion vessels of the best quality and to buy the completed ship where our competitors buy their vessels, and even without the opportunity which foreign wars may give to our carrying trade, and with the aroused inventive faculty of America consequent upon our freedom to use our energy and skill, and with the natural laws and their conditions to aid intelligence and interchange, and we may once more find the capital, labor, and genius of our countrymen evoke from the sea, as they have from the land, its most valued treasures. Our merchant marine languishes for lack of liberty. Its revival must come from the enlargement of our freedom.

The minority of the joint select committee, while concurring with the report as to the measure reported by the committee, desire also to present two other propositions:

First. For the admission free of duty of all the materials finished and perfected and ready to put together in a ship; and Second. For the free admission to American registry of ships built abroad.

GEORGE G. VEST.
ROBERT M. McLANE.
S. S. COX.

Mr. FRYE. I rose to ask the Senator during his speech a question which I should like to ask now. Does the Senator in speaking of subsidies refer to the clause reported by the Committee on Commerce contained in this bill.

Mr. BECK. The dollar-a-mile clause, or whatever it is?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. That I referred to as being, as I now understand it, a subsidy under the guise of a mail contract.

Mr. FRYE. So that in speaking of subsidies the Senator did refer to that clause of this bill?

Mr. BECK. I spoke particularly, as the Senator will see, of the subsidies that we have heretofore given in regard to the Brazilian and Pacific Mail subsidies, and this seemed to me to be in the same line. I stated at the same time that I was quite willing to pay all our ships a liberal price for all service done for the United States, the mail service included, and if it is made to appear that the provisions of this bill in regard to the mail service are reasonable I shall vote for it with great pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the Senator one other question. What does the Senator mean by "the infamous navigation laws?"

Mr. BECK. I mean laws which have become obsolete; which, no matter how good they may have been when they were necessary to retaliate against other nations, are absolutely infamous when they become oppressive upon our own citizens, and when other people by treaties have been given rights that are denied to our people at home.

Mr. FRYE. I mean to ask the Senator whether or not the laws which exclude any vessels except our own from the coastwise trade are the navigation laws which are "infamous?"

Mr. BECK. I have said all through that I do not propose to interfere with the coastwise trade, nor does the bill or the amendments.

Mr. FRYE. Why not?

Mr. BECK. Because that is a part of your system of protection that runs through every feature of legislation in this country; and the coastwise trade is confined to the competition of Americans with Americans. You have given your coastwise trade to the people of America in competition with each other, and you have given the owners of vessels the absolute right to charge all men who can not get their products to a railroad whatever they see fit in the coastwise trade. But that is no worse than it is to give to the men who make Bessemer steel or the men who manufacture iron, cotton, or woolen goods protection, and there being a competition of one American with another, as long as the other protective laws stand, I do not care to attack that. But the difference is very great when you say that an American citizen shall not use on the high seas a ship that costs him no more than a Prussian or an Englishman. I say that the law which prohibits him from doing that is infamous.

Mr. FRYE. Now, will the Senator again pardon me? Suppose his free-ships clause becomes a law; I am an American citizen; I buy a 4,000-ton iron steamer; pay my money for it; it is registered under the law as an American ship; I ask the Senator if he then would vote to prevent me, an American citizen with an American ship, from sailing it wherever I pleased?

Mr. BECK. I would not allow, so long as other interests are protected to the point they are now, any interference with the coastwise trade. I have repeated that time and again. Maine may retain that as her part of the general plunder.

Mr. FRYE. Then, Mr. President, the Senator knows perfectly well that I, as an American citizen, never would go over to England and buy a ship and put it upon the water if I was to be limited in sailing that ship.

Mr. BECK. Then your right to do so will do you no harm. That must be obvious. If the people who are now carrying our goods to foreign markets should go to war with each other, as they have done time and again, and may do hereafter, the right to buy might be the only salvation the Western farmer would have, because he can not wait two or three or four years till a vessel can be built in which to carry his perishable goods. Therefore even the mere right may be very valuable.

Mr. FRYE. A singularly valuable right in the event, for instance, that France and England went to war; for, having the right to register under the American flag, the whole English commercial fleet would come under the American flag, and I should like to know what would become of your American merchant marine.

Mr. BECK. Any case may be supposed; I was about to say any absurd case.

Mr. FRYE. I was taking the Senator's own case.

Mr. BECK. I do not know how many would be registered, but I know that the right to buy a cheap ship can do no man any harm when he is engaged in trade; and I know furthermore that the Senator from Maine, to whom I alluded in my speech awhile ago, instead of holding the confederate cruisers responsible for the whole thousand million of tons, did the country some service when he showed that nine hundred thousand of that million were lost to this country by these very infamous navigation laws and not by confederate cruisers. It was a fact never quite as well developed before as he was kind enough to develop it, and the country will thank him for it.

Mr. FRYE. If there had not been some Americans who loved their country better than they loved money there would not have been a single ship left on the sea with the American flag. There was patriotism among the owners of the ships to keep the flag on the sea, or the whole would have fled to England and been under the English flag if it had not been for the love of the flag itself.

Mr. BECK. But 900,000 tons did fly to the British flag, and I should like to know where the patriotism comes in that prevented our people from getting them back after the war was over?

Mr. FRYE. They have shown no reason why they should have them back.

Mr. BECK. The navigation laws prohibited them. Of course they could say nothing.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I did not intend to make any speech about this bill and I certainly did not intend to introduce the bill with a speech. In the time I have served in Congress I think I have learned better than that. But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is utterly irrepressible, and wherever there is any disease complained of on the face of this earth the Senator from Kentucky has to charge it to the tariff and at once makes his speech.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator put the tariff in this and charged that it was a part of the cause of the decline of American commerce and that the other part was the navigation laws. Now, Mr. President, as briefly as I can and without any of the careful preparation which the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Missouri have brought to this subject I propose to discuss this question of free ships.

In the first place what is the trouble with the American marine? Is it "the infamous navigation laws," which the Senator from Kentucky talks about? Those navigation laws were enacted in 1789, and there never was a statesman bold enough to declare for over three-quarters of a century that those laws ought to be repealed—not one Democrat, Whig, or Republican; and during those seventy-five years while those navigation laws were standing on the statute-book unchallenged our American marine grew to those magnificent proportions which the Senator from Kentucky described (in a speech I made, from which he quoted) to be larger in 1861 than that of any nation on the face of this earth but one, and increasing at a ratio which would have made it first in a very few years.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] says that our tonnage decreased before that. Our tonnage on the ocean did not decrease before that. The largest tonnage was in 1861. The amount of carrying trade did decrease, I admit, on account of the change from sail to steam, a steamer being able to carry five to one.

Mr. President, under those navigation laws we saw ourselves the owners of the finest fleet of ships that ever was seen in the history of the world. We saw ourselves plowing the ocean with clipper-ships that outsailed the steamers of that day, that were as regular in their trips, that could take freights and discharge freights on time contracts and under charters as well. Neither tariff nor navigation laws interfered with our progress.

But, sir, Great Britain herself saw her difficulty. She was for free trade. Let us see how she prospered under it. Between 1849 and 1855 the merchant marine of the United States increased 1,877,985 tons, and that of the United Kingdom increased only 894,828 tons. The United Kingdom had no navigation laws; the United Kingdom had no tariff. The United Kingdom rising to its present glory, its slow rate during that decade was not due to any such disease as our navigation laws, and our wonderful increase could not have been destroyed by them. Mr. Lindsay, the English historian, says:

> Our ship-owners naturally viewed with great alarm the rapid strides made by American shipping. Nor were their fears allayed by a reference to the board of trade returns, wherein it appeared that while the increase of British shipping had in the year previous to repeal been 393,955 tons, there had been a decrease in the year after repeal of 180,576 tons. Our position appeared, therefore, critical; and had it not been for the resources we held within ourselves—> and the indomitable energy of our people, foreign shipping might then and there have gained an ascendency which might not afterward have been easily overcome. * * * We had one advantage which our great American competitor did not possess. We had iron in abundance, and about this period we were specially directing our attention to the construction of iron ships to be propelled by the screw.

And they did provide for the building of iron ships, for driving those ships by the screw instead of the old side-wheeler; and a few years wore on, then the discovery was made of the compound-engine, and England appropriated it to herself forthwith, saving one-half the coal, and thus solving that great question of whether or not iron steamships could control the carrying trade of the world. The compound-engine settled it that they could, and England had the compound-engine, the iron, the coal, the cheap labor, and now to-day has the carrying trade of the world.

And, sir, in 1854 England did what we never have done; England did what the Congress of the United States has neglected for fifty years to do—took one square look at the laws upon the statute-book touching the merchant marine, revised the whole created boards of trade in every great center in Great Britain, authorized boards of trade almost to legislate in place of Parliament, enacted laws touching the duties of seamen to the very slightest particular, enacted laws freeing their shipping from every restraint, from every burden, and enacted by legislation every conceivable law to help the vessels sail and carry. What did we do? Take the English shipping law of 1854, covering some one hundred and fifty pages of the English statute-book, look it over, and I say you can not put your eye on a single phase touching a merchant marine that England's Parliament did not see and did not provide for. It neglected nothing; it provided everything. Again, I ask, what did we do?

Up to the war we were content with our clipper-ships; we were selling them abroad; we were competing, as we thought, with the whole world. We were gaining, as we believed. We paid no attention to the screw or the propeller or the side-wheeler. We paid no attention to iron. We paid not the slightest attention on the face of the earth to our shipping laws. The war came on. While I do not charge the decline of American commerce entirely to the war, and have no right to do so, yet I say that the Senator from Kentucky errs further on one side than I do on the other. I say that five years of such war as we had in this country inevitably turned the attention of the American people from the merchant marine, from its necessities, from its prospects; took away from it all ability to consider carefully, to legislate providently, and to guard the interests of this marine. It did that for five years. I say further that it took four hundred and ninety-seven ships out of the merchant marine, made war ships of them and sent them down South to blockade the Southern ports—over a million and a half tons for that purpose—four hundred and ninety-seven ships. It took one hundred and twenty-five more ships, small, to be sure, and sunk them in the harbors and rivers and on the bars of the Southern ports. I say it drove out from under our flag a million of tons more, and you can count a direct loss to the American tonnage of over 2,000,000 tons.

And, Mr. President, when the war was over, we sat down, balanced our accounts, and found a debt so overwhelming that we had no mind to undertake to build up a merchant marine, and we neglected it all through the days of our vitiated currency, and were compelled to do so. Twelve years from the breaking out of the war elapsed before it was in our power, if we desired, to undertake to revive and build up a merchant marine. The twelve years elapsed, and did we do anything? Why, sir, in the last Congress, my recollection is, we passed the only bill for the relief of the merchant marine that has been passed since 1860, and that was a bill touching the admeasurement of ships. We had permitted our ships to be measured under a rule we established, so that England, France, and Germany in all the charges on tonnage had an immense advantage over us, and nothing had been done, no notice taken of it, no repeal of the law or other mention of it made until the very last session of Congress; and my recollection is that it is the only law that has been passed within twenty-five years touching the merchant marine of the United States. All this time we have sat by and seen it go down and down and down, until, as the Senator from Kentucky says, to-day it only carries 15 per cent. of all our own exports and imports and none of the exports and imports of the world.

What had the navigation laws to do with that? What had the tariff to do with that? Who has asked to buy a ship abroad? By this bill the last Congress for the first time undertook to take these burdens off the merchant marine of the United States. It took the laws upon our statute-book, and by a special committee, spending care, time, attention, learning upon the whole subject, reported that there were standing upon our statute-books laws that were infamous really, not infamous romantically like the navigation laws, but infamous in fact; and they reported to Congress the laws that ought to be repealed or ought to be modified. A bill passed the House of Representatives, came to the Senate, was returned to the House with amendments too late for action, and still nothing was done.

Then at this session of Congress the Committee on Commerce take up the subject; they go to work upon it; they unanimously report every provision of the bill which has been read here to-day, including the "subsidy" which the Senator from Kentucky talks about, and all, Democrats and Republicans, uniting in every provision of the bill; and yet the Senator from Kentucky, who has such an intense interest in the revival of the merchant marine, comes in here with a provision which will destroy every single proposition reported favorably by the committee, and put us in a worse condition than we were ever in before.

If these are good provisions so far as they go I ask the Senator from Kentucky why can not he consent that we shall do this little thing now for American commerce? He knows perfectly well that the proposition which he makes is held by at least an even number of his peers as virtually a destruction of the merchant marine of the United States; that they as honestly believe it as he honestly believes that the merchant marine requires it, and that it is the only medicine which will bring healing with it. I ask the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky why they can not let us enact into law those things that all agree upon as good, wholesome, requisite, without throwing in here upon us that which one-half at least believe to be utterly destructive and the other half perhaps believe may be useful?

The proposition made by the Senator from Kentucky is to me utterly absurd. I accord to him honesty of purpose. I accord to the Senator from Missouri honesty of purpose. I know both gentlemen, and I know both to be honest men beyond peradventure, beyond question. I make no charges of what the Senator from Kentucky talks about of being bought by English gold. I do not believe the English have gold enough in all their coffers to buy either Senator or any Senator. I never indulge in talk in my speeches about corruption in Congress. I have been here fourteen years, and I never saw it or heard of it except in newspapers and from speeches now and then made by members of the House or of the Senate. So I make no charges against either gentleman, but I say the proposition made by them and maintained by them seriously here before the Senate seems to me to be utterly absurd and preposterous, utterly destructive of the best interests of the merchant marine and of our country too.

The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is to admit foreign-built ships to American register. Does any American desire to buy one? Suppose you make it a law to-day, will any American buy one? If yes, what for? To sail it? He can not sail it a month, I do not care how cheap he buys it. If he buys a 4,000-ton Lloyd's first-class A 1 steamship he can not to save his life run it in competition a year with an English 4,000-ton steamship under the English flag, or a German under the German flag, or a French under the French flag. Why? I have here the wages on board an American steamer and on board an English steamer at Philadelphia and Liverpool in 1882, taken exactly from the pay-roll of the two ships.

Mr. BAYARD. Were they in the same line?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Philadelphia, first officer, $89.10 a month.

Liverpool, first officer, $58.39 a month.

Senators, look at that one moment, and then let me ask you if you want a first officer of an American 4,000-ton iron-steamship to sail her for $58.39 a month? If you could do it, would you?

Mr. MORGAN. Was the British line subsidized?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir. It carried the mail. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] says none of them were subsidized.

The following list comprises the monthly wages paid by steamships at Philadelphia and Liverpool:

Occupation.	Philadelphia.	Liverpool.
First officer	$89 10	$58 39
Second officer	63 00	48 66
Third officer	49 50	34 06
Fourth officer	40 50	24 33
Surgeon	63 00	48 66
Purser	63 00	48 66
Carpenter	40 00	34 06
First boatswain	35 00	31 62
Second boatswain	30 00	24 33
Quartermasters	30 00	20 66
Seamen	25 00	19 46
Mess boys	13 50	7 29

Wages at San Francisco 33⅓ per cent. higher than at Liverpool.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. BAYARD. The figures the Senator has read have been designated as at Philadelphia and Liverpool. I understand that the vessels are in the same line.

Mr. FRYE. I doubt that, but running between the United States and Great Britain, the one being taken from the pay-roll of the steamship at Philadelphia and the other from the pay-roll of the steamship at Liverpool.

Mr. BAYARD. In order, however, to reach the point we are endeavoring to come at, the question is whether those rates were paid at Liverpool and at Philadelphia equally upon American and upon English ships.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; one on an English ship and one on an American ship.

Mr. BAYARD. The point is this, is there in these figures a discrimination as between the American and English ships, or only as between the ports at which the persons were employed?

Mr. FRYE. As between the ships. If you take the Liverpool men and put them on the Philadelphia ship they will then demand and receive the prices of the Philadelphia ship.

Mr. BAYARD. That is, both going to Liverpool and coming back to Philadelphia?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir. Let me give the Senator a remarkable instance which a gentleman from New York told me about. Bolton, Dallet & Bliss, of New York, run a line of steamers to Venezuela. They had five steamers under the German flag, and finally concluded to try an American ship. They hired Cramp, of Philadelphia, to build them the Caraccas, a 3,200-ton iron ship. He built it. They sailed it under the American flag. They found it was a great deal better than the German ships, and they contracted for another. They put on the two American ships and sold some of their German ships, the two American ships being able to do as much as the three German. They found on looking at the pay-roll one day that on the two German ships they retained a fireman received $20 a month, and that on the two American ships a fireman received $40 a month, doing precisely the same work, the one man being precisely as good as the other. They thought they would stop that. They took the men off from the German ship and put them on the American ship. The men made the round voyage, saw a sailor-lawyer, brought suit for the $40, instead of the $20, and compelled the steamship company to pay the $40 a month. Then those gentlemen took the same firemen, put them back on the German ship, and they took the $20 a month, with a protest.

Mr. BAYARD. There is one result very obvious, that it doubles wages for a vessel to have an American register.

Mr. FRYE. I am coming to that by and by. I want it to have that effect.

Mr. BAYARD. This point is a very practical one. There seems to be some magic, something that can not be well explained in the fact that by transferring a captain, a first officer, or an engineer from one vessel to another, owned by the same parties, performing the same duties, because he is ordered from one ship to another his compensation is either lessened one-half or increased one-half. What is the reason for that? If there is any law upon our statute-book that thus discriminates, it seems to me the remedy is an obvious one; repeal it. There must be some mystery, or else it must be something so palpable that we can get within reach of it.

Mr. VEST. It is a plain provision of our statutes. It was discussed here the other day. It is a provision of our shipping laws.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it would be the easiest thing in the world to put the finger upon that law and repeal it.

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. BECK. There is an amendment to this bill which does it.

Mr. FRYE. I disagree with the proposition of the Senator from Missouri. My opinion is that it is what is ordinarily termed the protective tariff that increases wages. You can not increase by a protective tariff the wages of men who work in factories and machine shops, and keep the wages of farmers down; it is an utter impossibility. You can not increase the wages of men in the factories and in the machine-shops and on the farms, and keep the sailors down. You can not have in this country one class of men with wages down to English wages and German wages, and nine other classes with their wages up to the present scale of American wages. That is an utter impossibility. It is the protective tariff which does this, and the only way for the other side to do is to adopt square free trade, cut down American wages to English, German, and French wages, and then pass a free-ship law, and we can get our sailors as cheap as they can and run in competition with them across the ocean.

Mr. BAYARD. If it would not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. FRYE. It will not interrupt me a particle. I have no speech to make.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator except to say that as he has——

Mr. FRYE. I should not like to yield for a reply right here. I thought the Senator wished to ask me a question.

Mr. BAYARD. I asked a question and the Senator answered it. I merely wished to say that the result of his answer logically, and in words, is that a protective tariff is inconsistent with American ship-owning.

Mr. FRYE. Inconsistent with American low wages. That is what I say.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. VEST. I hardly ever indulge in interruptions; but right here I beg to be allowed to interpose, because it is entirely applicable to the matter the Senator is discussing. The Senator from Maine now has an amendment which repeals that part of our shipping laws which compels an American vessel when it touches any portion of the American coast to reship its crew. In other words, as I stated the other day, I am very glad my friend from Maine has found out the necessity for a remedy, whether he sees the cause of the disease or not; he agrees that this portion of the shipping laws is simply outrageous. A German vessel in the port of Liverpool can hire its sailors and make any contract it pleases for the round trip or for six or twelve months, and can go to Philadelphia and retain its crew, because if the crew desert they do not receive a dollar of their back wages. But an American vessel after it hires its crew in Liverpool, no matter what contract it makes, when it reaches Philadelphia from Liverpool, under the shipping system of the United States it is bound to discharge its crew and rehire them and go before a shipping commissioner for the purpose. The result is that the Italian sailors, the Norwegian sailors, and the German sailors—for we have got no American sailors really—demand the wages in the coastwise trade, and if they do not get them they leave the ship without any crew, and our law protects them and our shipping commissioners protect them in it. I am glad that the honorable Senator from Maine wants to repeal that.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Missouri will recollect that the boarding-house keepers keep them.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course; that is part of the system.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I am in favor of the two sections to which the Senator from Missouri refers for one reason and he for another. I am in favor of them because they prevent our shipping commissioners exacting from one single line $6,000 a year for reshipping its sailors. That it will have any effect on the wages I never believed for a single moment. The wages will be American wages; but the Philadelphia line will be saved by those two sections $6,000 a year paid for reshipping the crew every time the vessels come into port.

Mr. President, you can not buy and import an honestly built 4,000-ton ship—I am not talking about scavengers and tramps and that sort of thing—I say you can not buy, if you have "free ships," such a vessel and run her here. You take four English steamships. They will cost $2,000,000 there; they will employ five hundred men; call the wages $1.25 per day, and the men would cost annually $227,400. Right there I want Senators to remember when they talk about the original cost of a ship that it counts as little as you can conceive. A first-class iron ship will wear fifty years. That is a loss of 2 per cent. per year. But your men alone on an English steamship will cost you $227,400 a year. The taxes will be 2 per cent. of the net income—call the net income 6 per cent.—that is $120,000, and the taxes on the English steamship line will be $2,400; interest on the capital at 4 per cent. will be $80,000; making $309,800 annually.

Now suppose you buy them in England and bring them to New York and run them under the American flag. They cost the sum of $2,000,000; no more. The pay of the men would be just 36 per cent. more, as shown by the figures, than the cost of men abroad. So that instead of $227,400 the cost of the men here would be $309,264, against $227,400 under the English flag.

Again, the taxes everywhere in this country, except in New York, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, would be from 2 to 3 per cent. of the value of the ship. Suppose on the Philadelphia line you put 2 per cent. tax, and it is $40,000 a year, and the English tax is what? Absolutely nothing, except on the income, amounting to $2,400 a year. Interest on the capital at 6 per cent. would be $120,000; making the whole $468,268, against the English $309,800, leaving a balance in favor of sailing the vessel under the English flag over and above the American flag of $158,464 annually.

Now, will the Senator from Kentucky tell me that any man is going to buy a 4,000-ton first-class ship to put onto an American line and run it with $158,000 annually against him, when he can buy it and run it under the English flag and save $158,000 a year? To-day you can buy all the ships you want and sail them under the English flag. Under their corporation law all that is required is for the president and directors to own just seven shares; the Senator from Ohio can own the other nine hundred and ninety-three shares and sail the ship where he pleases, and sail it under the English flag, and save $158,000 every year. Will he invest in an English ship and put it under the American flag? It is only patriotism that will lead him to adhere to his own ship built in his own country, and the moment he drops the patriotism and simply for mere love of gain goes and buys in the cheapest market of the world, that very moment he does not care whether he sails his ship under the American flag or a Dutch flag or a Spanish flag or a black flag.

Here let me state another thing. If that vessel sailed under the English flag Great Britain would pay to that line every year $360,000 for carrying the mail. What would you pay for carrying yours? You never paid over $58,000 for carrying the American mail across the ocean from New York to Liverpool. So there would be another advantage of $300,000 a year more just for keeping the line under the English flag. That makes $458,000 a year advantage to you to keep your ship under the English flag and out from under the American. Would any man buy it? Then, says the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Missouri, "Why are you making a fuss about it? What harm will it do if nobody will buy?" Mr. President, I will try to show what in my opinion the harm will be. Great Britain commenced building iron ships forty years ago. There are more than four hundred iron ships in Great Britain to-day that are out of model, out of practical use, out of decent machinery. If you admit foreign ships to American register every one of them will be in your ports, old iron and steel, delivered in less than two years, and broken up at once, and your free-traders will rejoice in such an opportunity to break down the iron industry of Pennsylvania.

Again, there was an investigation made within the last six months of the English iron merchant marine, and an engineer reported to Parliament that there were five hundred unseaworthy iron steamers employed in the merchant marine of Great Britain. The report was made to Parliament, and it was discovered that these unseaworthy iron steamers were sinking every few days, and that the insurance companies were paying twice what they were worth. It did not take long for the English people to learn that unseaworthy iron ships were simply great coffins for the sailors, and Mr. Chamberlain, a member of the English Parliament, about two months ago introduced a bill the effect of which would be to declare these four or five hundred ships unseaworthy, put them out of work; and another clause of his bill provides that no claimant who lost such a ship should be permitted to recover more than the value of the ship of any insurance company, no matter how much the policy that he took. I hold in my hand a report made by the secretary of the British board of trade on the commercial shipping bill of Mr. Chamberlain. I want to read a few words that he says:

> Last year the deaths by drowning were 1 in 83, instead of 1 in 60. The mention of 1 in 60 was originally made by Mr. Chamberlain at a time when the last return showed that to be the case for the previous year, and those same figures have since been repeated with perfect accuracy as the figures of loss for one year. As a matter of fact, the return recently published shows that the number of seamen who lost their lives by drowning was 1 in 60 in 1881 and 1 in 83 in 1883; and of those who lost their lives by drowning or other accidents while on service was 1 in 56 in 1881 and 1 in 75 in 1882. But the precise number for any one year is not the material point. The important facts are that the loss of life is deplorably large, and that while it fluctuates from year to year it shows no permanent or steady diminution, but rather the reverse. From the return above referred to it appears, as stated in my letter of the 1st instant to your predecessor, that the number of seamen who have met with a violent death by drowning or otherwise has during the last twelve years ranged from 1 in 91 to 1 in 56 of the whole number employed; that 1881 was the most fatal year of the twelve; and that, dividing the whole period of twelve years into four successive periods of three years each, the percentage of men drowned or otherwise killed on service was greater during the last period than in any of the earlier periods. It also appears that during the twelve years comprised in the return about 1 in 6 of the number denoting the average strength of the merchant service of the United Kingdom died by a violent death in the course of his employment. In other words, supposing the average of a man's employment at sea to be twenty-four years, one out of every three may expect to have his life cut short by a violent death.

This was a report made to Parliament to show the unseaworthiness of the iron ships in the English merchant marine. If Chamberlain's bill passes the English Parliament you can buy those four hundred ships for half what they are worth. What are they worth? They will be good to bury your sailors in. If you have so many bad sailors as the Senator from Kentucky tells about you can get rid of them at the rate of one in fifty every year if under your free-trade bill you should buy those four hundred unseaworthy ships and admit them to American registry, and then let the speculators sell them if they pleased.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a question?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am troubled a good deal about this matter, and the Senator from Maine does not seem to help me out, and before he departs from the branch of the subject he is discussing I should like to have him throw more light upon it.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Maine both agree, as I understand the Senator from Maine to admit one proposition, that a reform of the law is needed in order that a ship-owner may ship his seamen wherever he may find them and may contract with them, and not be compelled to unship and reship them in an American port because they are sailing under the American flag. Both agree upon the remedy. Both agree, if I understand the Senator from Maine aright, as to the repeal of the present law. Both propose to vote for that repeal. Now, if a ship, whether it is built here or purchased abroad, is put under the American flag with that law repealed, why can not the ship-owner ship his seamen abroad under contract the same as a foreign ship-owner can? Then why does the Senator from Maine say that there is any longer 36 per cent. more cost in the question of wages, when he himself has reported a bill which removes that difference in cost?

Again, while I am on my feet, let me refer to the fact that the Senator from Maine brings up the case that we shall be purchasing old rotten ships belonging to British ship-owners. I want to ask that Senator why a seaman will ship on one of those old rotten ships at $20 a month instead of going upon a perfect ship built by Mr. Cramp and demanding $40 a month? Upon one ship his life is perfectly safe; he has comforts; he is better fed a great deal than the foreign ship-owners feed sailors. He has every advantage on earth on board the American ship over what he has on the foreign ship.

Mr. FRYE. This is a little too much——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will stop.

Mr. FRYE. I am pretty good-natured, but I am getting too many speeches into mine. I am apt to forget. I beg the Senator to understand that the Senator from Missouri votes for the two clauses for one reason, and I for an entirely different reason.

Mr. McPHERSON. I care nothing about the reasons, but I ask for results. I want to know this: If a man is privileged to hire his men under contract and wherever he can hire them the cheapest, I claim that it would make no difference (and no man can convince me to the contrary) whether the ship is owned by an American or by an Englishman.

Mr. FRYE. Then the Senator from New Jersey does not know anything about sailors. You may hire your crew in Liverpool for ten years, put them under contract and have them sign papers, put them on board ship, have the right under your law to keep them on the ship for ten years, and I guarantee that the first time they come into the city of New York they will every one of them desert and you have to hire them over again. The Senator from Missouri has a remedy which will not remedy it a particle, and when you hire them over again you have to pay them American wages.

Mr. VEST. Suppose they are under a written contract for a round trip; under our laws as they stand if a sailor violates his contract he can not recover one dollar of back wages, and he is bound to forfeit them. If the contract is made in Liverpool for three months or for a round trip and they jump in New York or Philadelphia, they lose their back pay.

Mr. FRYE. I have yet to know what a sailor can not do. I have had some experience with sailors myself, and I should like to know anything they can not do. In the first place, they have a boarding-house keeper who is more powerful than the master of the ship; he is more powerful than the whole United States Army so far as that ship is concerned. That boarding-house keeper has three or four sailor-lawyers, and every sailor who comes into port has his sailor-lawyer, and he can do as he pleases, and he will do as he pleases. While I think those clauses are right, and while I know they will prevent a great deal of mischief, while they will be a relief, I am not so sanguine as to believe they will have the full effect supposed.

Mr. President, I am sorry I am talking so long. I did not intend to make a speech, but must say something about another thing. I say these miserable ships can be bought, and they will be bought, because you can not run under the American flag a new ship properly built. Now, I say another thing, that American Senators ought to look at it carefully before they decide to vote for "free ships." We are apt to talk as if we had no ships, and you would judge from an ordinary discussion in Congress that there was no such thing as an American ship to-day; that it was a played-out thing. Why, Mr. President, we have the finest coastwise trade in size, in ships, in material, in men, in officers, in discipline, in comfort, in convenience, in prosperity that there is in this whole world; and we have it because of "the infamous navigation laws" that the Senator from Kentucky talks about, and had it not been for "the infamous navigation laws" we should have had no more carrying trade on our coastwise ships than we have to-day upon the ocean. England protected hers for a century.

We had tried from 1806 down to get the right to carry our cargoes and our vessels into English ports and the ports of her colonies, and she shut her doors tight against us. We authorized twice the President of the United States by proclamation to open our ports to ships and to cargoes in order to induce England to open hers, and she refused. In 1849, Mr. Bancroft being our minister and Mr Polk our President, the proposition was made again to England to open her ports. It was accepted, and in 1850 the United States and England reciprocated in the opening of their ports to vessels and cargoes, but both reserved their coastwise trade, and if we had not been fortunate enough to have our eyes open and to have reserved the coastwise trade Canada, would have been doing to-day the whole.

I want to read here what Mr. John Roach says about the coastwise trade. The Senator from Missouri smiles. I am delighted that the Senator from Missouri in speaking of John Roach the other day did it with the utmost respect. He did not charge, as I have heard Senators and members of the House charge, that John Roach was a robber and dishonest, ever contriving to cheat the United States Government. He admitted that the only trouble with him was that he stood a bulwark between him, the Senator from Missouri and men like the Senator, and American labor, American ships, and the American marine. John Roach has been more abused since I have been in Congress than any man I know of except the Secretary of the Navy. I do not know of anything bad done by him except that he was born in Ireland, and that surely is not against him. He was a poor boy, too, and he did not become a hoodlum. He went to school; he worked; he became a mechanic. He did not keep a corner grocery in New York city and run Democratic ward politics. He never did that. He still worked; and to-day John Roach by his own exertions, his own ability, his own industry, has the largest ship-building establishment in the United States of America, employing 3,000 men, and he feeds every year well, and clothes well, and educates well, and houses well over 15,000 people. Will the Secretary please read what John Roach says about the coastwise trade?

The Secretary read as follows:

OUR COAST-TRADE PROGRESS.

3. To show that capital can be obtained when there is a fair chance in the competition, let me call your careful attention to what we have done in the development of our coast carrying trade. This has exceeded, under protection, even our unparalleled progress in manufacturing industries. The history of the world does not show so vast a development as that of our coasting trade in the last ten years.

Look at the figures. Counting in the contracts already in hand that can not be completed until 1882, in the ten years from 1872 we have built 140 iron screw-steamships, of a total tonnage of 260,000 tons. We have also built 25 wooden screw-steamers, of 27,563 tons. This makes a total steam tonnage built for our coasting and foreign trade of nearly 290,000—260,000 tons of it iron steamships; while in 1870 there did not exist in this country the rolling-mills and ship-yards required to construct an iron ship such as we have to-day.

Referring for comparison to the ocean-going steam tonnage of the world in 1860, we find that it consisted of 338 steamers, with tonnage of 431,000, divided as follows:

Nation.	Number.	Tonnage.
Great Britain	156	250,000
United States	52	71,000
All other nations	130	150,000
Total	338	431,000
Ocean-going steam tonnage built in United States since 1872.	145	257,563

What a grand showing this is! We have built in ten years more steam ocean-going tonnage than England possessed in 1860, though she began to build the iron ship in 1840, and had liberally encouraged the establishment of ship-yards, paying millions yearly in contracts to induce the investment of capital in the foreign carrying trade.

More than that. In these ten years we have built four times as much steam tonnage as we owned in 1860, while that was made up of old side-wheelers not fit for ocean carrying, and have built considerably more than one-half as much steam tonnage as was owned by the world in 1860. The ships are first class, and their carrying capacity is equal to 772,659 tons of sail, the most approved estimates, based on experience, making one ton of steam equal in carrying capacity to three tons of sail.

Besides this, we now have in the foreign trade 80,000 tons of iron screw-steamers, or ten times more than we had in 1860.

THE RIGHT KIND OF A "DECLINE."

France and Germany made no increase of steam tonnage to compare with ours, though they had all the advantages of buying free ships of England (an advantage which the free-ship man claims would have done so much to gain for us a foreign carrying trade), while we labored under all the disadvantages of starting a new business when the financial condition of the country was unsettled, when gold was at a premium, and when for a part of the time there was great business depression and distress.

What has been the result, and what is the advanced condition of the iron-ship building interest worth to us to-day? Had we possessed these one hundred and twenty steamships in 1861 we could have thoroughly blockaded our coast and have brought the rebellion to a close within a year. Through our present facilities we should be able to construct a similar fleet in much less time.

Then, again, the building of this fleet has reduced the freight rates in the coasting trade nearly 50 per cent. since 1870, and our coasting fleet is superior to the steam fleet of any country except England. How is this, do you ask? Why, we protected the coasting trade the same as we did our manufactures, and so saved it; and the result is that the country has a better fleet to meet an emergency with than it ever had before. What a benefit this reduction has been to our own people, and yet it has been produced by competition among ourselves.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I allude thus to the coastwise trade and undertake to show its immense power to-day. It is stronger to-day than it was in 1861. In the event of a war we have a more powerful fleet of ships to-day in our coastwise trade than we had in the coastwise trade and on the ocean too in 1861, better manned, better equipped, better prepared for any emergency, and they are iron steamers too, built in the United States, better ships than England builds. Why, Mr. President, the Alameda, which sails from San Francisco to the Sandwish Islands, of 3,000 tons burden, is a better ship in every respect than England has to-day in her merchant marine—not larger but better—and our ships will compare with any in the world. Take these lines: the Spreckles line, two ships; Pacific Mail, six ships; the Oregon Navigation Company, six ships; the Brazilian line, three ships; New York and Savannah, six ships; Morgan line, six; Old Dominion, six; Boston and New York, three; Philadelphia line, four; Texas line, six; New York and Charleston, five; Alexander line, five; Cromwell line, five. There are some fifty iron steamers, averaging 3,000 tons burden, the best ships to-day in the world.

What does the "free-ship" clause propose to do with that? The Senator from Kentucky is cunning. He damns the navigation laws, but says that he will not interfere with them. I say that no man on earth will buy an English ship without the privilege, when it is under American register, of sailing her where he pleases. Are you going to buy an English ship, land in New Orleans, and if you want to go to New York can not be permitted to do it, when if you had an American ship under the American flag you could sail it anywhere? Are you going to do that? You can not find a man who will do it. And the very moment you enact a law admitting foreign ships to American registry, you will enact another law giving them the full benefits of American registry. If you do one, you must the other. If you have bought a foreign ship and paid for her, you are an American citizen, the flag floats over her. Why shall you not have the same right that I have who simply buy a ship of a builder? Why shall you stop at New Orleans and I sail my ship from New Orleans to New York? No, Mr. President, the logical result is that you repeal your whole navigation laws, you open up your coastwise trade, and in a few years more that will go where your foreign trade has gone.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that it is getting late, and evidently the speech he is making can not be finished to-day. If he will give way I will move an adjournment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator from New York to make a motion for an executive session instead of an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to either Senator for that purpose?

Mr. FRYE. I am entirely ashamed to have been betrayed into making this speech. I certainly did not intend to take ten minutes when I rose, but I have been talking a good deal longer than I intended, and have said so much now that I must touch some other questions. I will yield.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I ask leave to make a report at this time from the Committee on Appropriations.

I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes. I desire to give notice that at the earliest moment consistent with the pending business I shall call up the bill for action.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 30, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capitol National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair.

IMPROVEMENT OF GRAND RIVER, MICHIGAN.

Mr. MAYBURY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish this House at the earliest day practicable such plans and estimates as he may have in his possession, and not heretofore submitted to Congress, for the improvement of Grand River below Grand Rapids, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. MAYBURY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER AT LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. PETERS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 581) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the city of Leavenworth be taken from the House Calendar and put upon its passage. As the bill is somewhat lengthy, I ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the report be read.

Mr. BLAND. I think the bill had better be read.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLAND. I think this bill is too important to be considered in this hasty way.

Mr. MORRILL. This bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce. I hope the gentleman will not press his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. I object.

CANNON, TENTS, ETC., FOR REUNION PURPOSES.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask unanimous consent that the House now take up for consideration and put upon its passage, with an amendment which I am directed by that committee to submit, the joint resolution (H. Res. 209) granting the use of cannon, tents, and muskets to ex-Union soldiers for reunion purposes.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to withhold the right to object until an explanation is made. I would like my friend from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] to inform us whether there are any condemned cannon on hand now.

Mr. ROSECRANS. There are a good many condemned cannon now on hand of a size not adapted to the purposes for which these cannon are usually asked. There are many applications to Congress, and many bills passed, for the granting of condemned cannon. Now it is possible that at some time some of these people may want some of these condemned cannon which are so large that usually nobody wants them. In order to put an end to all applications to Congress for legislation of this kind we propose by an amendment, which we submit as a second section, to authorize the Secretary of War to let any one have such condemned cannon as are on hand upon proper presentation of the case.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have seen it stated from official sources that there are now no condemned cannon on hand, and that in order to comply with these different bills and resolutions passed in Congress donating condemned cannon it would be necessary for the Government to appropriate money for the manufacture of cannon for this purpose. I wish my friend to state whether he has personal knowledge that there are on hand any condemned cannon which can be used for this purpose.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The Committee on Military Affairs had occasion to address to the Secretary of War an inquiry on this subject, and received in reply a statement to the effect that there are on hand no condemned cannon of small size which are not covered by bills or resolutions of Congress already passed. But there are a great many condemned cannon of larger size, which possibly might be wanted by some of these people who are coming to us with applications of this kind. In order to cover the whole ground, the committee decided to report as an amendment to this joint resolution a second section authorizing the Secretary of War, should such a desire be expressed, to meet these applications by furnishing these cannon of larger size. There are now 300,000 pounds of condemned cannon of large size which might be used in meeting these applications. I know it is not very likely that there will be requests for such cannon.

Mr. BUCKNER. As I understand, these cannon have been condemned as worthless, so far as the purposes of the Government are concerned?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then, why not sell them and get rid of them? Why should the Government go into this business of lending or giving away its property?

Mr. ROSECRANS. This resolution is simply in furtherance of the previous legislation of Congress on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to make the resolution clear, the words "in his discretion" should be inserted after the word "authorized."

Mr. ROSECRANS. I am willing to accept that amendment. That language ought to be inserted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to explain the reason why I do not object, and I hope I will be permitted to state it. My object in calling out this information was to ascertain, in the first place, whether this bill was intended to prevent future bills coming in asking for condemned cannon which do not exist. As the gentleman from California explained it, I do not object to the passage of the resolution, although I doubt whether any cannon will be given under it.

Mr. CASSIDY. It is only a general proposition to take the place of numerous special bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the first question will be on the amendments reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendments are to insert after the word "authorized" the words "in his discretion;" so the section will read:

That on and after the passage of this joint resolution the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion, on the application of the governor of any State, to send from some convenient fort, depot of supply, or arsenal, to any place in such State as may be designated by the governor, to be used at a reunion of ex-veteran Union soldiers or State military organization, the ex-veteran Union soldiers always having the preference, such cannon, tents, and muskets as can be spared, all cost of forwarding and returning such property to be paid by the applicant therefor, the same to be returned in as good condition as when received.

Add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That on the application of the governor of any State the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to such State for the permanent use of organizations of veteran soldiers or for monumental purposes such condemned cannon belonging to the United States as now or hereafter may be on hand, all cost of forwarding same to be paid by the applicant therefor, and that the distribution be made as nearly as possible among the States making such application.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARATOGA MONUMENT.

Mr. WEMPLE. I move, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3327) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument, for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOK. I object.

PROMOTION IN SIGNAL CORPS.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask by unanimous consent that the House Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 179) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint from the sergeants of the Signal Corps two second lieutenants, and that it be put on its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have heard a statement in regard to this measure, and it occurs to me that the legislation proposed is of a proper character. I hope, however, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] having charge of the bill will explain to the House its exact purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to reserve his right to object.

Mr. CLARDY. The act of Congress approved June 20, 1878, contains this language, "and the enlisted force of the Signal Corps shall consist of one hundred and fifty sergeants, thirty corporals, and two hundred and seventy privates, who shall receive the pay of engineer soldiers of similar grades, and two sergeants may in each year be appointed to be second lieutenants."

For the years 1879 and 1880 these promotions were made in pursuance of this act. In 1881, the question whether the sergeants mentioned in this statute were sergeants of the Signal Corps proper or of the Army having arisen, it was submitted to the Attorney-General for his opinion. After considerable delay the Attorney-General rendered the opinion that the purpose of the statute was to make the promotions from the sergeants of the Signal Corps. Pending the determination of this question by the Attorney-General, however, the year expired and these promotions could not be made. Thus, without the fault of the officers of the Signal Service or of any person connected therewith, the benefit sought to be conferred by this statute was lost for the year 1881.

In a letter addressed by the Chief of the Signal Service to the Secretary of War he states that these promotions are essential to the efficiency of the service. That letter has received the indorsement of the Secretary of War; and I trust that with this explanation there may be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that statement I think this is a proper measure.

There was no objection, and the House Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 79) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint from the sergeants of the Signal Corps two second lieutenants.

Whereas the promotion of two sergeants of the Signal Corps to be second lieutenants not having been made for the year ending June 30, 1881, as authorized by law, because of a pending question as to the construction thereof: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint from the sergeants of the Signal Corps the two second lieutenants for that year, to rank from the date of appointment, the same as if the power to appoint had not lapsed.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to submit a report on the resolution referred to that committee by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FIEDLER], and to ask that the report be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the following resolution, offered on the 1st of April by Hon. Mr. FIEDLER:

"Whereas it is alleged that the financial departments of the District of Columbia have not been conducted in a proper and businesslike manner, and grave doubts exist as to the correctness of the accounts rendered, owing to the loose manner in which the books have been kept; and

"Whereas it is charged that the taxes have not been collected in strict conformity to law: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to have a thorough examination made of all accounts, &c., appertaining to the finances of the District of Columbia, and they are empowered to send for books and persons and to employ such expert accountants as they may deem necessary; all expenses arising from said investigation to be defrayed out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives"— have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

First. That the methods of bookkeeping in the financial departments of the District of Columbia, as introduced by the present auditor on the 1st day of November last and since enforced, are such as in the judgment of the committee, and of expert accountants consulted by them, will insure correctness in the accounts of those intrusted with the collection and disbursement of public moneys and their ready accountability therefor.

Secondly. That prior to the introduction of these new methods, and extending back for ten or more years, there has been no requirement of law and no provision in practice for securing a final and systematic audit and settlement of the books and accounts of the collector of taxes.

This failure in practice may have been due to imperfect methods of bookkeeping or to a lack of sufficient clerical force; but this it is not necessary to decide.

During these years many millions of dollars of public money have been collected, and the committee are of opinion that it was due both to the tax-payer and to the collector that at regular periods there should have been a full audit and settlement of the accounts of the collector's office.

To make such audit and settlement now would require an investigation and an amount of labor beyond the power of this committee to bestow. Yet they believe it should be undertaken and carried forward to completion as rapidly as is consistent with perfect accuracy. The committee find in the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia of March 3, 1883, an appropriation of $2,500 for temporary clerk-hire to enable the auditor, among other things, to audit the books of the collector of taxes. Under that authority the auditor has brought down these books from 1860 to 1865, and he informs the committee that if this appropriation is continued he will, as rapidly as the magnitude of the work and the requirements of accuracy will permit, continue this examination down to the date of the introduction of the new system of bookkeeping above mentioned.

As already stated, many millions of dollars have been collected as taxes. The commissioners of the District of Columbia report that on the 1st day of July, 1883, there were due and unpaid nearly three-quarters of a million of dollars of delinquent taxes, and of special-assessment taxes over one million and a half.

It is clear, without reflecting upon any one, that officers charged with administering such immense sums of public money should, at regular and frequent intervals, be required to balance their accounts and make such exhibit and settlement thereof as will satisfy all interested that they have faithfully accounted for every dollar with which they are legally chargeable.

The books yet unaudited cover the transactions of half a score or more years, many of them years of heavy taxation and extraordinary revenues. This committee could not undertake to examine them even by calling to its assistance competent experts, but they believe that this very necessary work should be done, and that it can now be most efficiently and economically continued on the basis already laid by the auditor. They accordingly recommend that the Committee on Appropriations be authorized and directed to add to the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, already reported to the House, a provision of the same tenor and effect as the item in the bill of last year, making an appropriation of the necessary amount for temporary clerk-hire to enable the auditor to audit the books of the collector of taxes, and that the auditor be authorized and directed to continue such audit on the basis of the examination and audit already made and verified until the same is completed, and to report the result thereof from time to time to the commissioners for the information of Congress.

COLUMBUS F. PERRY AND ELIZABETH H. GILMER.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 767, for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, and ask that the same be passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer $3,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust we shall have the reading of the report or an explanation, or both.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, there is a House bill precisely in the language of the Senate bill except that there is a preamble attached to it. That has been passed upon by the Committee on Claims of this House and unanimously reported. The claim originated in the following manner: Elizabeth Gilmer, in the State of Alabama, in 1866, made a conveyance of a plantation to her stepson, Columbus F. Perry. He received the deed, but did not take possession of the property. There were objections made by those who were nearly related to her which were likely to produce some difficulty in the family, and Mr. Perry decided that he would not accept the estate and made a reconveyance of it to Mrs. Gilmer. Under the statute subjecting such conveyances to a succession tax the internal-revenue collector required them to pay and they did pay under protest $2,220 upon each of the two conveyances covering the property, making $4,440 in all. Upon appeal to the Treasury Department it was decided that the sum was excessive and it was reduced to $3,000.

Now, the committee, not only of the Senate but the Senate itself, which passed the bill, and the House committee have decided that the conveyance was not in fact accepted by Mr. Perry, and therefore they recommend that the money be refunded to him. That is the whole statement of the case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEACH. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURN. I hope the gentleman from New York will withhold his call until I can introduce a resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which should be promptly acted upon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am satisfied if the gentleman from New York knew the purpose for which the gentleman from Minnesota asks him to withhold his demand for the regular order he would not insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not withdraw his demand, as the Chair understands.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Before submitting that motion the Chair desires to lay before the House an executive communication.

PUBLIC ADVERTISING, NEW YORK HERALD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the advertising done by the New York Herald for the United States Treasury, as a substitute for the statement furnished February 4, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PENSION BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

On motion of Mr. MATSON, pension bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, namely:

A bill (S. 280) granting a pension to Wesley Morford;

A bill (S. 316) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharina T. Wunsh;

A bill (S. 394) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Major D. Williams;

A bill (S. 626) to increase the pension of Francis Scott;

A bill (S. 689) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Barbour;

A bill (S. 732) for the relief of Mary J. Vaughan;

A bill (S. 783) to increase the pension of John Algoe;

A bill (S. 828) granting a pension to Thomas Patton;

A bill (S. 909) to increase the pension of Martin Kelly;

A bill (S. 1299) to increase the pension of Alonzo B. Chatfield;

A bill (S. 1680) granting a pension to George Prince; and

A bill (S. 1910) granting a pension to William McClure.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I now move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills for raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the tariff bill under consideration is put forward by its advocates as a first step in a policy which has for its aim the overthrow of every protective element in our tariff legislation. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON], who stands as the author of the bill, announced that—

It is but an advance toward and a promise of more complete revenue reform.

The distinguished Speaker of the House [Mr. CARLISLE] explained to the New York Free Trade Club, who received his explanation with cheers, that—must go on until the power of taxation is used * * * only for the purpose of raising revenue.

This process of reformation—

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] and his colleague [Mr. MILLS], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] were still more explicit, and announced that free trade is the end aimed at, and the pending bill only a temporary stage in the grand scheme of "revenue reform," by which they mean the abolition of every tariff duty which works protectively.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I claim to be a revenue reformer. I should be pleased at any time to vote for a bill to abolish or reduce duties on certain articles which are not properly adjusted. I am in favor of such true revenue reform as will abolish duties on all products of foreign countries not grown or made here which enter into the consumption of the masses, such as coffee, tea, jute, tin, &c.; in favor of such true revenue reform as will reduce duties on all imported articles entering into common use as can not, so far as has been shown, be produced here advantageously to the extent of our consumption, like sugar, rice, &c. Such "reform" as this will reduce the revenue. The so-called "revenue reform" to which those will be committed who support the pending bill does not propose to place on the free-list articles not produced in this country, like jute. Neither does it confine its operations to articles which can bear even greater reductions than those proposed. It does, however, apply the knife relentlessly to industries which are capable of supplying the entire consumption of our people, and whose maintenance by protective duties is a great public advantage, and gives assurance that the cutting is to be continued, on the principle that the Government has no right to impose a duty in such a manner as will bridge over the difference in cost between manufacturing such articles in this country and in Europe. I opposed the consideration of this bill, and shall continue to vote in such a way as will aid in securing its defeat, because I am opposed to the anti-protection principle on which it is based and which it proposes to inaugurate, and because, further, I believe it will increase the revenue by encouraging importations of cottons, woolens, and iron and leather manufactures, and be injurious to the best interests of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the issue raised by this bill is whether our tariff legislation in the future shall be adjusted with a view not only of revenue, but also of protecting home industries against the unequal competition of foreign industries employing cheaper labor, or whether it shall be adjusted so as to exclude protection solely with the view of revenue.

There has been a disposition on the part of some persons who denounce protective tariffs to evade this issue by claiming that a tariff for revenue only will afford adequate protection so long as we have so much revenue to raise for imports, or that a tariff for revenue only may be so adjusted as to "incidentally protect" home industries. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], who spoke of those holding this view as "incidental allies" of protection, recognized the fact that it is impossible for a duty for revenue only, levied on imported articles which may be produced at home to the extent of our wants, to afford protection to home industries; for when a duty begins to protect it enables home manufacturers to sell their goods in our markets and thus diminishes importations and lessens the revenue.

For example, when it costs 35 per cent. more to manufacture an article here than it costs abroad, a duty of 35 per cent. or more will protect our home industries and reduce importations and the revenue from the same. Reduce the duty 10 per cent., and this reduction will enable foreign manufacturers to more than double their exportations of goods to take the place of home-made goods in our markets, and this increase of importations will largely increase the revenue. In this instance a duty of 35 per cent. or more would be a protective duty, and a duty of 25 per cent. or less a duty for revenue only. It is because of this fact that the reduction of duties proposed by the Morrison bill on cotton, woolen, and iron goods will increase the revenue.

The key-note of all the speeches which have been made in support of the Morrison bill and in opposition to a protective tariff is the claim that protection is a device for the sole benefit of manufacturers and a serious burden to all other citizens.

Mr. Chairman, if this charge be true, then it is not a half-way measure like the pending bill that ought to pass, but a measure which shall at once overthrow the whole protective system and substitute a tariff for revenue only, which is what England means by free trade. If, on the contrary, the protective system has given our country unexampled prosperity and benefited all classes, as protectionists claim, then this House and the country should reject the bill under consideration, and call a halt in the free-trade programme inaugurated by this measure.

PROFITS OF MANUFACTURERS.

To sustain the charge that protection is a system of "robbery" in the interest of manufacturers, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], in his recent speech, alleged that the census of 1880 shows that the profits of our lumber manufacturers are 30 per cent. and the profits of other manufacturing industries are 36 per cent. He reached this conclusion by deducting from the value of manufactured products only the amount paid in wages and for materials, and calling the balance the net profit of the manufacturer. He ignored the fact that the year 1879–'80, immediately following the resumption of specie payments, was exceptionally remunerative. The average balance remaining after deducting wages and materials from product has not exceeded 20 to 27 per cent. during the past ten years.

Not content with this, my friend from New York shut his eyes to the fact that in order to ascertain the net profit of the manufacturer there must be deducted from the census figures the cost of insurance, taxes, depreciation of plant, repairs, freight, commissions, salaries of superintendents and clerks, interest on money borrowed to carry on operations, &c., amounting, as I am informed by a practical manufacturer, to an average of 20 per cent., reaching 25 per cent. in some instances, and not falling below 15 per cent. in any manufacturing industry.

The net profit of the manufacturers of the country for the last ten years have probably not averaged 8 per cent. on the capital invested. Returns of dividends paid by a hundred manufacturing establishments in New England for this period show dividends averaging only 6.6 per cent. During the past year the majority of the mills of New England have made nothing.

Inasmuch as all manufacturing industries in this country are open to the investment of capital from the whole world, it is certain that competition will keep down the profits to the average of all other kinds of business. To talk of manufacturers as "monopolists" or "robbers," under such circumstances, is an abuse of language and an insult to the intelligence of our people.

Protection is not intended to benefit capital, except so far as capital is benefited by general prosperity. Capital as such can easily go where it will secure the largest profits. If any industry can be carried on more profitably in Europe than here, capital will go there for investment. If it can be carried on more profitably in this country, it will come here. We encourage the investment of capital here rather than elsewhere, because the industries thus created promote general prosperity.

When tariffs are so reduced as to admit foreign goods at a lower price, or when any other cause leads to temporary overproduction or underconsumption, capital will protect itself here as it protects itself in other countries, by either shutting down mills or cutting down wages. Nothing can prevent that. The only check on reduction of wages is that afforded by the average rate of wages prevailing in the country, and this average rate rises or falls with the demand for labor, and the demand for labor, as I shall presently show, is increased by the diversification of industries made possible by protection. Therefore, while protective duties which prevent foreign-made goods from coming in to take the place of home productions result in a general advantage to all classes, yet the special benefit inures to labor.

WAGES OF WORKINGMEN.

Nothing more conclusively demonstrates that the workingman receives immensely larger real recompense for his labor in this country than in Europe than the fact that so many thousands of the people of every nation of Europe are annually coming to our shores to find opportunities for employment, while hardly one of our citizens seeks to improve his condition by going abroad.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and other gentlemen opposed to protection deny this, and to sustain their denial call attention to the fact that the census statistics show that the average wages of employés in manufacturing and mechanical industries was in 1880 only $1.16 per day, from which they desire us to infer that protective duties do not benefit labor.

If the gentleman had informed us that this average of $1.16 per day includes the wages of women and children as well as men employed not only in factories but in all the light industries, that the average wages of men in all the manufacturing industries was about $1.50 per day, and that these wages are on an average 50 per cent. higher than those paid in similar industries in free-trade England, comment would have been unnecessary.

Surely on this point the gentleman will accept the testimony of his distinguished colleague [Mr. HEWITT], late chairman of the Democratic national committee, who, in a speech in this Hall at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, said:

As between Great Britain and the United States, the rate of wages is on the average about 50 per cent. higher here than there.

This was not a random statement by the distinguished gentleman, but was based on official tables of wages in the two countries, to whose accuracy he bore witness. As these tables were printed by Mr. HEWITT as an appendix to his speech, I suggest to my friend [Mr. COX] that he read them in connection with the census figures on which he has dwelt with so much pathos and eloquence.

It is often claimed, however, that the 50 per cent. higher wages in the United States is overcome by the increased cost of living here. But the statistical tables of the prices of articles entering into the consumption of a family in England and the United States, which Mr. HEWITT gives in connection with his speech, shows conclusively that the average cost of such articles is on the whole but little if any higher here than abroad. Flour, meal, meat, vegetables, coffee, tea, and nearly all food products, except sugar and rice, are cheaper here than in Europe. Common white cotton cloth is as cheap here as there. Common woolen goods, boots and shoes, iron and tin utensils, and rents are a little higher here than there. The cost of living of a laborer, who is content to subsist here as the laborer in Europe lives, is not over 10 per cent. more in this country than in England, while the wages here are on the average 50 per cent. more. The average purchasing power of wages in the United States, therefore, is 40 per cent. greater than in England.

DOES PROTECTION AFFECT WAGES?

The gentleman from New York, Mr. Chairman, concedes what can not be successfully controverted, that wages have a much higher purchasing power in this country than in Europe; but he claims that this is not in any manner due to our protective tariff, but to the fact that we have so cheap land and so abundant natural resources. In other words, he affirms that wages would be as high in this country under free trade as they are now under protection.

Wages, he correctly says, are determined by demand and supply. Whatever, therefore, encourages the establishment of new industries swells the demand for labor and increases wages. If protection builds up new manufacturing industries it enlarges the demand for labor, and in enlarging the demand increases wages. My friend must admit that.

There were in 1880 in this country 17,392,099 persons engaged in occupations. This grand roll represented our army of workers. Of this number 7,907,605 were engaged in agriculture, 4,074,238 in personal or professional services, 1,810,256 in trade and transportation, and 3,837,112 in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. There can be no question that if our manufacturing and mechanical establishments had not been built up, or if they should now be closed, the pressure of the 3,837,112 workmen employed in these industries, seeking opportunities for labor in other pursuits, would so seriously disturb the relations of demand and supply as to greatly reduce all wages.

ALL WAGE-WORKERS PROTECTED.

The gentleman talks about wages in protected industries and wages in non-protected industries. He seems to forget that an advance or decline of wages in one industry in a state or country is sooner or later followed by an advance or decline of wages in all other industries. So far as the wages of labor are concerned all industries are protected under our present system. The protection which builds up new industries, that require 20 per cent. of the laborers in this country, draws labor from every pursuit and raises wages in every other department of industry, the wages in each industry varying with the degree of skill required.

This is only what every member of this House has seen in his own experience. The establishment of a new industry in any community creates a demand for new workmen, makes labor scarcer, and stiffens wages in every employment. The day laborer asks and receives more, the mechanic is accorded an advance, and business generally receives a new impetus.

It may be true that many of the laborers in this country do not have any more surplus remaining after supporting their families than do laborers in Europe. But this is for the reason that they live more generously here, that they supply themselves with comforts and luxuries of life unknown to the European laborer, and that they educate their children to discharge the duties that will rest on them as citizens of a free country. But there is a large class of laborers who save something from their wages to buy homes, and sooner or later become employers themselves.

I have myself visited the miserable hovels in which so large a proportion of the laborers of Europe live, and have investigated their condition, as others in this presence have, and I can bear witness to the fact that the laboring men of the United States and their families are immeasurably better housed, better fed, better clad, and better educated. I rejoice, as every good citizen should rejoice, that such is the fact, not simply from motives of humanity, but also for the reason that the perpetuity and welfare of our Government are dependent on the elevation and education of every citizen.

In a recent report on the agricultural progress of the country, Mr. J. R. Dodge, the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, presented some striking facts on the wages of farm labor in the different States of the Union, which clearly illustrate the correctness of the principle that the introduction of manufacturing industries in a State increases the wages of laborers in every other pursuit. Mr. Dodge divides the States into four groups. In the first group, composed of fifteen States, in which manufacturing pursuits are extensive and well distributed, the wages of farm laborers average $25 per month and board; in the third group, composed of thirteen States, in which nearly 60 per cent. of the workers are on the farm and manufacturing industries rare, the wages of farm laborers average $19.50 per month; and in the fourth group, composed of six States, destitute of manufacturing industries, and with nearly 78 per cent. of their workers on farms, the wages of farm laborers average only $13.20 per month.

Wages of carpenters, masons, painters, and laborers of every kind are in similar proportion in these several groups of States. These facts show conclusively that whatever encourages the establishment and enlargement of manufacturing industries in our country increases the wages not only of the mill operative, but also of the blacksmith, the mason, the carpenter, the painter, the teamster—in short, of every man, woman, and child who has labor to sell. Our cheap lands afford opportunities for labor and unquestionably tend to make wages higher in this country than in Europe, but the figures given by Mr. Dodge show that our manufacturing industries, protected against the direct competition of the products of foreign labor, are as important a factor in maintaining good wages as our cheap lands. Lands are as cheap, even cheaper, in the fourth group of States described by Mr. Dodge than in the first; yet the wages of farm labor in the latter group, with extensive manufacturing industries, is $25 per month, and in the former group only $13.20 per month.

The effect of the development of manufactures in this country on the wages of labor is also strikingly shown by a reference to the census statistics. According to Mr. Carroll D. Wright's report on the factory system of the United States, the wages of cotton-mill operatives in 1815, after the first mill was started in this country, were only $1.50 per week. In 1836 the wages averaged $2.75 per week for women; in 1840 the wages averaged $3.50 for women and $5 for men; in 1860 the wages averaged $3.50 for women and $5.50 for men; in 1880 the wages averaged $4.84 for women and $7 for men; showing that wages rose with the development of manufacturing industries, which increased the demand for labor.

Comparing the wages of 1860, which ended thirteen years of tariff for revenue only, with those of 1880, after a little longer period of protection, Mr. Wright says in his census report:

In 1860 the average yearly wages in the United States for all men, women, and children in mills was $196; in 1880 it was $244. The average for 1880 varies for different parts of the United States, it being $258.42 in Massachusetts (where manufacturing was most extensive), $255.77 for Eastern States generally, $235.19 for the Middle States, $216.91 for the Western States, and $168.59 for the Southern States.

The advance of 28 per cent. in wages in this country between 1860 and 1880 is the direct result of the growth of manufacturing interests, which increased the demand for labor; and this growth of manufactures is due to the fact that our protective policy made it possible for us to successfully carry on manufacturing industries.

WOULD MANUFACTURES FLOURISH WITHOUT PROTECTION?

This brings me, Mr. Chairman, to a consideration of the claim of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that manufacturing industries would be as prosperous in this country without protective duties as with them.

This is a claim which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] and others have repeated, but which no one has attempted to prove. Remember that it has been shown that wages are in money values 50 per cent. higher and in purchasing power 40 per cent. higher in this country than in Europe. Will any one explain how manufacturing industries can be successfully carried on in this country if foreign goods are to be allowed to come in free of duty, or on the payment of less duty than the increased cost of making such goods here, on account of the fact that we pay so much more for the labor required to build mills and operate them? To be sure in the case of a few articles of which the raw material is the chief cost and labor an inconsiderable element, like coarse cottons, we might sustain ourselves; but in the case of most manufactured goods, into which skilled labor largely enters, we could not compete with foreign products unless the wages of labor should be reduced to the English standard.

I have conversed with manufacturers who were inclined to favor free trade, but I have always found that they based their hopes of successful competition with England under a tariff without protection on the assumption that free trade would reduce wages in this country to the European standard.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

Mr. Chairman, I occasionally find manufacturers who seem to think that free materials are what they ought to have, although most of them, like the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], confess the necessity of protective duties on such imported fabrics or goods as they produce. Certainly, even if wool were admitted free of duty, as cotton is, and if machinery could be imported without duty, it would be impossible for a woolen manufacturer in this country to pay 50 per cent. more for the labor required to build and run his mill and make his goods as cheaply as his English competitor. Free wool will not take away the necessity of a tariff on imported woolen manufactures in order to enable us to make such goods here.

Free ore, free scrap-iron, and free lime will not enable Mr. HEWITT to make and sell his bar-iron in free competition with his English competitor, who pays so much less for his labor, and to dispense with all protective duties on iron.

Indeed, our cotton manufacturers have their raw material, cotton, cheaper than their European competitors, and yet they are able to sell in foreign markets only the coarsest fabrics as low as European manufacturers. Fine goods, into which labor enters as an important element of cost, we can not produce as cheaply as foreign manufacturers simply because the labor required to build and run our mills costs more. In the progress of this debate it has been suggested that if we could only import our machinery free of duty we could then manufacture any class of cottons in free competition with English manufacturers. A prominent cotton manufacturer, noticing this statement, remarked to me that free machinery would not reduce the cost of making fabrics a thousandth part of a cent per yard.

It is true that free wool and free scrap-iron and free manufactured lumber and free lime would make lower duties afford sufficient protection to enable us to manufacture woolens, iron, and other articles in competition with foreign manufacturers, but this would not take away the necessity of protective duties on the manufactured product, and simply for the reason that the labor which we employ to convert the so-called "raw material" into a higher form of manufactures costs on an average 50 per cent. higher here than in England.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold that all raw materials which are not produced here, such as jute, dye-woods, and all natural products into which labor has not entered as a material element of value, like iron ore in the mine, unmanufactured logs, limestone, &c., ought to be on the free-list, as all but jute are. But so long as a duty is to be retained on bar-iron, woolens, sugars, and other articles, will any one tell me on what principle of fair dealing manufactured lumber, scrap-iron which takes the place of pig-iron, manufactured lime and wool, into which the labor of man has entered as a material element in their value, should not have a protective duty proportioned to the amount of labor required to bring these so-called "raw materials" to their existing condition?

Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] inform me on what principle of fair dealing he puts manufactured lumber on the free-list while he retains a duty of 40 per cent. on sugar? There went the round of the papers a short time ago a statement alleged to have been made by a distinguished Connecticut manufacturer, ex-Governor English, to the effect that what the manufacturers of this country desire is free raw materials, by which he meant free wool, free lime, free lumber, &c. Then he said they would be entirely satisfied with a duty of 25 per cent. on their manufactured goods. But does this gentleman suppose that the men who manufacture lumber and lime and other articles will consent to any protection that is not distributed on principles of equity? The "raw material" of one industry is the manufactured product of some other industry, and there is no such thing as "raw" materials upon which human labor has been expended.

EXPORTATION OF GOODS.

Much is said, Mr. Chairman, about the necessity of having free materials and a general reduction of duties in order that we may be able to export more goods.

I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that materials advanced to any point may now be imported under a law of 1799 almost without duty for the manufacture of articles for export; and there is a bill now before the Ways and Means Committee to make such materials entirely free, to which no one on this side will object. A woolen manufacturer may now import wool practically without duty for the manufacture of woolen goods for export. What is there, then, to prevent him from doing so? There is no export duty; no tariff stands in his way. Yet our Connecticut manufacturer who talks about the immense export trade he could command if the tariff was reduced and "free raw materials" granted does not come forward to avail himself of the privilege for eighty-five years. Why not?

The reason and the only reason that we do not export more manufactured goods is simply because the labor we employ in making our goods costs more than the labor employed by European manufacturers. A reduction of duties, even absolute free trade, would not aid us in increasing our exports of manufactured goods unless it reduced the wages of our workingmen; and that is what it would eventually do.

It would necessarily reduce the wages of labor for the reason that it would open up our markets—the best and most desirable in the world—to the manufactures of Europe. It would cripple and eventually close our mills until labor should be reduced to the English standard, would drive a large part of the three and a half millions of workingmen now employed in manufacturing and mechanical enterprises into other employments already filled, and by reducing the demand for labor and increasing the supply of laborers would in due time bring the wages of labor in this country down to the inadequate compensation paid in Europe.

IMMIGRATION.

It will not answer for my friend to say that the manufacturer in the United States may and does draw the cheap labor of Europe here without paying a duty on immigration, and, therefore, that we may as well have free trade in imported goods; for it is admitted that in spite of the fact that our policy has always been to welcome to our shores any virtuous and industrious immigrant who comes here as an independent man to better his situation, yet we pay here to immigrant as well as native, to all who desire to work, 50 per cent. higher wages than are paid in England. Labor contracts made in another country, which deprive an immigrant of perfect freedom when he lands here, ought to be prohibited as a rule. When the free immigrant strikes our shores he recognizes the fact that he is in a country where labor is entitled to higher wages than in Europe, and demands and receives the advance.

I met not long ago an immigrant who had come to this country from Ireland. I asked him how much was he receiving for the work he was doing. "One dollar a day," was the response. "And how much did you receive last year for similar work in Ireland," I asked. "A shilling a day (25 cents), and never in harvest-time more than two shillings a day, sir," he promptly replied.

Disturbances of business producing transient overproduction, or more usually underconsumption, and inducing severe competition among home producers, now and then compel a temporary reduction of wages; but how much greater would be the competition and reduction of wages if the free competition of foreign-made goods should be added? Indeed, as a rule free-trade England suffers more from such disturbances than do we in this country. During the past six months the distress in England on this account has been much greater than here. Those who propose to remedy such unavoidable evils by opening up our markets to foreign producers would immensely aggravate these difficulties and make them permanent.

MR. HEWITT ON VALUE OF PROTECTION.

No one has more clearly stated the benefits of a protective tariff to the workingman and to all other citizens than did the distinguished chairman of the Democratic national committee [Mr. HEWITT] in the following letter to Jay Gould:

NEW YORK, January 27, 1870.

The only reason why we pay more for American rails is because we pay a higher rate for the labor which is required for their manufacture, but for no greater quantity of labor. Free trade will simply reduce the wages of labor to the foreign standard, which will enable us to sell our rails in competition with foreign rails. But as a matter of course the ability of the laborer to consume will be reduced, and a serious loss will be inflicted on commerce, general industry, and the business of the railways especially. The only reason why a tariff is necessary is to supply the laborer with such wages as will enable him to travel and consume not merely the necessaries but some of the luxuries of modern civilization. Besides, if we have free trade we can not expect to procure our supplies from abroad by increased shipments of grain, for already the European markets take from us all that they require, and no amount of purchase of goods from them will induce them to buy more food than they need, and which they now take as a matter of necessity.

Faithfully yours,

ABRAM S. HEWITT.

JAY GOULD, Esq.

Mr. Chairman, no one could have stated the real reason of our inability to cope in foreign markets with the products of the cheap labor of other countries more clearly than did the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], who does me the honor of listening to my argument, in the letter above quoted. And inasmuch as some persons may suppose that the gentleman from New York has changed his views since 1870, I desire to call attention to the fact that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] read this same letter in the tariff discussion at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, only two years ago, Mr. HEWITT interrupted him to state that he had nothing in that letter to take back.

FREE TRADE AND SHIPPING.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], who have addressed the House in favor of free trade or a tariff for revenue only, have referred to the decline of American shipping from the point of prosperity reached in 1855 as an illustration on the one hand of the claim that free trade fosters and on the other hand that "protection by act of Congress" chills our industrial prosperity.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the condition of American shipping affords a complete demonstration of a truth exactly the reverse of what my friends from New York and Ohio have claimed. It affords a most striking illustration of the fact that protection is necessary in order to maintain American industry; and that whenever free trade has been applied to any one, foreign competitors employing cheaper labor have been enabled to distance us.

I ask gentlemen to remember that that branch of the American merchant marine which has been "protected by act of Congress," namely, our coastwise fleet, is prosperous notwithstanding the unexampled extension of competing railroads which have inevitably seized upon much of the freight that formerly went to vessels; while, on the other hand, that part of our commercial marine employed in our foreign carrying trade which has had no protection by law since the vessels of Great Britain were admitted in 1849 to participate in this trade on equal terms, and no protection by natural conditions since the transition from wood to iron in ship-building and from sails to steam in ship propulsion, about 1855, has steadily declined from the latter date.

I call the attention of the gentleman to the official statistics. These statistics show that, computing by the accepted rule that one ton of steam is equal in efficiency to three of sail, the tonnage of our coastwise marine was in 1869 the equivalent of 4,300,892 tons of sail, and that in 1883 it had increased to the equivalent of 5,415,970 tons of sail. This is a growth of 25 per cent. in fourteen years, and shows a tonnage three times that of the home fleet of the United Kingdom and five times that of any other country. So much as the result of effective protection by law "against foreign competition."

It is noteworthy also that the ultimate effect of this protection has been to make the freight charges of our coastwise marine lower than those of the home fleet of any other nation, thus demonstrating that protection eventually lightens the burdens of the people.

If our coastwise carrying trade had been opened to the free competition of the world, as our foreign carrying trade has been, and as free-trade doctrinaires desired it should be, the American merchant marine in the home trade would have been to-day in the same deplorable condition as that in the foreign trade.

The complete discomfiture of our commercial marine in the foreign trade since every kind of protection was removed affords an instructive illustration of what would befall our manufacturing industries if the principle of free trade should be applied to them. In 1855, 75½ per cent. of our exports and imports were carried in American vessels; in 1860 the percentage had declined to 66½ per cent.; during the four years of civil war we lost 38 per cent.; and last year our percentage was only 16 per cent.

The distinguished gentlemen affirmed that the protective tariff has strangled our foreign carrying trade by crippling our foreign commerce, and thus depriving our vessels of cargoes. If the gentlemen had consulted the official statistics they would have found that our exports and imports, which measure our foreign commerce, increased twice as much during the fifteen years between 1865 and 1880 under protection as they did in a similar period before the war under tariffs for revenue only. If our merchant marine in the foreign trade had grown with our foreign commerce its tonnage to-day would have been more than four times what it actually is.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] asserted that we could make markets for our grain and other products with other nations only by breaking down our protective system, which encourages home manufactures, and buying their products in return, and he affirmed that by so doing we should provide freights for our vessels.

This theory, like many other free-trade theories, is not sustained by the facts. We bought last year $65,544,534 of Cuban products, but we could sell them only $15,103,703 of our own products. We imported from Brazil in the same year products of that country valued at $44,448,459, but we exported to the same country only $9,252,094 of our own products. On the other hand, we exported to the United Kingdom $425,424,174 of our own products and imported only $188,622,619 of English products. This shows that international trade is not a system of barter, but each nation buys where it can buy cheapest. If England can buy wheat of us as cheap as in Russia or India, she purchases here, without regard to what we purchase of her.

I call the especial attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that the carrying trade which has been most completely snatched from our grasp is that between Europe and America, where the cargoes each way are more than five times as large as they were before the war.

The fact is, and it is surprising any one should shut his eyes to the situation, that while our exports and imports have increased with wonderful rapidity, the transportation of 84 per cent. of this great and expanding commerce has been secured by foreign vessels under the workings of the principles of free trade.

If the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] had consulted the history of our merchant marine they would not have asserted that protective tariffs had caused the decadence of our shipping in the foreign trade, for the record shows that the annual decline was as great during the five years before the war, under tariffs for revenue only, as it has been since the war under protective tariffs.

The charge has been made here on various occasions that our protective tariff has imposed so heavy duties on imported materials as to make it impossible to build vessels for the foreign trade in competition with England. But gentlemen should bear in mind that the duties on the materials of a wooden vessel for this trade are less, and on the materials of an iron vessel no more under the existing tariff than they were under the revenue-only tariff of 1846, inasmuch as all timber, hemp, manila, iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, and copper and composition metal, and wire rope needed for the construction, equipment, and repairs of vessels for the foreign trade may now be imported free of duty, whereas nearly all of these articles bore a duty under the tariff of 1846.

Indeed, there is no good reason why this list of free materials for the construction of vessels, or at least for the manufacture of articles for vessels for the foreign trade, may not be enlarged to carry out the principle of the act of 1872; and a bill to this end has been unanimously recommended by the Shipping Committee to the favorable consideration of the Committee on Ways and Means, which has the privilege of bringing its revenue measures before the House at any time. In every point of view, however, the real obstacle to building iron vessels in this country as cheaply as on the Clyde or Tyne is the fact that our skilled labor in ship-yards commands 60 per cent. more than in England; and I rejoice that our workmen have this advantage.

A PROTECTIVE DUTY NOT A TAX.

Mr. Chairman, all the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of the pending bill and against a protective tariff have assumed, without even attempting to prove the assertion, that duties imposed on imported goods are always a tax in the sense of imposing so much additional burden on the people. They have claimed that this tax is measured by the aggregate sum which would have been collected on the entire consumption of the country if all the articles had been imported instead of a large part made at home. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] thinks that this burden is more than $600,000,000. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], not to be outdone in assertions, put the burden at one thousand millions. In other words, the claim is that notwithstanding only $34,000,000 of the $250,000,000 cotton goods consumed in this country last year were imported and paid a duty into the Treasury, yet that in reality the people were obliged to bear the burden of the duty on all the cottons used, which went to those who make the goods in this country. Time and time again we have been treated to the familiar fable that the workingman rises in the morning and puts on a shirt on which he is obliged to pay 40 per cent. duty, folds his blanket and draws on his pants on which he pays 60 per cent. duty, covers his feet with boots on which he pays 30 per cent. duty, builds his fire in a stove on which he pays 40 per cent. duty, and so on.

The inquiry ought to suggest itself to gentlemen who indulge in such assertions as these how it happens that so many thousands of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Germans should annually leave Europe to make a home in this country when we meet them with such an alleged burden of taxation? And also why nobody ever thinks of abandoning this country and making his home in England, where none of these articles are taxed? Evidently either the hundreds of thousands who come here every year from Europe and the millions of our own workingmen who think that America is the best country in the world for them are grossly deceived, or else the gentlemen who talk about the enormous burdens imposed by our protective duties are greatly mistaken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the fact? It is true that cotton goods when imported pay a duty of from 20 to 40 per cent.; but it is not true that common cottons are sold at a higher price here than in England, or that the workingman pays more in money for a shirt here than he does there. On this point I affirm what I know. When in Europe a few years ago I took pains to purchase some common cotton sheeting in London, in Paris, in Rome, in Vienna, and in Berlin. I found that the price in London was almost exactly the same as here, and on the Continent from 10 to 20 per cent. more than here. When I came to fine cotton goods, particularly muslins, laces, &c., I found the prices in England lower than here. The same was true of woolen goods, boots and shoes, and most hardware, although in no case did I find the prices here higher to the full extent of the duty. For example, the cost of a pair of five-pound blankets in Liverpool is $4.45, and the cost of the same kind of blankets in this country is $5.20, or only 20 per cent. more.

It may be said, "Why not, then, abolish the duty on common cottons and reduce the duty on other goods?" For the reason, Mr. Chairman, that the abolition in the one case and the reduction in the other would give an opportunity for foreign goods to come into this country and take the place of our own, with an ultimate injury to our own people, as I shall presently endeavor to show. It must be borne in mind that English manufacturers are ready to temporarily sell their surplus below cost in order to get into our markets. If our duties should be reduced sufficiently, they would regard it as desirable to do this for a time in order to permanently cripple our industries, in the expectation that they would be able to recoup their losses by increased prices after they had made manufacturing unprofitable in this country.

Now, the fact that common cottons are as low in this country as in Europe shows that the price here is not the English price plus the duty, as our free-trade friends assume. Indeed, it is rarely ever that the prices of any articles which may be made here to the extent of our wants are the foreign cost plus the duty. In the case of common goods, such as are used by the masses, prices here are nearly as low as in Europe. It is only goods used by the well-to-do classes, in which labor is the important element of cost, that sell at prices higher to any considerable extent than abroad.

The reason for this is that the prices of articles which may be wholly made in this country to the extent of our wants are determined not by cost of importation, but by the cost of home production under the influence of competition. Where articles can not readily be made here to the extent of our wants, in other words, where the protective principle does not apply, in such cases the prices here are the foreign cost plus the duty, as may be seen in the case of sugar and other articles that so far as experiments have gone seem not to be the natural products of our climate. In other words, a tariff imposed for revenue only, i. e., imposed either upon articles which can not readily be produced here to the extent of our wants, like sugar, tea, coffee, &c., or upon articles which can be so made here at such rates as to encourage importation and discourage home production, is a tax to the extent of the duties without any amelioration or return; but a tariff so far as its duties afford protection to industries favorably situated as to natural conditions is not as to these articles a tax to the extent of the duties.

HOME PRODUCTION CHEAPENS PRICES.

There is another consideration which should not be lost sight of in estimating the influence of any duty which encourages our home industries, and that is the effect that this additional production has on prices everywhere. Unquestionably, if this country produced very little cotton, woolen, iron, or other manufactured goods—as certainly would have been the case if we had pursued a free-trade policy—we should be obliged to pay considerable more for all these goods to-day than we actually do. Our production swells the world's supply, and thus under the law of demand and supply reduces prices everywhere.

We recently had an illustration of this fact on a small scale. The great quinine factory of Powers & Weightman, in Philadelphia, was burned a few months ago. As soon as the news reached the European manufacturers they largely advanced the price. Again, Bessemer steel rails sold at $75 a ton in England before their manufacture was established in this country. To-day they are sold here for $35. In 1826, before cotton manufacturing was established to any extent in this country, sheetings were sold here and in Europe for 13 cents per yard and calicoes for 22 cents. To-day the same quality of sheetings, and also of calicoes, can be bought here for 6 cents per yard. Even as late as 1860, under the so-called revenue tariff of 1857, such sheetings were sold here for 8¾ cents, and similar prints for 9½ cents per yard.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], in speaking for free wool a few days ago, told the House that the duty on wool increased the cost of the workingman's clothes to the extent of the duty, notwithstanding woolen cloth is 33 per cent. lower than in 1850; and then, forgetting that part of his argument, appealed to the farmers to go back to the lower duty on wool imposed by the tariffs of 1846 and 1857, because during those low duties wool was higher than it is now, thus allowing one part of his argument to nullify the other. This was an unconscious admission that the duty had actually reduced the price of wool in all parts of the world by largely increasing the production in this country, and had thus cheapened instead of increased the cost of the workingman's clothes; while at the same time the holding of the home market for the farmer had encouraged him to improve his breeds of sheep and improve the quantity and quality of his wool, and in consequence he, too, had made a larger profit than between 1846 and 1857.

These facts show that the tariff which best protects and encourages our home industries and thus adds a large amount of home products to the productions of the world tends to reduce the prices of these products here and elsewhere to a point much lower than would have existed if we had adopted free-trade policy; and therefore that a protective tariff on such goods is not a burden on the community, but is on the other hand a positive benefit.

NO TAX ON THE LABORER.

A third consideration, Mr. Chairman, entirely ignored by those who assert that a protective duty increases the burdens of the workingmen and the people, is the fact that most men really ultimately pay for what they buy in labor or service, and the practical question is not whether the money cost is more under protection than under free trade, but whether the cost in labor or service or some other product is more.

Of what avail is it, Mr. Chairman, to tell a laborer that protection compels him to pay $10 for a coat which he can buy in England for $8, when eight days' labor will pay for his $10 coat here and ten days' labor are required to pay for the $8 coat in England? It is impossible to name a single article produced here to the extent of our wants which the laborer can not buy for less labor here than in England. To speak, therefore, of a protective duty which makes this state of things possible as a burden on the people, and the 20, 30, or 40 per cent. duty which aids in maintaining industries and wages as a "tax" on the workingman, is a complete misrepresentation. It is a reduction of duties which would cripple or destroy our industries and reduce wages to the European standard that would really prove to be a "tax" and "burden" on the people.

WAGES AND PRICES IN 1860 AND 1880.

A comparison of annual wages and prices in 1860, after fifteen years of a tariff for revenue only, with wages and prices in 1880, after nineteen years of protection, clearly shows that wages were higher and prices of manufactured goods lower in the protective period than in the revenue-only period.

	Yearly wages.		Increase.
			Per ct.
Woolen manufactures	$234	$300	28
Cotton manufactures	200	246	23
Iron manufactures	355	390	10
Machine manufactures	390	450	15
Paper-making manufactures	252	360	40
Boot and shoe manufactures	250	370	48

These census figures show an average increase of 28 per cent. in wages in the above manufacturing industries since 1860. The average increase in the wages of all kinds of mechanics is fully as great. The following tables show how the prices of manufactured goods have been affected by the protective policy, which has increased wages:

Articles.	Prices.		Reduction.
	1860.	1884.
			Pr. ct.
Common sheetings, per yard	$0 08¾	$0 07	20
Drills, per yard	0 08¾	0 06¾	22
Prints, per yard	0 09½	0 06	34
Pig-iron, per ton	23 00	20 00	14
Iron, refined, per pound	0 03	0 02¼	25
Fancy cassimeres, per yard	0 65	0 50	23
Common woolens, per yard	1 50	1 00	33
Medium blankets, per pair	5 00	3 75	28
Men's pegged boots, per pair	2 50	2 17	15
Crockery, per crate	95 30	57 89	38
Plate-glass, per foot	1 50	0 80	45

Average reduction of prices of the above protected manufactures 28 per cent., against an increase of 28 per cent. of wages.

Could there be a more conclusive demonstration of the fact that protective tariffs have increased the wages of workingmen over those paid under tariffs for revenue only, and at the same time reduced the cost of manufactured goods?

Modifying the familiar story of the taxes imposed on the workingman by protection to accord with the facts, it would read something like this: Under protection the workingman turns down his blanket for which he pays 30 per cent. less labor than does the workingman in Europe, puts on a shirt for which he gives 50 per cent. less labor, draws on pants for which he gives 20 per cent. less labor, covers his feet with shoes for which he gives 30 per cent. less labor, and builds a fire in a stove for which he gives 35 per cent. less labor than does the workingman in free-trade England.

If it were not for the fact that our protective tariffs have increased the prices of farm products by diversifying industries and thus withdrawing men from the farm and preventing a glut of such products the purchasing power of wages at the present time would be more largely in excess of what they were in 1860. But even with the diminution arising from the increased prices of farm products the wages of a laborer in 1880, as estimated by their purchasing power, were at least 15 per cent. higher than in 1860.

PROTECTION NOT A TAX ON THE FARMER.

Mr. Chairman, during the progress of this discussion every gentleman who has spoken in opposition to protection has assumed that notwithstanding protective duties may benefit the laborer and many other classes, yet that they impose a serious tax on every farmer without corresponding benefit.

Whenever any one has condescended to attempt to prove this oft-repeated charge, the argument, as condensed by Professor Sumner, has run in this wise: "A farmer can buy a yard of cloth in England for a bushel of wheat; but in this country, in consequence of the duty imposed on imported cloth, he must give a bushel and a quarter. Does not this show that protection takes a quarter of a bushel of wheat from the farmer?"

Grant the implied assumptions, and the conclusion would follow. Grant first that wheat would be as high under the free-trade conditions which would take 3,000,000 men from our manufacturing industries and add them to the farmers of this country as it is now; and grant, secondly, that cloth would be as low in England with our mills stopped as it is now. Then there would be some basis for the conclusion. The trouble with all free-trade arguments is that they start with certain assumptions; for example, that all nations are on the same platform as to wages of labor, or that because one man could to-day buy more cloth with a bushel of wheat in London than in New York therefore all men could do the same if we relied upon England for all our goods, and argue their case just as though these assumptions are conceded to be true, whereas in fact the whole question in controversy between free trade and protection is right here.

It has been frequently asserted that the price of grain, pork, beef, &c., here is absolutely fixed by foreign conditions, and therefore that our farmers may as well send half of their produce abroad and sell only 50 per cent. here under free trade as to export only 8 per cent. of their crops and sell 92 per cent. of it in our home market, as we do under protection. In other words, it is affirmed by the opponents of protection that it is immaterial to the wheat, corn, pork, and beef grower whether his home market is large or small, because the whole is sold at the foreign price, and that (as it is claimed) will be the same whether we send abroad 30 or 50 per cent. of our farm products, or only 8 per cent., as now.

As this, Mr. Chairman, is the initial fallacy of all free-trade arguments, or rather assumptions, I ask the House to look it in the face.

We have to-day 7,670,493 persons in the United States employed in agriculture—4,225,945 persons as farmers and planters and 3,323,876 as farm laborers. These agriculturists to-day sell 92 per cent. of their products at home, and send abroad a surplus of only 8 per cent. Suppose that under the advice of our free-trade friends we conclude to give up manufacturing industries here (for if protective duties are to be abolished we must give up manufacturing, unless we can bring the wages of labor down to the foreign standard), and to buy our cloth and other manufactured goods in the "cheaper" markets of England. The three million or more men now employed in manufacturing industries will of course go upon farms, and immediately increase our agricultural products 50 per cent.; but as there will be no more persons to be fed in this country than before, the home consumption can be no more, and the surplus for export will be increased more than sevenfold.

I ask gentlemen who tell us that the price of our farm products is absolutely fixed in the foreign market, what will be the effect on the price of our farm products abroad and at home when our surplus for shipment shall be increased so enormously? Is there any one who doubts that such a condition of things would cause the price of farm products to decline enormously? Would Professor Sumner's farmer then be able to buy his yard of cloth in England with his bushel of wheat?

The truth is that the price of wheat, flour, corn, pork, beef, &c., abroad is dependent as much on the amount of the surplus which we have to ship as on the demand abroad. The adoption of a free-trade policy that would destroy manufacturing industries and increase our farm products and swell the surplus for shipment would bring ruin upon the farmers of this country, especially in view of the fact that India is ready to compete with us in foreign markets.

Again, a free-trade policy, which should destroy our manufacturing industries, would increase the cost of manufactured goods by diminishing the world's production, as I have already shown, so that the farmer would find that instead of being able to buy in England a yard of cloth with a bushel of wheat, it would require two bushels of wheat to make the purchase.

On the relative value of the home and the foreign markets to our farmers I call attention to the following statistics from the report of the Bureau of Statistics:

In 1882 we produced in this country 1,617,025,100 bushels of corn, of which only 41,655,653 bushels, or about 2½ per cent., was exported, while 97½ per cent. was consumed at home.

In the same year we produced 504,185,470 bushels of wheat, of which 148,785,696 bushels, or 29½ per cent., was exported, and the exports for the present fiscal year will not exceed 20 per cent. of the crop.

In the same year we produced 290,000,000 pounds of wool, and exported only 64,474 pounds, or scarcely one-fourth of 1 per cent. of the clip.

In the same year scarcely 10 per cent. of our hogs, cattle, pork, and beef was exported, and over 90 per cent. was sold in the home market.

In short, setting aside cotton and tobacco, only 8 per cent. of our home products were exported, while 92 per cent. was sold in our home market

It is of immense importance to the farmers of the West that the home market should be developed, and developed, too, not only in this country generally, but in his own State. The nearer the consumer can be brought to the producer the better the prices the latter will realize. To transport wheat, pork, and beef to England and bring back goods in return involves an immense loss in cost of transportation, and every cent of it must come out of the producer. The highest prosperity is assured to the farmer where manufacturing industries are brought near to him, so as to afford a market at his doors.

Mr. HEWITT forcibly stated the prime importance of the home market and the comparatively small importance of the foreign market to the farmer, in his letter already quoted, when he said:

> If we have free trade we can not expect to procure supplies from abroad by increased shipments of grain, for already the European markets take from us all that they require, and no amount of purchase of goods from them will induce them to buy more food than they need, and which they now take as a matter of necessity.

In the same letter he also set forth clearly the interest which the farmer, as well as every other class, has in a protective tariff to develop manufacturing industries, diversify pursuits, and thus increase the wages of labor, in these words:

> Free trade will simply reduce the wages of labor to the foreign standard, * * * but as a matter of course the ability of the laborer to consume will be reduced and a serious loss will be inflicted on commerce, general industries, &c.

This result has been wrought out in practice in thousands of communities. I remember that in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, before manufacturing industries were established in our midst, the farmer often found it difficult to barter his corn, potatoes, apples, hay, beef, pork, butter, cheese, and vegetables at any paying price. But now, when manufacturing towns are within a day's drive, he finds little difficulty usually in selling all his farm products for cash at fair prices. Every farmer who has lived in a country destitute of manufacturing establishments, where subsequently such establishments have sprung up under our protective policy, can bear witness to the fact that a protective tariff has greatly benefited him.

IMPORTANCE OF DIVERSIFYING PURSUITS.

It is essential to the success of farming in the United States that the pursuits of our people should be diversified. And it will be found that, other things being equal, farmers are most prosperous in those States where manufacturing industries are established, the pursuits of the people diversified, and home markets created.

The February report of the United States Department of Agriculture contains a report by Mr. J. R. Dodge, statistician, on the value of farms, farm products, &c., in the several States, which strikingly illustrates this principle.

Mr. Dodge divides the States of the Union into four groups. In the first group, consisting of Massachusetts and eight other States having the most extensive manufacturing industries, the average value of farm land is about $47 per acre, and the average value of farm products per man is $467 per annum.

In the second group, consisting of Maine and seven other States with less manufacturing establishments than the first group, the value of farm lands is about $34 per acre, and the average value of farm products per man is $394.

In the third group, consisting of Wisconsin and four other Western States with still less manufacturing industries, the value of farm lands is about $20 per acre, and the average value of farm products per man is $261.

In the fourth group, consisting of Virginia and eighteen other States in all parts of the Union, with almost no manufacturing industries, the value of farm lands is only $9 per acre, and the average value of farm products per man is only $161.

VALUE OF PROTECTION TO THE FARMER.

Every farmer can buy more sheeting, prints, woolens, iron goods, shoes, &c., for a bushel of wheat, or corn, or potatoes, or a ton of hay or any other farm product under our protective policy, than he could obtain if free trade had compelled us to rely on England for these goods or if a tariff for revenue only had encouraged large importations of foreign goods to cripple our industries.

I have already presented tables showing the reduction of prices of manufactured goods under the influence of the home competition, encouraged by protection. I now ask attention to the following tables from the New York Herald, giving the prices of farm products in the interior of that State in 1816, before our protective tariffs had diversified the industries of the people of that State by encouraging manufactures, and in 1882:

	1816.	1882.
Wheat, per bushel	$0 44	$1 00
Corn, per bushel	20	60
Oats, per bushel	15	50
Eggs, per dozen	05	15
Barley, per bushel	25	80
Butter, per pound	12	30
Cheese, per pound	06	12
Cows, per head	$16 00 to 20 00	$20 00 to 75 00
Cattle, per yoke	25 00 to 45 00	100 00 to 250 00
Hay, per ton	3 00 to 5 00	10 00 to 18 00
Carriage horses, per span	150 00 to 200 00	300 00 to 1,000 00
Sheep, per head	50 to 75	1 50 to 2 50

That is, the average increase in the prices of farm produce since 1816 has been more than 100 per cent., while the average decrease in prices of manufactured goods has been from 20 to 90 per cent.

The same general results appear from a comparison of the average prices of farm products during the period of a tariff for revenue only before the war and average prices since resumption of specie payments under protection.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], recognized by the House as a painstaking and reliable authority in economic facts, presented to the Forty-seventh Congress a very valuable table of statistics on this point, to which I invite attention.

The tables submitted by that gentleman show that during five years of the revenue-only tariff one bushel of wheat would buy on the average 8½ yards of sheeting, 12 yards of prints, 107 pounds of pig-iron, 35¾ pounds of bar-iron, or 1 sack of salt. But during the five years of protection, from 1877 to 1882, 1 bushel of wheat would buy on the average 11 yards of sheeting, 16 yards of prints, 134 pounds of pig-iron, 57 pounds of bar-iron, or 1¾ sacks of salt.

These tables further show that under the five years of tariff for revenue only ten pounds of butter would buy 10½ yards of sheeting, 15 yards of prints, 131 pounds of pig-iron, 43¾ pounds of bar-iron, or 1¼ sacks of salt. But under five years of protection the same butter would buy 21 yards of sheeting, 31 yards of prints, 254 pounds of pig-iron, 109 pounds of bar-iron, or 3½ sacks of salt.

In 1840, before manufacturing industries had diversified the employments of the people of this country, each farmer had of neighbors who were non-agriculturists 5⅔ persons to purchase his product; but in 1880 each farmer had 6⅓ persons who were consumers of his products. It is this increase of 50 per cent. in the number of non-agricultural consumers—an increase mainly due to the introduction of manufacturing industries—which has so much improved the situation of the farmers of this country. The protective policy which has brought this improvement is not a burden, but a benefit to every farmer in the land.

DIRECT PROTECTION TO FARMERS.

I have spoken of the indirect benefit of our protective system to the farmer; but to these should be added the direct protection accorded to agricultural products against the competition of Canada. Hay, grain, potatoes, butter, cheese, horses, cattle, wool, sheep, and hogs would be brought into the United States from Canada to compete with American farm products, if it were not for the duty imposed on them when imported. The advantage to our farmers of the duties imposed on imported Canadian farm products plainly appears in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Ohio, Michigan, and other States bordering on the northern frontier, where the farmers on this side of the line obtain 15 to 20 per cent. more for their products in our markets than the Canadian farmers obtain on the other side. Without our tariff it would be impossible for our farmers to raise wool in competition with South America and Australia.

The prosperity of the farmer is closely connected with the development of manufacturing industries; and protection, therefore, is as beneficial to him as to the laborer, the blacksmith, the shoemaker, the carpenter, the mason, the truckman, the trader, the professional man—in short, every member of the community in which manufacturing industries are established.

THE FINAL TEST.

The final and conclusive test of any public policy, Mr. Chairman, is its fruits. It is the practical results of the two policies of protection and of free trade, of which a tariff for revenue only is only a forerunner, which must control our action. If our protective policy is "taxation," "monopoly," "robbery," and "oppression," as many gentlemen charge, then twenty-two years' trial of that policy must have produced ruin from one end of the country to the other. No national advantages could have warded off the blight of protection if it be what its opponents charge. The fact that under this policy the United States has for four years successfully waged the most gigantic and destructive war for national existence recorded in modern history; has paid more than two-thirds of the enormous cost of that war; has grown in population more than 50 per cent., and in wealth more rapidly than any other nation; has increased the number, value, and productions of her farms threefold; has raised the value of her manufactured products from $1,885,861,676 in 1860 to $5,369,579,191 in 1880; has developed our foreign commerce from an aggregate of six hundred and eighty-seven millions in 1860 to an aggregate of over fifteen hundred millions in 1883, and has drawn to our shores millions of immigrants from all parts of the world to better their condition, while comparatively none have left our shores for this purpose—such an array of facts as these is a demonstration more conclusive than the assumptions and theories of our free-trade friends that the policy of protection is wise and beneficent.

During the delivery of Mr. DINGLEY's remarks, at the expiration of one hour, the hammer fell.

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maine be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GOFF having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 1108) to provide for the sale of the Iowa Indian reservation, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, for the issuance of a patent for a reservation for the Iowa tribe of Indians in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

TARIFF BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, though one should rise from the dead to convey to us a message on the tariff, I doubt whether he would change a single vote in this House upon this or any other tariff bill; and though an angel should come down from heaven, he could not give us any message in favor of that liberty wherewith the Founder of our religion has made us free, which could convey to us more forcible reasons in support of this measure than we had on yesterday in the eloquent argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], my colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means. And after hearing that magnificent speech, Mr. Chairman, I doubted whether it were worth while for me to take up the thread of this great argument; and it is mostly by his request that I have concluded to-day to gather together some few sheaves of wheat from the great field over which passed his devouring sickle.

But there is an audience outside of this House; an audience of men who work with tools, and who govern this House by the ballot. To them, constituting as they do, I am glad to say, the great majority of the people of this country, it is worth while to address an argument which will appeal to their judgment and their permanent interests. That audience I will acknowledge is probably against me. I fear that perhaps a majority of the great army of workers in this country stand where I stood in 1872, when I wrote the letter which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has just quoted. They are still in the bonds of prejudice, of false training, and of ignorance, where I was then myself. I have no apologies to make for having progressed out of the night of darkness into the open sunshine of truth. But I should have apologies to make if, having reached conclusions which contradict those that I held years ago, I should fail in this House and everywhere to announce them with that frankness which belongs to an honest man and a faithful Representative.

THE SURPLUS REVENUE.

Now, though that army of workers may be against me on the question of protection for the sake of protection, there is one thing in which they are with me. There is an old instinct ingrained in the Anglo-Saxon race which tells us that surplus revenues are the result of unnecessary taxation, and that unnecessary taxation is unjust exaction from the fruits of human labor. For that cause Charles the First lost his head. For that cause the last of the Stuarts was driven into exile. For that cause we fought the war of Independence, and established this Government upon the eternal doctrine that taxation and representation should go together, in order that representation might correct unjust taxation. Upon that issue this great army of workmen are sound; and they were sound on it in the last election, when they turned the members of that side of the House out of their seats, because in the presence of a surplus of more than a hundred millions of dollars they did not attack the problem seriously, but undertook to hoodwink the people of this country as to the effect of their legislation. Upon that issue they placed here this great majority of Democrats; and if we are false to the duty thus imposed, if by reason of difference of opinion among ourselves we fail to deal with that question, and to reduce taxation to the point adequate to the economical administration of this Government, and the discharge of its just obligations, then this majority will be swept from their places; not upon the ground of free trade or protection, but upon the ground, that to take $150,000,000 annually out of the hard earnings of the producing classes of this country, for upon them falls the burden, is an act of tyranny not to be endured by a free people. It is a sure evidence of the decay of public spirit when excessive taxation is tolerated, and it is only among free peoples that the remission of taxation is ever accomplished; for it is only in constitutional governments that taxation is self-imposed.

CONDITION OF THE WAGE-EARNERS.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side will tell us that they are just as anxious to get rid of this surplus as we are, and they point out the road to us by the abolition of the internal-revenue duties. But they tell us that we must not attack the sacred temple of protection which they have reared, and which they think is essential to the safety, comfort, and happiness of the workingmen of this country. If that statement, so often reiterated on this floor, be true, then it would be an act of the grossest folly on the part of the majority of this House to interfere with these protective duties. If, on the other hand, it be false, then it is the duty of this side of the House to proceed fearlessly with the work of removing the unjust discriminations, the excessive duties, the obstructions to the healthy growth of business and the enlargement of the commerce of the country, by the natural process of the exchange of commodities which we produce in excess, for articles which we can not produce as cheaply as other nations.

The allegation is that the workingmen of this country in consequence of the existence of the protective system are contented and have happy homes; that their families are in comfort, and that all we have to do is to let them alone, and that all that they ask is to be let alone. I am amazed at the declarations which I have heard on this floor on that subject. It can only be due to the fact that the men who have made them are blind to what is going on around them. Why, sir, we have had hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the representatives of every branch of protected industry in this country, and there was not one of them that did not tell us that his business was depressed, that his mills were being either closed up or working upon short time, that wages had been reduced, and that further reductions of wages were impending. No one who goes to and fro in this land will controvert the truth of these statements. There is stagnation everywhere in the protected industries, and where they are not protected, there is no stagnation other than that which is consequential upon stagnation in the protected industries.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman whether there ever was such stagnation, industrial stagnation, in free-trade England as there is to-day; whether there ever was in England such a measure of starvation, amounting almost to famine, as there is under free trade to-day?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, if the gentleman has completed his little speech——

Mr. KELLEY. It is not so long a one as you put into mine.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Excuse me. The gentleman from Pennsylvania appealed to me and I gave him an answer. That was all. Now that he has made his little speech, let me say this: I am going to deal with that very question exhaustively if I am able to keep the floor for my hour. Therefore I will not be diverted at the present moment from the order in which I am trying to present this question.

The best testimony, Mr. Chairman, as to the condition of the workmen is the testimony of the workmen themselves. If the protective system can give them happiness and good wages and comfort, they certainly ought to have it to-day; for we have had nearly twenty-five years of uninterrupted protection under a higher tariff than ever existed in any civilized country on the globe. Now, what is the story told by the workingmen? The Senate Committee on Labor and Education have recently taken exhaustive testimony on this subject from the workingmen themselves.

That testimony is to be found in a volume which has not yet been laid on our desks, but which is in print and of which I trust this House will order a very large edition. The testimony of workingmen was, for the first time in the history of this or any other country, presented in methodical order and represented every branch of business in this country. That testimony is absolutely unanimous: first, that the wages and earnings of workingmen in this country are not sufficient to give them comforts, or even a decent support for their families; and secondly, the testimony is equally conclusive as to the fact that there has been a steady degradation in the condition of the laboring classes of this country during the last twenty years, and that it is an increasing deterioration to be measured year by year. This testimony was given during the last year, before we had reached the present state of depression and stagnation under which we are suffering.

Aside from this testimony, there is much personal knowledge which every gentleman here can bring to bear upon this subject. I dislike to speak of the hardships and sufferings of men in this country who are ready to earn an honest living, but who are unable to do so. To use a plain phrase, one feels as if it would be "fouling one's own nest." Yet I have been in the coal regions of this country within the last six months, and have seen with my own eyes a condition of things which made my heart sad, which made me hope that this Congress might be wise enough to remove some of the causes of the wretchedness and the misery which I saw there. When I saw that men who worked a whole day away from the light of heaven, and who took their lives in their hands every time they entered the pit, are housed in hovels such as the lordly owners of the mines would refuse to stable their cattle in, then I felt that something was wrong in the condition of the American laborer.

When I learn that there are miners of iron ore working in the State of Pennsylvania for 75 cents a day, then I know that there is something wrong in the legislation of this country, for the duty upon iron ore was put up by the last tariff act on an average from 40 or 45 cents a ton to 75 cents a ton in order to protect these very miners and to give them high wages. When that act was passed they were in receipt of $1.25 a day; to-day they are in receipt of 75 cents a day. Surely, if there be virtue in legislation these men, hard-working, industrious, independent voters, if you will give them the means of living, ought not to have been reduced to this wretched state of misery.

But the end is not yet. The owners of these great coal mines have recently met in conference in the city of Philadelphia, which my friend so ably represents, and which I trust he may continue to represent for many years to come—they lately met and solemnly came to the conclusion to suspend work for three days in the week, and after this month they concluded that possibly they might keep up the price of coal by suspending work only nine days in the month. Keep up the price of coal! Ay, to the workman, to the farmer, to everybody who earns his living by his daily labor, and put down the wages of the man who digs it from the earth, and then tell him that he is protected by the tariff. Can there be a more stupendous specimen of audacious assertion than we have heard upon this floor, that the workmen of this country are well rewarded and made happy by the operation of the tariff?*

*Extract from testimony given before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

Adolph Strasser, on behalf of the Cigar-makers' International Union of America, volume 1, page 455, says:

"The wages in England are higher than they are in Pennsylvania. In the State of Pennsylvania the average wages among the cigar-makers is from $2 to $6 a week, the lowest in the United States. The cigar-makers in that State are the poorest paid in this country. They work cheaper than the Chinamen of San Francisco, and they do not receive even that wages in cash; they have to take it in scrip and truck."

Henry George, the well-known political economist, says on page 488:

"Labor does not get its fair share. There are workingmen in this country who are as much peons as the peons of South America. Get the reports of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics, and they are corroborated by the investigations of independent inquirers, and you will see that a very large proportion of the operatives in New England can not make enough to supply their families even in the poorest fashion. They are absolutely compelled to rely upon the labor of their little children—children whom the law strives to prevent going to work."

On page 517 he says, speaking of the rates of wages in the old countries and their relative purchasing power:

"The rates of wages are lower there, speaking generally. In some avocations, however, I am inclined to think that the condition of the workmen is as good as it is here, and in some even better."

On page 518 he says, in reply to a question whether the manufacturing operatives and those we call day-laborers, including agricultural laborers, are any better off than they are in Great Britain:

"I should say yes, though I should say that there are some classes better off. They are the English wage-workers; they have provided very much more by co-operation and combination, and all that can be done in that way, than have the Americans. In England they have much larger and stronger trades-union."

On page 524 he testifies to the growing feeling of dissatisfaction existing in the minds of the workingmen in regard to the present condition of affairs in this country.

Robert Blissert, of New York, one of the best known and most ardent advocates of trades-union in the country, says on page 841:

"In all my connection with the labor movement I have found that it matters not in what part of the world workingmen are, their condition differs very little. I believe that the carpenters and joiners in England will compare favorably in their social condition with those of America. I believe that the miners of England have the advantage over the miners of America, that their condition is better. I believe that the moral status of the American miner is somewhat better than that of the English miner, but the pecuniary condition of the English miner and the condition of his home is in my opinion rather better than that of the American miner.

"Q. You have special reference, I suppose, to coal-miners?

"Yes, sir, but I speak of all the mining interests. I believe that the condition of the homes of the miners in England is better than the condition of the homes of the American miners. The hours of labor are shorter, and the amount of work performed by the English miners in a day is much less than the amount performed by the miners here. The same may be said of the carpenters, bricklayers, and plasterers, and there the hours of labor too are shorter in England. They are only from fifty-two to fifty-four hours per week. The mechanics' institutes and other places of information are more largely attended than they are here. There are more of them, and the workingmen all avail themselves of their benefits there more than they do here, even where they do exist, and I think I can say fearlessly that the intelligence of the skilled mechanic in England is better than the intelligence of the skilled mechanic in America."

Finally, on page 855, he says:

"I do not know, however, whether I have stated clearly my opinion as to the practical condition of the workingmen here and in Europe. It is all nonsense for the Fourth of July orators to tell us here in this country that we are so much better off than they are in Europe. I found the workingmen in Paris equal if not superior to the workingmen in New York. I want to be properly understood when I say that the expressions heard from time to time here about the pauper labor of Europe, and the statement so often made about the condition of the people here being so much better than the people there, is unfounded—it is a dream."

Lastly we come to Mr. John Jarrett, who was then the president of the Amalgamated Iron and Steel Association, the most powerful trade union in the country. I quote from page 1162:

"Q. Do you know anything about the condition of any other trades than your own men who mine the iron?

"A. I do, sir. Did you mean coal-miners?

"Q. The men who mine the coal.

Now, to come to the iron-works; my friend from Pennsylvania ought to know all about them. Last year more than half of the furnaces of this country were in blast. That was a great decrease from the year before. This year, after the passage of a bill arranged, constructed, and adopted by the friends of protection, what has happened? Two-thirds of the furnaces of this country—or nearly two-thirds, for I suppose I shall be held to a most strict account for every word I use on this floor—to be exact, four hundred and thirty-two furnaces are out of blast while only two hundred and sixty-nine furnaces are in operation, and the wages of the great army of protected workmen whom they employ have been largely reduced. I am among the unfortunate manufacturers who have been forced to reduce wages or stop work. I am compelled to offer to the workmen whom I employ the choice between no work or work at less wages than they ought to have. Yet I am protected by the magnificent and unnecessary duty of $6 per ton—or to be more accurate, $6.72 per ton. I do not mind the odd cents; no doubt the gentleman himself does. [Laughter.]

PROTECTION CREATES OVERPRODUCTION.

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would prefer that my friend would allow me to go on and finish this statement.

Mr. KELLEY. I only wanted to thank the gentleman——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Well, then, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. I simply rose, as the gentleman referred to me, to thank him most profoundly, most heartily, for enforcing my doctrine that production has so far outrun consumption the world over that a readjustment of the proportions in which the joint production of labor and capital shall be distributed must be made.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. "And the Lord hath delivered mine adversary into my hands." [Laughter.] The gentleman says that protection has been unable to prevent overproduction. That is the point of his remark. I go farther. I say that protection creates overproduction; that overproduction is the logical end and unavoidable conclusion of protection.

Then, when you have overproduction what is the consequence? You have a limited market; it is walled in by the tariff; there is no access to the outside world. What can you do with the surplus? Nothing but pile it up as long as your money lasts, and then stop. And then these protected workmen are left to starve, so that starvation is thus the literal and logical sequence of protection.

Overproduction is not a cause; it is a result. It is the result of causes that are vicious, for if artificial obstructions and interferences had not been created, will any man in this world tell me that there would be overproduction? Why, sir, the gentleman's long appeal to this House was based on sympathy for the people who are starving for the very things which are superabundant but which they could not buy. Overproduction means that there is inability on the part of some one in some part of the world to procure and consume the things which are elsewhere in superabundance.

Under the beneficent laws of God production is a blessing. Good harvests mean comfort and happiness to the people. A large crop of pig-iron, if I may use the phrase, means the progress of great industrial enterprises. God has not cursed His people with the great contradictory law, contradictory to His omniscience, to His omnipotence, to His universal Fatherhood, that the labor of man shall destroy his happiness and close up the gates of joy for him and his offspring. It is the laws of man that have done this thing. The laws of man have erected artificial impediments; for when in any country or in the world you come to the condition when people say, "There is overproduction," it means only this: that the machinery of distribution is not equal to the machinery of production; that mankind in the eager pursuit of wealth have pressed one side of the economical machine to its full power, and neglected to see that the other side of the machine, which discharges and distributes the product, is equally developed and improved.

Now, then, if lack of proper distribution be the real key to the situation, as it is, then what is the logical conclusion? Remove the impediments to distribution which you have artificially created; remove them here, remove them everywhere, and let the world taste for once the beneficence of an Almighty Father, who intended that his children should be happy.

THE LAW OF VALUE.

The law by which value is created, Mr. Chairman, is simple, but it is not often considered. What we call industry is the conversion of natural energy, of physical force stored up in nature, into useful forms by the skill and labor of man. The cost is measured by the difficulty of reaching these natural stores; in other words, of extracting the crude material from the earth, and by the labor which is put upon it afterward giving it form and value.

Now the greater the benefaction of nature, the greater the stores of this force, the more accessible these treasures, the less human labor is required for their development, and for their conversion into what we call property. Measured by that standard, there are two countries that Providence has endowed with great resources, more accessible and in larger quantity, than in any other countries in the world, and they are Great Britain and the United States. Hence wages in Great Britain, under a natural order of things, will be higher than in any other European country. Hence, under a natural order of things, wages in this country will be greater than they are or can be in Great Britain; for a less amount of labor will produce on the average in this country a greater amount of value than it will in Great Britain. What deductions are to be made from these results to labor? If there were no intervention of any other elements the answer would be simple. The laborer's wages would be what is left after paying for the raw material and selling his product in the open market of the world.

But there is another deduction. Capital is necessary for the exploitation of human industry, of these natural resources. It may be paid for in one of two ways, or in both of them—by profits or by interest, or partly by profits and partly by interest. The lower the rate of interest the more cheaply the final value can be produced, and hence the lowering of the rate of interest all over the world, due to great accumulations of capital which have come from the inventions and progress of the age, is the greatest benefaction that the human race has yet seen. It is as the dew of Heaven; it "falls upon the just and the unjust."

PROTECTION PARALYZES LABOR-UNIONS.

But where the operations of industry are under the control of owners who have capital, the owner takes both interest and profits, and interest and profits are both deducted from the wages of labor. Is there any remedy, has any remedy been found to prevent the owner from appropriating to himself all the earnings of industry, except that which is required to give a bare subsistence of the lowest order to the workmen who perform the labor? Wherever and so long as protection prevails there is no remedy. Where there is free trade the power ultimately passes from the owner into the hands of the workmen. In this country we have tried to apply the great remedy which has been applied in Great Britain with such remarkable results, and which is only at the beginning of its triumph. I mean the organization of labor into trades-unions, whereby labor is pooled for its own protection. Trades-unions are the weapons of attack and defense which free trade has created for the protection of the workingmen; and they are all the protection that the workingman needs.

But in this country trades-unions are paralyzed by protection. The two principles are at war with each other. As long as we have a protective system trades-unions must be feeble and finally die. Let us prove this conclusion by tracing the effect of the protective system to its necessary conclusion in overproduction and stagnation.

Protective duties stimulate industry, we are told; and they do so until the market is fully supplied. Business rapidly increases where there is a monopoly of the market. Where profits are large, capital rushes in. It is not the capital of the workman, it is the capital of the owner. He takes not merely the profits of the normal business, but he adds to it in times of good demand the entire duty which is imposed by the tariff. And this he did, and was doing, when I spoke in this House two years ago, in one great department of our industry, the manufacture of steel rails, which were then subject to a duty of $28 a ton. The price of the foreign rails had advanced to a point where it would have paid him to make rails without any duty; but of the duty of $28 a ton he added $27 to his price, and transferred from the great mass of this people $50,000,000 in two years into the pockets of a few owners, who thus indemnified themselves, in that short time, nearly twice over for the total outlay which they had made in the establishment of the business. They had a right to it; the law gave it to them; it was the "pound

"A. Well, coal-mining in Pennsylvania, in my opinion, is more important than ore-mining, and the condition of the coal-miners in the State of Pennsylvania is pitiable and miserable.

"Q. How so, and how much so is it?

"A. It is because the wages of coal-miners are too low; they are ill paid. Then, too, they suffer from the truck system. Under that system they pay 100 per cent. more for what they buy than our people do. Then the houses they live in are extremely miserable. If I feel for any particular branch of labor in this country it is the poor coal-miner. He risks his life day after day for a mere pittance. Every time he departs from the light of day he does not know whether he will see it again, and while in some branches it does not require much skill to be a miner in others it does, and I think that the coal-miner ought to be better paid, better clothed, better housed, and better fed than he is.

"Q. Have you been among those miners?

"A. Yes, sir; and from my experience among the coal-miners in England I may say that they are really better cared for there than are the coal-miners in the United States. I do not say the English miner gets as much money for his labor, but he is better cared for.

"Q. Do you mean that he has more comfort during the year?

"A. Yes, sir."

From the last annual report on labor and industries in New Jersey, from the hands of a protectionist, I extract the following statement:

"Progress and poverty seem to be the concomitants of our civilization, and while the phrase so generally heard that the rich grow richer and the poor poorer may not be strictly true, it is painfully evident that the advance in our social life, great as it has been through the past half-century, bears no sort of proportion to the increase of wealth, knowledge, and material appliances. Labor receives no fair share of these advantages which bring out in strong relief the inequalities of our modern life; with the increase of palatial residences for the rich few the tenement-hovels of the many poor increase; with the erection of the costly church edifices and school-houses of the country, the enlargement of our jails and almshouses. The greed for gain, so characteristic of our age, makes the chief end of life the acquisition of wealth, and the increasing competition is the plea by which the employing class seeks to justify the reduction of wages of the employé to the lowest possible level sufficient for bare existence. In periods of business depression, which so often recur, the wages cease entirely, and the wage-workers are left dependent on private or public charity. The great army of tramps and vagrants is recruited from unemployed workmen. As long as this state of affairs continues it is idle to talk of any social improvement of the workmen."

of flesh." Did they divide any portion of that magnificent bounty with the men they employed? Were not those men subjected to the rigorous law of supply and demand? And how inexorable that law is, when applied to labor, can not be understood until you recollect those vast regions of the world which the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us is filled with pauper labor, open to be brought here in competition with our American labor.

Wages were advanced a trifle, and something was doled out from the great mass of this legislated wealth to the workmen; but any attempts of the trades-unions to get a fair share of this great profit would have been met, as it is met to-day, by the importation of foreign labor. Aye, in the State of Pennsylvania to-day the Hungarian and Polish immigrants are fighting for the crust of bread which is denied to the American workmen. The trades-union, therefore, in an overstocked market, with the doors open for foreign immigration, is absolutely powerless. It is always powerless except in the single contingency of a very active demand, when it will not pay the owner to derange his business by a short stoppage.

But how often are we confronted with the other spectacle, of workmen striking to resist the reduction of wages made in consequence of an overstock of goods, and failing utterly, as they must do, in the object they have in view. At the great strike in Pittsburgh last year, which lasted four months, the owners rejoiced at the stoppage, because they had a large surplus of goods on hand. The stoppage was a benefaction to the masters, and of course the trades-union failed.

I want the workmen of this country to comprehend this great fact. They have no means of bringing owners to terms except through their labor associations, and their labor associations fail every time when you have an overstocked market.

But we are told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that overproduction is the inevitable result of the protective system, as I have shown, in a restricted market, where the surplus can find no outlet.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will pardon me a single moment. I accept entirely his proposition that the means of distribution are unequal to carry the results of the means of production. I accept the proposition, and I say the only remedy for the laborers of free-trade England and of protected America is a better distribution of the joint proceeds of capital and labor than now prevails.

Mr. MORRISON. To be obtained by more taxes, I suppose?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is this the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or mine? [Laughter.] I am getting in doubt.

Mr. KELLEY. It is your speech.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Granted; but this is not the time to indorse speeches, and the day of indorsement is past.

Mr. KELLEY. I will not agree with the gentleman any more.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has come to agree with me in more than one thing. He is, I believe, in a hopeful condition of conversion. [Laughter.] He is now on my ground on the silver question, and is in favor of reducing the duty on works of art, and I expect to see him join me in the end to pull down that temple of protection which owes so much of its vast proportions to his efforts. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown, or tried to show, how futile in a restricted market is the system of association of labor, which is the only star of hope in the firmament of the laborers, and how impossible it is for it to succeed in this country, because manufactured surplus products, which compel stoppage or low wages, are forbidden by our protective laws to be carried to the open markets of the world.

FREE TRADE STRENGTHENS LABOR-UNIONS.

Let us see how it is in Great Britain. I will now refer to the subject to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] called my attention and to which I promised consideration. The condition of Great Britain in the year 1824 was simply deplorable; starvation stalked throughout the land. It was the year when laborers, rendered desperate by want, rose in their might and, blinded to the fact that they were destroying their own means of livelihood, burned the wheat-ricks of England. In that year Canning and Huskisson began the great work of clearing away the prohibitory and protective duties of Great Britain. They went slowly but they went surely to the end. They began with raw materials, they progressed to secondary products, and finally they swept away the whole mass of duties which impinged on manufactured goods. How fared it with the workmen of England? More wretched than the beasts of the field, Mr. Chairman, as they were when this reform began, every hour has witnessed amelioration in the condition of the wage-earning class of Great Britain. Every restriction removed, every prohibition annulled, raised them in the scale of being.

My first visit to England was in 1844, just after the last of these protective duties had been removed, and just as Cobden and Bright were gaining the great victory which gave free food to the nation. I have gone to England since 1862 generally once in two years. The subject which has interested me most has been the condition of the European workmen. I never failed to mark in Great Britain a steady improvement. In 1867, when I wrote my report on the French exposition, which those gentlemen are so fond of quoting, I found the condition of the English workman better than that of the French or German, but not equal to the condition of the corresponding class in this country.

I believed that the difference was due to the tariff, and I said so. I have gone often since, and I have found the condition of the British laborer steadily improving in all that goes to make up the life of man. On the other hand, my business and inclination has enabled me to study the condition of American labor, and I confirm the testimony given before the Labor Committee of the Senate, that the condition of American labor has steadily gone down. It needed something to open my eyes, and unwelcome facts set me to thinking. But more than that, I am a manufacturer.

Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned for some reference to myself. Others have had no hesitation in picking me out as an example to be reprobated; and one gentleman, or rather one member of this House—a member of the last House and a member of this one—went so far as to pry into my family affairs and to refer to my domestic concerns. What he said was absolutely false, as usually these criticisms have been. This incident, however, recalled the fact that I once believed that protection was necessary for the prosperity of my own business. I believed it and acted upon it. But when after forty years of close attention to business, with the use of abundant capital and without sacrifice to procure it, after having built up a great establishment which at least does not compare unfavorably with those of its kind, I discovered that not only were the workmen not better off by reason of protection, but that I was not better off. That if I had taken the money invested in that business and loaned it out at the current rate of interest on good security, which we will take to be 5 or 6 per cent., my firm would have been richer to-day than we are out of the vast business we have been conducting.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Suppose that all other manufacturers in this country had done the same thing, let me ask the gentleman what would be the condition of the loan market?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not know what would be the condition of the loan market. But I do know that I have never found any difficulty in getting people to take all the money in that way which was offered to them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And give good security?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And at 5 per cent. interest?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Can you do that now?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly; and I will state to the gentleman that the banking firm of A. Corbin & Co. have an advertisement, which I have seen within a few days in several journals, in which they invite the public—and I give them the benefit of this notice for nothing—invite the public to bring their money to them, for which they will undertake in sums of any amount to give 7 and 8 per cent. interest on loans in Iowa and other Western States. And they give the results of some fifteen years' operation in the business, during which loans have been made amounting to many millions of dollars, in which they show that not a penny of loss has taken place. They invite the public to come forward and bring in their means and dump it into their hoppers, for which they promise a higher rate of interest than I have been able to realize in my business.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then that would go to show that some industries must be prospering in this country, and are profitable.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But it is not an evidence of prosperity when a man is compelled to borrow money at 7 or 8 per cent.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; but it is an evidence of prosperity if a man is able to borrow it, and can give security at that high rate of interest for it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. He may be forced to pay a high rate of interest by the exigencies of his situation. But I admit that they can borrow it, and I want to make it possible for the farmers of this country, if it be necessary, to be able to borrow money and pay good interest if his welfare is thereby advanced. But the reason why the farmer was able to pay high interest is well known to the gentleman from Ohio, and he knows as well that the causes which led to it are no longer at work. From 1873 to 1879 there was an era of short crops all over the world except in this country. Here we had abundant harvests and there was an abundant market in Europe. The price of wheat went up to $1.98 a bushel in New York city, and there came a flood of wealth back from Europe into this country. And yet during all that time, with the flood of wealth pouring in upon us, when we had the influence of a high protective tariff, there never was, and I hope there never will be, such an era of distress among the protected industries of the country as existed at that time. They were all ruined and broken down. Two years ago in this House, when I elaborately discussed the causes which brought about the prosperity of the farmers, I pointed out that it was temporary, being due to this invasion of large amounts of money, stimulating new enterprises and opening new wheat-fields. I predicted that the prosperity would come to an end as soon as Europe could get her supply of food from any other quarter. And it has come to an end, and to-day the farmer can not produce wheat at the prevailing price and pay his expenses. The only chance that is left for him is that manufactures shall be established in his neighborhood and give him thereby a market for his produce, saving the cost of transportation. But manufactures can not grow in a market already overstocked——

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. When I get through with the sentence which I have begun I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. WELLER. It will not be apropos except at this point.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Well, now, the gentleman has succeeded in interrupting the current of my thought. I must decline to yield for a question at present. I was saying that the farmers of this country can have but little hope for the future without manufactures, and that manufactures can not grow in an overstocked market.

There is only one way by which they can be reopened and enlarged, and that is to make a market for our manufactures in the open markets of the world. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] this morning referred to the fact that we buy more from Cuba and South America than we sell to them. He seemed to be ignorant of the fact that we sell more to England than we buy, and that we take the surplus which we sell to England, the money realized by it, and pay the debt for that which we buy in South America, in Mexico, and in Cuba. But if we could produce manufactured goods in competition with Great Britain there would be a change in the current of this business. As it now is, we sell food to Great Britain; Britain consumes the food in making manufactures. The manufactures are exported to South America, and we pay for what we buy there by drafts on London against the food we have sold in England, and the account is balanced in London by the balances of trade between the respective countries. But let the manufacturers have a chance to go out and export the $100,000,000, of which the gentleman from Maine speaks, direct to South America and Cuba and Mexico, and we will get in exchange the commodities of those countries—in direct exchange; and we will thus build up the shipping business which the gentleman so much desired to develop, and at the same time increase our manufactures and the demand for the farmer's produce.

Now, Mr. Chairman, returning to the point where I was when I was interrupted: I wish to call attention to the proof that the condition of the British laborer has steadily improved under the operations of free trade. For this purpose I shall not resort to assertion; I shall bring proof. Mr. Robert Giffen is the secretary of the statistical department of the English Board of Trade and also the president of the London Statistical Society. He is the most eminent living authority on the subject of statistics. His diligence, his intelligence, and his rectitude have never been called in question, and they can not be questioned. Mr. Giffen, in his address before the society in November last, treated of the progress of the working classes of Great Britain in the last half century. I have procured this document, which I regard as the most important contribution to social statistics ever made in any country, to be republished in the Popular Science Monthly for the month of May, and I ask every gentleman to read it for himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

A MEMBER. For how long?

Mr. CHACE. I hope the gentleman will have all the time he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended indefinitely. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I thank the committee, but I may say that the reason I am taking more time than I expected is because the speech I intended to make was so much better made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] that I have been compelled largely to shift my line of discussion.

The title of the pamphlet to which I have referred is "The progress of the working-classes in the last half century." I just now simply give the conclusion of Mr. Giffen. I shall be disposed to append more of this document to my speech unless the House should consider it an infraction of privilege.

From this it appears that the increase of what is known as working-class income in the aggregate is greater than that of any other class, being 160 per cent., while the return to capital and the return to what are called the capitalist classes, whether it is from capital proper or, as I maintain, a return only in the nature of wages, has only increased about 100 per cent., although capital itself has increased over 150 per cent. At the same time the capitalist classes themselves have greatly increased in number, so that the amount of capital possessed among them per head has only increased 15 per cent., notwithstanding the great increase in capital itself, and the average income per head can have hardly increased at all. On the other hand, as the masses of the nation, taking the United Kingdom altogether, have only increased about 30 per cent. since 1843, when these income-tax figures begin, while their aggregate incomes have increased 160 per cent., it is explained how these incomes have gained, individually, about 100 per cent. as against hardly any increase at all in the incomes of what are called the capitalist classes on the average. Thus the rich have become more numerous, but not richer individually; the "poor" are, to some smaller extent, fewer; and those who remain "poor" are, individually, twice as well off on the average as they were fifty years ago. The "poor" have thus had almost all the benefit of the great material advance of the last fifty years.

We may now conclude this long inquiry. It has been shown directly, I believe, that, while the individual incomes of the working classes have largely increased, the prices of the main articles of their consumption have rather declined; and the inference as to their being much better off, which would be drawn from these facts, is fully supported by statistics showing a decline in the rate of mortality, an increase of the consumption of articles in general use, an improvement in general education, a diminution of crime and pauperism, a vast increase of the number of depositors in savings-banks, and other evidences of general well-being. Finally, the increase of the return to capital has not been in any way in proportion, the yield on the same amount of capital being less than it was, and the capital itself being more diffused, while the remuneration of labor has enormously increased. The facts are what we should have expected from the conditions of production in recent years. Inventions having been multiplied and production having been increasingly efficient, while capital has been accumulated rapidly, it is the wages receivers who must have the benefit. The competition of capital keeps profits down to the lowest point, and workmen consequently get for themselves nearly the whole product of the aggregate industry of the country. It is interesting, nevertheless, to find that the facts correspond with what theory should lead us to anticipate.

All the statements of individual cases of misery made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania weigh nothing against this great conclusion of an investigation based upon facts running over a period of fifty years. If individual cases of misery were to be a test, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has only to go to his own city, and I have only to go to mine. Sad it is to think that there is no large aggregation of people anywhere in the world where there is not great human misery. So far as this misery exists in England it is due only to one cause, intemperance, where money enough is expended each year in drink to provide for all its pauperism and misery. So far as it exists on the continent of Europe—and it is greater in the protected countries than it is in England, as the result of my observation made in England, France, Germany, Turkey, and Italy last year; it is less in England because England has greater natural resources—but all over the Continent the cause is to be found in the great standing armies, which have converted Europe into an armed camp garrisoned by 2,000,000 of soldiers, who eat up the substance of the people. With my own eyes I have seen a woman cut up a dead carcass because her husband was in the army and would not return to his family for three years; that was in Austria. She did his work and did it well, too.

I have seen a woman and a dog harnessed to a cart drawing a drunken husband home from market to his house. Would I draw deductions from this, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania does from sporadic instances, that Austria, where I saw this sight, was, too, a country in which human happiness had ceased to exist? No, sir; if I want to know the condition of Austria I will take in the whole circle of its interests and its people, and I will draw my deductions from the incontrovertible evidence of large masses of facts.

VALUE OF TRADES-UNIONS.

In England these results thus given by Mr. Giffen have not been produced by free trade alone. I want the gentleman to understand this matter fully. The foundation was laid by free trade, but the result in its best estate was caused by trades-unions. Free trade made it possible for the trades-unions to organize and go to the masters and say, "Your contribution is capital, which is worth in business 5 or 10 per cent., as may be agreed; your other contribution is management and administration; that is worth a certain percentage, which is easily determined by the experience of the nation. The rest belongs to us, and we intend to have it." And they have got it. There is, however, one great deduction to which the British workman is subject, which does not apply to us, and that is the rent of the land, which is paid to the privileged classes, and is the heritage of a past age and an obsolete system of government, when the nobles were responsible for the defense of the country. But under the beneficent action of free trade in food, which opens the granaries of the world to British markets, rent is falling, privilege is dying, and the progress toward equality before the law is making rapid and satisfactory progress. That England is not retrograding, but is steadily increasing her industry, is proved by the fact that her annual output of coal, which measures her productive power, increases year by year, and that last year it exceeded by over 6,000,000 tons the product of the year before. That the people are in good condition is proved by the "sugar test," which is the best measure of the comfort of the great mass of the people. In 1883 the sugar consumed in Great Britain and Ireland was 67.3 pounds per capita of population; in the German Empire it was 18.3 pounds; in France it was 27.2 pounds; in the United States it was 43.25 pounds.

In a strike which I witnessed on the Brighton Railway in England I had an interview with one of the chief officers of the great Association of Amalgamated Engineers. I asked him what was the limit of the wages which they expected to get from the railway. He said: "There is no limit; we intend to have all the net earnings of these railways, except a fair remuneration for the capital actually invested and fair salaries for those who administer them; and the only question with us is how to find out what the amount is, and we intend to have it." That great association contained as its members all the engineers of Great Britain, numbering many thousands. It has a great fund in its treasury of nearly a million of dollars, and it has had as much as a million and a half dollars at one time.

It selects one concern at a time and puts the men there employed upon a strike until their demands have been acceded to. The hours of labor have been cut down by this process to fifty-five hours per week, and the wages of labor have been largely increased, for no man can say them "nay" within the limits of right and justice which they strive to observe.

With this example other trades have organized, and these trades have confederated together and now constitute a great congress. They met in 1881 when I was in London, and the figures of that time are the latest that I happen to have. There were one hundred and fifty-seven delegates in that congress, representing a constituency of 463,899 members. They met there to consider what could be done to raise the average condition of the British workmen. Their deliberations were conducted with a calmness, with a courage, with an intelligence that would do honor to this House or to any other deliberative body in the world. They did not seek to attack capital. They have learned that capital is their best friend, but they intend to make it their servant, and they can make it their servant.

There is a steady increase in the growth and influence of this great organization, but what concerns me here is to define the significance of such organizations. The labor of Great Britain to-day is practically pooled for the purpose of securing out of the products of industry the full portion which ought to be alloted to labor after paying current rate of interest upon capital and a proper remuneration for management. This result they have been able to accomplish. The rate of wages has steadily tended upward in Great Britain, and although much time has been lost in disputes ending in strikes, the result of the organization has been to introduce arbitration between the masters and men, so that strikes are becoming the exception rather than the rule in trade disputes. In these arbitrations the masters and the workmen meet upon equal terms. The result is a better understanding of each other's rights, interests, and duties, and out of which is slowly growing, through the agency of co-operation, the association of the workmen with the owners in ownership and management of the property.

That process is only at its beginning, but, thank God, the day is at hand, and will surely come in my time I hope, when workmen themselves will be the owners of all the machinery upon which they expend their daily toil, and shall themselves have whatever profits the God of Nature intended them to have as the fruit of their labor. [Applause.]

That process in England will precede its possibility in this country, but it will be there as a great example. In this country it can not begin until protection is broken down. I repeat that protection is in the nature of artificial friction causing so large a deduction from the earnings of labor as to prevent the accumulation of capital in the hands of workmen.

Hence I have changed my views. I have changed my views because I am a Democrat who believes that the welfare of the people is to be considered before the welfare of any single interest or of any single man. [Renewed applause.]

LAW OF THE REMUNERATION OF LABOR.

Let us try to measure the limit to which these organizations will enable the workmen to progress in securing for himself the largest possible remuneration for his labor. We have seen that after paying capital the natural resources of the country will determine the rate of wages of its workman when the markets of the world are opened for the free exchange of the fruits of his labor. Under natural laws they will be exchanged for the products of other countries where production is carried on under less favorable circumstances. The profits will therefore be the difference between the natural resources in the exchanging countries, and the whole of these profits belong and will surely come to the possession of the working classes unless they are obstructed artificially by the operation of law.

Hence Great Britain will exchange with all other countries, except the United States, at a rate which will enable her workmen to be better paid than the workmen of those countries, but the United States, having greater natural resources than Great Britain, will exchange with her and all the world upon still better terms. Hence our workmen under natural laws will be better paid than the workmen of Great Britain. But such a result is only possible with free trade, because the protective system prevents our products from going out into the markets of the world in free competition with those of Great Britain. Nor can the beneficent principle of association embodied in the trades-union system be available by the workmen of this country until they have free access to the open markets of the world by which alone they can avoid the paralysis of overproduction. I do not know that the manufacturer will gain by free trade; I do not know that the capitalist will gain by it; but I do know that the workman is suffering for the want of it, and that the improvement in his condition after it is achieved will be as marked and as satisfactory as that which has been accomplished in Great Britain during the last fifty years. And I know further that the workmen of this country will have no trouble to get their fair share of the profits of industry when they are put in the position, as now they are not, of making practical use of the principle of association, out of which in other departments have sprung the great triumphs of modern civilization.

To these conclusions I have been forced by my experience, by my observations carefully made at home and abroad, and by the conscientious study which I have given to the industrial and economic systems of other countries, and to the conclusions of the great thinkers of modern times. To one among these thinkers, Thorold Rogers, I commend the attention of the gentlemen who still believe in the efficacy of the protective system to promote the welfare of the wage-earning classes. His great treatise on "Work and Wages" has just appeared in England and in this country. He confirms in a most remarkable manner the conclusion which I have announced, that the wage-earning classes of the world have no hope except in freedom of trade, and in the organization of the trades-unions and labor partnerships. In that admirable work he has developed the remarkable fact that the reward for labor in Great Britain has just recovered to the point which it had attained in the fifteenth century, when through the agencies of the guilds, which were labor partnerships, labor was far better paid than at any time in the history of the human race. The progress to this conclusion was in his mind slow, as it has been in mine. Nevertheless, in a paper which I submitted to the church congress in 1878, I announced this conclusion and discussed the probable results to society. This paper I shall append to these remarks in the RECORD.

The proposition can no longer be successfully disputed that for the welfare and improvement in the condition of the workers for wages the principle of association in labor partnerships or trades-unions is indispensable, and offers a solution of the perplexing problem of the proper relations of capital and labor. But before this great solvent for human suffering can be applied, industry must be relieved from its shackles, and its products be freed from obstructive duties, which add to the cost so as to prevent free exchange.

HOW TO BEGIN THE REFORM.

Mr. Chairman, how would I begin this great reform? How would I bring about this magnificent policy, this redemption of the sons of toil from the servitude of ages? I believe that the protective system must go [applause], but it must go as it came, slowly, and by such wise and moderate steps as will commend themselves to the judgment of all fair-minded men.

To abolish protective duties at once would ruin me, it would ruin the manufacturers, it would dislocate the labor of this country now engaged in the protected manufactures. We have no right to inflict this wrong. Hence, with the views I entertain, I have not hesitated upon all occasions to confirm the statements of gentlemen upon the other side that this reform must be made slowly. I warn my friends upon this side not to proceed rashly. I warn them that any mistake they may make will be taken advantage of by the manufacturers to put down wages, and to persuade the workmen that we are their enemies, and not their friends.

There is only one method by which we can accomplish this great result. Remove duties where it is possible—and there is plenty of room—without injuring existing interests, and then the steady progress in the improvement of the condition of the working classes, especially in their regular employment, without loss of time, which is what they want now more than high wages—this steady progress will convince the workingmen that we are on the right road; and particularly will it convince them when they find that in the day of profits their trades-unions will be powerful enough to demand a better and fairer share of the earnings of industry.

I would begin with the raw materials. Gentlemen on the other side are very fond of repeating that phrase. Let me tell them that they have a constituency behind them that wants raw materials just as much as I do. Let me tell them that the manufacturers of New England are to-day perishing for the want of raw materials.*

And I know what I mean by "raw material." Gentlemen have chosen to pervert my definition of that phrase. I have defined it and I will define it again. For the purpose of tariff reform I mean by raw material those articles to which no process of manufacture has been applied.

Mr. SPRINGER. Or human labor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not say that. There are many raw materials which involve human labor; all of them, I believe, involve human labor. I would permit duties to begin when the process of manufacture has begun, not before. All the others I would put on the free-list, and I would put on it such manufactured articles as we do not make in this country. Of these tin plates is the most striking example.

And I know nothing that would suffer unless it be the wool of my friend from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE]. I do not believe it will suffer, but there is one class of wool which might be put on the free-list without any damage to the interest he represents. I mean carpet wools. Then I would limit duties. I would not have those excessive rates of duty which contradict the sense of justice of every man upon the Commit-

* No tax can be worse than that which is levied on a raw material, because, as a portion of the capital of the manufacturer is absorbed in paying the tax, and as this portion must secure a profit and be insured against risk not less than that which is employed in the purchase of raw material and the advance made for the wages of labor, and as this tax is levied at or before the commencement of the process, it will ramify through all stages of the manufacture, and appear as one accumulated impost to the consumer, the amount thus paid being far in excess of that received by the exchequer.

Furthermore, it is grossly unfair, being much more heavy on cheaper than on dearer stuffs. Nor can it easily be compensated when the same article may be imported from foreign countries in which no such tax exists, except by a duty which is almost prohibitive. And as raw materials are generally imported from countries which take manufactured goods in exchange, such a tax, as it diminishes consumption by an import duty unduly enhanced, seemingly impairs or counteracts foreign trade. The same objection applies to taxes on food, which are in effect taxes upon the raw material of human life. These taxes have this evil in addition: that they contribute to the exchequer only from what is imported, while they mulct the public in all that is consumed.—Thorold Rogers, Brande's Encyclopedia, article "Taxation," volume 3, page 710.

tee on Ways and Means. I would have rates beyond which no article on each schedule could go.

Then I would go before the people of the country and say: "We have begun the work of redemption; judge you 'the tree by its fruits.' Are you better employed? Have you steadier wages? Have you more of the comforts of life? If you have, then let us go on with the good work."

If it should turn out to be otherwise, then, Mr. Chairman, I would pause. I am not bigoted and prejudiced as once I was. I can be converted from opinions which I once held by the logic of facts and experience.

Mr. BRUMM. Will you allow me to ask a question? Your time is unlimited.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But my voice unhappily is not.

Mr. BRUMM. Only one question. Would the gentleman be in favor of repealing the conspiracy laws of this country?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Absolutely.

Mr. BRUMM. As they are in England?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Absolutely. They are a disgrace to the statute-book. I will go with the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any one else to the very end in giving the laborer the same rights before the law that he has before his God. I would deprive the workingman of no right which is enjoyed by his employer, but I would not allow him to injure his employer or other workmen by intimidation or violence. My grievance against the protective system is that it robs him of at least half of what he might have had, and probably of two-thirds of what he will have when the era of free trade prevails throughout the universal globe, and men and brothers may make exchanges with each other as if they were all the subjects of one government and one law. [Applause.]

HOW TO PROCEED.

Believing as I do that we have reached an era of permanent low prices, which will greatly benefit the masses of the people if we accommodate ourselves to the necessities of the situation, nevertheless I would proceed slowly, especially at the beginning, toward their accomplishment. I would follow the great example set us by Great Britain, which, in the legislation of the tariff of 1842, proceeded upon the doctrine: first, of freeing raw materials from duty; secondly, of a low rate of duty upon articles partially manufactured and of a higher rate of duty, there 20 per cent., but here necessarily higher upon completely manufactured articles. No interest would be injured by the application of these principles. The freeing of raw materials would be a benefit to every interest.

I have been reproached with desiring to get free iron ore, on the ground that I am a buyer of it and use it in my business, but the fact is that I rarely buy foreign iron ore, but am a miner and seller of American ore. I am fully protected against any differences in the cost of labor by the cost of transportation. I should be a gainer, however, by the larger market which would be secured to me if I could mix my ores freely with foreign ores. The result would enable us to produce cheaper iron, which would give new life to every branch of business in this country. The same statement is true as to the other ores of the metals. It is true as to ingot copper, which is a secondary product, for we are now able to export our copper in competition with all the world. The duty is a mere nullity and should be repealed, because if copper should rise in the markets of the world it would simply be a bonus paid out of the pockets of our consumers to a particular interest which has no need of it.

THE RESULT.

But, in view of the fact that public opinion is not yet well settled upon this question, and that the prejudices of the manufacturers and farmers and workmen are largely on the side of the protective system, I would not attempt to go as I have heretofore said, in advance of public opinion. I would begin at the foundation, and by removal of duties from the materials which enter into the protected industries, prepare a way for the gradual and final abolition of the duties upon the finished products. At every step of this process the condition of the workingmen of this country would improve, and when they once realize the beneficence of the progress toward free trade, the journey will be soon completed, and the United States will be emancipated from a system which is at war with the declaration of the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that it is designed "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

THE FINAL TRIUMPH.

The progress of the human race toward freedom has been slow and painful, but it has been sure, and in accordance with a well-defined law, now clearly traceable, in the history of man. It began with the struggle for freedom of thought, for the attainment of which we have to thank the Greeks. Although during the long night of the Middle Ages the light of intellectual liberty paled, and often took refuge in prisons and cloisters, it was never extinguished, but burned with new brilliancy in the era of the revival of learning. To-day a man may freely think, write, and publish the results of thought without the fear of man, and, if he choose, without the fear of God.

The next step in the great procession of the ages was the achievement of religious freedom, asserted by Luther, and sanctified by the blood of saints and martyrs. Liberty of conscience drove our fathers to the inhospitable wilds of America, where in its turn it gave birth to political freedom, the next creation in the Genesis of human liberty. The child grew, even in our free atmosphere, but slowly and only reached its full maturity when the proclamation of the martyred Lincoln gave political freedom to every human being, without regard to color, race, or previous condition, within the borders of our land.

Industrial freedom only remains to be secured in order to complete the glorious record of the advance of the human race from servitude to liberty. For such industrial freedom we have now entered upon the final struggle. To the student of history the result can not be doubtful. It may come by moderate reforms, as I hope, or it will come as comes the avalanche, overwhelming and crushing the obstacles in its path. It may be attained by reform, or it may come by revolution.

But when it is achieved the world will be lost in wonder at its beneficent results, in comparison with which the triumphs of intellectual, religious, and political liberty, which were its necessary progenitors, will be but as dust in the balance of advantage to the physical and social welfare of the families of men.

Let us try then to form some idea of what will be the actual condition of the human race, when the temple of freedom is thus completed with its final story of industrial liberty, to which it will be glory enough to have contributed a single stone, as I am striving this day to do.

The world will be filled with wealth, partly the accumulations of past ages, and more the product of the present age, when the genius of man has made him master of all the subtle forces of nature. Capital will be superabundant, and therefore cheap. It will be like the living water which the prophet of God struck from the rock. But capital will then be the servant, and no longer the master, of labor. Labor will no longer be hired by capital, but will hire it. It will no longer work for wages, but for profits, which will be proportioned to the natural resources of each country, without deduction for the support of special classes of men, or for the advantage of special interests at the expense of the general welfare. All privilege will cease, and all men will be equal before the law, as they are before the Creator. They will differ only in physical and mental endowments, and each will be paid according to his work. Men will become more and more individualized and the property of each will thus be better defined and scrupulously respected; but the divine law that "we shall love our neighbors as ourselves" will then receive a new significance, because the force and habit of association in great industrial enterprises, wherein men have a common interest, will teach them to bear each other's burdens, as well as to respect each other's rights.

In such a state of society there will be still rich and poor, there will still be good and bad, but with the law of justice all-powerful, and legalized robbery unknown, jealousies will disappear, charity will increase, and the world, ceasing to be a pandemonium in which men are struggling with each other like demons for the possession of property, will become a paradise in which the primal curse has been converted into a final blessing.

This is no dream of an enthusiast, for I am a plain man of business, nor is it an excursion into the realms of Utopia, for I have been trained to weigh and measure the results of human action. It is a sober deduction from the study of the operation of the principle of association, which has crowned this age with material achievements of stupendous grandeur and beneficence, which is invading and taking possession of every domain of human affairs. It has already begun to organize labor for its emancipation from the bondage of ages, and it will be found as easy of application, and as fruitful of benefit, in this final field of action, as it has been triumphant and beneficent in other spheres of social development. [Great applause.]

BUSINESS DEPRESSION AND REVENUE REFORM.

A letter addressed by Abram S. Hewitt to the Albany Argus, December 26, 1883.

NEW YORK, December 26, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter, in which you say: "The Argus is now engaged in an inquiry into the causes and effect of the present depression of the iron industry. It is especially desired to be known what relation this state of things bears to existing tariff conditions." You ask my opinion in reference to these points.

I answer that the proximate cause of the present depression of the iron industry is to be found in the fact that the capacity for producing iron is in excess of its actual consumption, not only in this country but in those foreign countries which are large producers of iron and steel. When the supply exceeds the demand prices fall. Establishments which can not produce at the current prices without loss are compelled to suspend operations, and thus comes the actual depression to which you refer. The ultimate causes of such a state of things are unusually manifold; sometimes they are too obscure to be discovered with certainty. For example, the influence of abundant harvests or of a failure of crops upon the general condition of industry is unquestioned. Yet these very causes may produce prosperity in some branch of business while they produce depression in others. So in regard to the influence of tariff legislation. If duties are suddenly raised at a time when there is a demand for the foreign product, prices will go up and the iron business will be prosperous. If on the other hand duties are reduced so as to admit of a larger supply of the foreign product, the domestic business will be for the time being unfavorably affected and depression will result.

These, however, are only immediate and temporary effects. As a matter of fact, prior to 1878, under the highest tariff ever known in this country, we had a long period of depression in the iron business. But about that time railway enterprises were undertaken on a large scale, producing a sudden demand for more iron and steel than the world was prepared to supply. Prices advanced all over the world, and to these prices was added the very high rate of duty then prevailing upon foreign iron brought into this country. The profits of the domestic business became excessive, and the owners of existing works proceeded to enlarge their capacity to the utmost, in order to gather this harvest of great profits, while new capital was attracted into a field in which the returns were known to be abnormally large. The business being thus overdone, a glut of iron resulted, and the reaction has brought about a state of things even worse than that which existed prior to 1878.

The evil from which we now suffer is, therefore, largely due to the fact that the war tariff imposed higher duties than were needed for protection, thus giving excessive profits to the manufacturers in a period when the profits would have been large enough without such high protective duties. We are suffering from unnatural stimulation which aggravated the excitement when the public interest required that it should be allayed, and now aggravates the depression by the excessive capacity for production which it engendered. How long this depression will continue no man can predict. But inasmuch as eras of prosperity and depression succeed each other in cycles, it is certain that sooner or later we shall come again to the period when the demand for iron will exceed the supply. Unless our revenue legislation be meanwhile reformed we shall then have a repetition of the experience through which we passed since 1878, an experience which shows that excessive profits are in reality of no real benefit either to the manufacturers, except in rare instances, or to the country at large, while the evils resulting from them are serious. They are especially injurious to the workingmen of the country, who are the chief sufferers when the inevitable reaction to unnatural expansion narrows the field of employment for labor.

The lesson to be derived from this experience is that the duties on all kinds of iron should never exceed the lowest possible point which, in time of depression, will protect the domestic market from the flood of foreign iron which otherwise might be poured into its lap. Such rates of duty, provided they are specific, will on the average yield the largest amount of revenue, because when the price rises and the producer no longer needs protection, the consumer, who does need protection, can then supply his wants at a fair price in the foreign market without paying an increased duty, if he can not get equally fair terms at home.

Moreover, the experience of all commercial nations has shown that moderate specific duties afford the only safeguard against frauds in the revenue, as well from smuggling as from undervaluation in the invoices. The blind adherence to ad valorem duties in our existing tariff has only served to throw the importing trade into the hands of foreigners and to drive out reputable American houses from this business.

The reduction of extra-protective duties to a reasonable standard of specific duties is therefore the only practicable means of avoiding an unhealthy expansion of business when it is active. Extra-protective duties merely result in overproduction, in the general derangement of industry, and in consequent suffering to the workingmen by the loss of employment and the reduction of wages. They must be made to realize that the only fund out of which their wages can be paid is produced by the money which is received for the product of industry. Out of this fund must first be paid the cost of the raw material and next the remuneration for the capital employed in the work of production. What remains is the amount available for the payment of wages. Hence the cheaper we can get raw materials and capital the more we can pay for the labor engaged in manufactures. High rates of interest and high-priced raw materials mean therefore lower wages for labor, while cheap raw materials and cheap capital mean higher wages for labor. The workingmen thus have an interest, direct and immediate, in removing the duty from raw materials, as well in the iron business as in every other branch of industry carried on in this country. By raw materials I mean fuel, all food products, all materials to which no process of manufacture has been applied, all metallic ores, and all waste products which are fit only to be manufactured.

So far as any relief can be provided by legislation for the existing state of affairs the remedy must be found, first, in freeing raw materials from all duties; and, secondly, in imposing rates of duty on manufactured products not more than sufficient to make good the difference in the amount paid for labor in the production of any given article in this country, as compared with the amount paid for the same labor in other countries with which we compete. For this purpose the incidental protection afforded by revenue duties will, as a rule, be found sufficient when any protection is needed.

I am aware that this last proposition involves the protective idea to some extent, but to no greater extent than is the logical outgrowth of our past legislation. If we had never had protection we should not be required to pay any attention to the question of rates of labor, which are the result, not of protection, but of other conditions entirely independent of legislation. But the protective system has undoubtedly built up some branches of industry which otherwise might not, in consequence of the higher rate of wages, have existed. Inasmuch as this is their misfortune and not their fault, no sensible legislator would strike these industries down by the sudden abrogation of the protective system. We should, nevertheless, endeavor gradually to reduce its evils to a minimum, until in the progress of time it shall have given way, under natural laws, to a better and sounder condition of affairs.

But in this assurance of inevitable progress there is to be found no justification for the further maintenance of duties which only tend to reduce the wages of labor without conferring benefit on any interest whatever; duties which only impair our ability to sell commodities in the open markets of the world, and hinder the natural and healthy growth of business. All such unnecessary and hurtful obstructions should be removed without delay, and it will be a mockery of duty if Congress should fail to open the way to "freer trade" and wider markets for our products through any fear of consequences to politicians who have not the courage of their convictions, or have no other convictions than the desire for office. The mere politician follows public opinion; the true statesman instructs it. His constant aim should be to make clear to those who depend upon their daily labor for their daily bread the real basis upon which their welfare rests, and then to trust to their intelligence and votes for support. Success on any other condition would be dishonor. Any party which expects to get power by playing the game of "hide and seek" in politics does not deserve and will not gain the confidence of the country.

The only living issue, then, between the two great political parties which divides the country, as I understand it, is this: whether the revenue system shall be reformed and upon what basis of principle it shall be settled.

The Republican party believes in the doctrine of protection for the sake of protection. It insists that protective duties are constitutional, and are necessary in order to insure to the workingmen a fair remuneration for their labor. It would, therefore, impose duties as nearly prohibitory as possible on articles produced in this country, and as a policy make free those articles which are not or can not be produced here.

The Democratic party insists that the Constitution merely provides for the imposition of duties for revenue, and not for protection, except so far as duties so imposed necessarily afford incidental protection; that protective duties can not and do not favorably affect the general rate of wages; that legislation is powerless to permanently increase the remuneration for labor, although it may seriously impair it; that protection can only divert labor and capital from more profitable into less profitable channels of industry. It recognizes, however, the fact that the protective system has been so long in force and is so intrenched in judicial construction as to make it idle now to raise the constitutional question; that the amount of capital and labor now engaged in the protected industries is too great to admit of any legislation likely to do them any real injury; that the only reform now possible is in the reduction and removal of duties which are no longer needed to insure their continued existence; that these excessive duties are in reality obstructive to their prosperity; that duties on raw materials should be removed, because such duties constitute a practical deduction from the wages of labor. If the question were an open one the Democratic party would prefer to raise the public revenue by duties imposed upon articles not produced in this country, and trust to natural laws for the development of its industries. But the question is foreclosed by the great extent of the protected industries, replacing dead industries which otherwise would have thriven.

The Democratic party recognizing the necessity, therefore, of reforming the tariff in such a way as not to deprive these industries of the incidental protection afforded by reasonable revenue duties, insists that the protective system shall not be enlarged, and believes that moderate duties producing, on the average of years, a sufficient revenue, are adequate for protection at the only times when protection is needed—that is, in bad times, when our foreign competitors would seek to get rid of their surplus product in our markets, which, considering that an idle population is the greatest social calamity, we must then preserve, in order to give employment to our labor engaged in the protected industries; that at all other periods extra-protective duties merely give excessive profits to one class at the expense of other classes, ending in overproduction, stagnation of business and irregular employment for labor, powerless to protect itself against the errors of legislation and selfish action of capital striving for unreasonable profits. The condition of the business of the country at this time is conclusive proof that the protective system can not relieve either labor or capital from the consequences of overproduction, which is its legitimate result.

Between the political parties representing these two opposing views the country is soon to make its choice. The Republican party offers no remedy for the policy which has produced the existing paralysis of industry. The Democratic party proposes to open the way to freer markets, fuller trade, and better wages, by abolishing the duties on raw materials and removing the purely obstructive features of the tariff. If the Democratic House shall frame and pass a judicious measure of revenue reform, carefully adjusted to the actual condition of our suffering industries, and the Republican Senate shall refuse to concur, the issue will be fairly joined. The people can then decide whether the do-nothing party now in power shall be replaced by an administration which will remove the artificial barriers to healthy progress. When this is done, and not till then, will the country realize that it is no longer an infant at nurse, but a veritable giant, only requiring "ample room and verge enough" for the free play of its vast energies.

Sincerely, yours, ABRAM S. HEWITT.

B.

The Mutual Relations of Capital and Labor, a paper read at the church congress, in Cincinnati, October 18, 1878, by Abram S. Hewitt.

The three cardinal and unchangeable facts of humanity are the individual, the family, and society. There is and can be no other basis for government or religion. The fundamental characteristic of the individual is personal liberty; of the family, love; and of society, justice. Personal liberty implies equality of rights and contains the germ of individual property, while justice implies its equitable distribution; and this distribution can only rest upon the axiom, To each according to his work. The problem, therefore, presented to systems of religion and schemes of government is, to make men who are equal in liberty—that is, in political rights, and therefore entitled to the ownership of property—content with that inequality in its distribution which must inevitably result from the application of the law of justice.

In the solution of this problem, all the ancient religions and governments absolutely failed. Briefly summed up, their progress was either from equality of property under the patriarchal system, or from equality of political rights under the early and rude democracies, into despotism in which no rights were respected, involving the almost total destruction of civilization, and ending in the long night of the Middle Ages. With the Christian religion, and the governments which have been based upon it as a foundation, the results have been directly the reverse. Christianity co-ordinates the individual, the family, and society into one harmonious scheme. It addresses itself to the personal conscience only, and its whole scope and efficacy is toward the developement of the individual in all directions—physical, intellectual, and moral and spiritual. But the necessity for association in order to achieve results is not merely enjoined, but is the cardinal principle upon which the Church itself is constituted. Individualism and association thus go hand in hand in the march of progress; and it is a most suggestive fact that in ancient times no considerable development of industry was ever achieved, and the reason is that either the energies of the individual were deprived of free play, or society was so organized that men could not work together in peace and harmony.

Looking back over the eighteen centuries since the Christian doctrine was first preached, it is not difficult to discover the methods by which its results have been accomplished; but to one of the apostles looking forward into the centuries which have now passed it was impossible to comprehend or to predict by what means Christianity would work out its beneficent purpose. So, throughout the whole course of its history, its most devoted adherents, its ablest expounders, have not only mostly failed to discover its drift, but have frequently resisted its march of progress, as we now see, toward the successive steps by which it is developing itself into the fullness of its beneficence.

Let two illustrations suffice to prove this proposition. If individual liberty is to be maintained, then government must rest upon the consent of the governed. To this proposition is opposed the principle of the divine right of kings to govern; and yet until within a century this theory was maintained by the ablest men in the Church. Nevertheless, the right of the people to govern themselves asserted itself by silent and irresistible progress, based upon the growing convictions of mankind, until at last the whole theory of a divine right to govern was overthrown in a cataclysm of blood at the close of the last century.

And so with personal slavery. When Christ began to preach a large portion of the human race was in bondage. He incited no insurrections. On the contrary, He counseled obedience to the law. Nevertheless, He preached a doctrine which of its own innate power has sufficed, by slow and silent growth, to undermine the foundations upon which the right of property in man was upheld, and in our own day and generation the last stronghold surrendered; and henceforth the equality of men as to political rights will not be seriously controverted. And yet, during the 1,800 years which have been required for the accomplishment of this result of Christian doctrine, many of the ablest and best men in the Church resisted the operation of that silent law, which has at length secured to man the liberty with which Christ intended to make him free.

These primary steps in the Christian scheme, namely, the establishment of the right of men to govern themselves and to own and control the fruits of their own labor, may thus be said to have been only completed in our own day.

GROWTH OF WEALTH.

With the recognition of these rights has come a vast increase in the amount of wealth, which it is the object of society to accumulate and distribute. This growth in wealth is, so far as we can judge, the direct result of the physical, political, and mental enfranchisement of man. His energies, now for the first time unshackled, have penetrated into the boundless storehouse of nature, captured the invisible forces which have heretofore guarded her treasures, and subjugated them to the service of the human race. But whether it be due to this cause or not, it is a fact that the growth of wealth has been contemporaneous with the enlargement of personal freedom.

The question of the distribution and ownership of property has always been one of primary concern to the human race, but when property is suddenly and enormously increased in amount the question assumes a proportionably increased importance and is surrounded with increased difficulties. Even if it be admitted that the existing system of distribution at any given time is equitable, it does not follow that upon a sudden development of wealth from new sources and by new agencies the old methods of distribution would continue to be just.

Hence controversies are inevitable. In ancient times these controversies resulted in intestine war and the destruction of government and society. In Christian times these controversies have not resulted in social disintegration; but, on the contrary, the social forces have been steadily developed and strengthened. The explanation of this difference is to be found in the fact that Christ based the organization of society upon the principle of justice, and whatever differences may have existed as to what justice requires, the conscience of society has come more and more to recognize the fact that it is to be done at whatever cost to vested interests, and the progress of society shows conclusively that there is a steady advance in the direction of justice.

LABOR AND WAGES.

The difficulties of the situation are, however, enormously increased by the fact of the comparatively recent enfranchisement of so large a portion of the human race. They have achieved liberty, but they have not inherited property, which is the fruit of liberty. The principles upon which they are to receive their share of the results of human effort have not only not been defined, but they have only begun to receive attention. Until the modern development of industry the compensation of labor had but little reference to what the labor might produce. The slave, the serf, the bondsman, was fed and clothed, and when freed he inherited the custom of being fed and clothed. Hence what may be termed the custom of wages was based upon what the laborer required to keep him in a condition for efficient labor. Anything beyond this limit he could get only from the conscience of his employer or by the force of his own will. The power of isolated men to resist and overcome the force of custom is very slight. No radical or even appreciable change can be effected except by a union among those who believe themselves aggrieved. In other words, the principle of association must be invoked in order to produce any marked departure from prevailing practice.

THE CONFLICT.

Given, then, a state of things in which the wealth was in the hands of one class, who necessarily became the employers of labor instead of being its owners; and the muscular power in the possession of another class, possessing nothing besides muscle, and who, out of the common results of the employment of capital and labor, obtained only a bare subsistence, notwithstanding it was apparent that there was a steady increase in the amount of wealth, which, instead of being equitably distributed, was all appropriated by the employing class—it was inevitable, as it was just, that a struggle should arise to enforce a different ratio of distribution.

What is known as the conflict between capital and labor has thus a natural origin, and so far from being a subject of regret, it is to be welcomed as evidence of a healthy and growing vital force in the organization of society. It is an effort to correct an abuse; for, however ready we may be to admit that there must be inequality in the distribution of property proportioned to the contribution of each individual to its accumulation, no one has ever pretended that the entire surplus should go to one class at the expense and to the deprivation of another class. I know that natural laws are relied upon by the economists to effect this distribution, and I am not prepared to say that these natural laws might not assert themselves by some other methods than those which we find adopted by the contending forces of society. My purpose is rather to show the way in which the problem is being solved, and to insist upon it that this particular way is not to be resisted and objected to because the abstract thinkers of the world would prefer some other method.

STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS.

What is the method of solution which we find in process of execution? The working classes think they do not receive their fair share of the proceeds of productive industry. As individuals they ask for more. The demand is refused. They combine; they call themselves a "trades-union." As a union they ask for more. The demand is again refused. They decline to continue to labor; in other words, they strike. Capital ceases to earn profit, and labor ceases to earn wages. Capital can feed upon itself for a time. Labor can not. The strike fails, and labor has made no progress in obtaining what it believes to be its just rights. Labor takes a lesson from capital. It saves money from its scanty earnings as a reserve fund to sustain itself while in a condition of strike. Then, when sufficiently strong, it repeats the experiment. Sometimes it is successful, and sometimes it is not. The reserve is generally exhausted before success is achieved, and labor falls back, sullen, defeated, but resolute. The lesson of association is not lost. The unions in different trades combine and make common cause with each other, and when one union goes into a strike the others assist. Thus they become a great power, and capital at length comprehends that profit can no longer be realized except by the consent of labor, and labor comprehends that while it can deprive capital of profit, it can only do so through an amount of personal suffering which tries the human heart to its utmost capacity, because it addresses itself to that love which is the foundation of the human family, and is a co-ordinating element in the constitution of society.

Up to this point the progress has only been attended with evil, just as the progress of mankind toward free government, and toward the enfranchisement of men was by a pathway strewn with the wrecks of human hopes, and marked by sacrifices and calamities which no pen can describe. But one good result has been achieved. Labor is thoroughly organized and marshaled on the one side, while capital is combined on the other; each powerful to destroy the other if they work together in harmony. The contending forces are thus in a condition to treat. The great result achieved is that capital is ready to discuss. It is not to be disguised that until labor presented itself in such an attitude as to compel a hearing capital was not willing to listen, but now it does listen. The results already attained are full of encouragement; the way to a condition of permanent peace appears to have been opened.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION.

The first step was taken about fifteen years ago, when the principle of conciliation was successfully adopted at Nottingham. Conciliation necessarily led to arbitration, and as the direct result of conciliation and arbitration the necessity for strikes has been very largely diminished, so that it may now be affirmed that while strikes still take place they are the exception and not the rule. Let it not be supposed, however, that conciliation and arbitration are other than transitional means for bringing about the ultimate relations of peace and harmony which must exist between capital and labor before the vast evils which accompany modern industry can be eliminated or materially circumscribed.

Before attempting to point out the road which the law of Christian progress seems to be taking in this direction, I desire to re-enforce what I have already said in regard to the power of trades-unions, singly and in combination, by a few figures. The strongest of the trades-unions in England is the Amalgamated Society of Engineers. They were organized in 1851. They have passed through many strikes. Sometimes they have failed and sometimes they have succeeded. They began with an accumulated fund of £1,700. The growth of this fund has varied, as a matter of course, with the demands which have been made upon it to sustain the members of the union during a strike; but the practical result is that in 1876 the fund in hand amounted to over £275,000, and the number of members, which began with 11,617, had risen to 44,578. The Society of Boiler-Makers and Ship-Builders in ten years have accumulated a fund of £45,000. The Society of Carpenters and Joiners in sixteen years have accumulated a fund of £74,000. At the general trades-union congress held at Leicester, in 1877, one hundred and twelve of these Unions were represented, with a membership of 691,089 persons.

These figures make it apparent that a new power has entered into the industrial world which must be recognized. It is also apparent that this power can not be destroyed by force or violence unless society be destroyed with it. It must be heard. Its just demands must be heeded. This is the voice of reason as well as of religion.

WEALTH AND CAPITAL.

What are these demands, and how far are they just? In order to answer this question we must penetrate a little deeper into the true nature of what is called the conflict between capital and labor, and we must define what we mean by capital. All wealth is not capital. So far as this discussion is concerned, and so far as regards the conflict of which we are speaking, capital may be defined to be that portion of the wealth of society which is employed in the work of production and distribution. Outside of this portion of human wealth there is a vast fund which is otherwise employed, in ministering to the wants, the luxuries, the tastes, the charities of mankind.

Now, when a strike takes place it is in fact a contest between the laborers and not labor, on the one hand, and the employer, and not capital, upon the other hand. In fact, the employer is not always, nor indeed in the majority of cases is he, the owner of the capital which he uses. Sometimes he owns none of it. It may be all borrowed; and as a matter of fact some of it, to the extent of the current wages due and unpaid, is always borrowed from the very men whom he employs. No conflict, therefore, between capital and labor ever really takes place, nor indeed is it possible for it to occur. Between the individual who labors and the fruits of his labor there can in the nature of things be no conflict. The very object of his labor is to acquire these fruits, which we call capital, and the possession of this capital is necessary for increasing the productiveness of his labor. If this be true of any one man, it is true of all the men who make up society. Therefore, whether the individual or society be considered, there is no antagonism and there can be no conflict between capital and labor. The utmost that can happen is that they each cease to earn anything. Great suffering always results to the laborers, and very often ruin to the employer; and yet so far as labor and capital are concerned, while they are paralyzed for the time being, they are not capable of rendering anything to each other but benefit. Still, there is a conflict going on—a conflict which the employer, as a rule, is powerless to mitigate, and which may ruin him, although he be the owner of no capital. In other words, the employer is often the victim of circumstances over which he has no control, and of an antagonism which he rarely understands.

What is it that labor really aims to accomplish? It is to transfer to itself a larger portion of the proceeds of the business. If it succeeds, this portion must be taken either from the capital itself or from the profits of the business which have heretofore been appropriated to capital. It can not be taken from the capital without either impairing the ability of the employer to pay wages or compelling him to suspend business altogether, in which event labor fails utterly to attain its object. If, therefore, a concession is made by the employer which impairs the capital and he continues business, the impairment must be filled up from some outside source, and that source can only be that portion of human wealth which was not previously employed in the work of production and distribution. If, on the other hand, the demand of labor is met out of the profits, then the amount conceded is taken from that portion which would have been transferred from capital to this outside fund. In either case, therefore, the result is to withdraw a portion of the outside fund not in use as capital, and transfer it to labor. The conflict, then, is a struggle for the ownership, not of active capital, but of that portion of the wealth of society which is used for other than productive purposes. In its essence, therefore, the conflict is between riches and poverty, and an attempt to change the existing ownership of wealth.

RICHES AND POVERTY.

We are thus brought face to face with the great underlying question whether property is equitably distributed. What are the facts? We find society practically divided into four classes. First, the very rich, who live without labor upon the proceeds of realized property, with superabundant means which they are free to employ either as capital in business or to minister to their own desires, whether commendable or censurable. Second, the great middle class, who know neither poverty nor great riches, who are as a rule engaged in useful employments, who have more or less of the comforts and luxuries of life, and who are above the reach of want. Third, the industrious working classes, who possess little property, but who gain a decent livelihood for themselves and their families by their daily labor. They may be said to be poor only in the sense that they are liable to be reduced to want by sickness or by the chances and changes of business depriving them of the opportunity to work. Fourth, the paupers, who neither work nor care to work.

If the first and fourth classes should cease to exist, humanity would not have cause to shed many tears. The problem, then, which society finds itself forced to solve, is engaged in solving, is the mode of getting rid of these two extreme classes without revolution and without injustice. The relations of the second and third classes would be readily adjusted, because the transition from one to the other is not only very easy, but very constant. The ties between them are often the ties of family. Their interests are identical, and their relations to each other are such as can be and are substantially regulated by the principles of justice. As between them, it is scarcely necessary to discuss the limitations of wealth. But when we come to consider the position of the very rich, we are met by the self-evident fact that they possess and control an amount of property which is far beyond the capacity of any class of human beings of their limited number to contribute by their own efforts to the sum total of human wealth. In fact the present possessors have rarely accumulated the fortunes which they control. The possession of superfluous riches will not stand the test of human justice; and in affirming this I only repeat the conclusions to which the greatest thinkers and the best men who have ever lived have invariably been driven. But even if it were not re-enforced by such authority, it is in accordance with the whole spirit and temper of the teachings of Christ himself. He nowhere condemns the ownership of property. On the contrary, when he tells us that the poor we shall have always with us, He expressly recognizes that there will be inequalities in the ownership of property. He states it as a fact. But He nowhere says that we shall always have the rich with us, and the spiritual danger of great riches is repeatedly enforced.

I use the word "rich" as the Savior used it—in the sense of the possession of superfluous wealth. I do not pretend to say what is superfluous. It is not necessary for this discussion, nor do I think it will ever come within the province of legislation to decide that question. I think it will be settled by the action of causes now in operation, by which a larger portion of the accumulated wealth of society will be transferred from the class of the very rich to the class of the industrious poor, and that the struggle which we call the conflict of capital and labor will slowly and surely effect this transfer by the gradual growth of a better understanding between employers and employed, out of which will gradually come a different ownership of capital from that which now obtains.

CHANGE OF OWNERSHIP.

How can this change of ownership be effected? Already the employers and the employed meet upon the equal ground of open discussion. Already they endeavor to persuade each other to conciliate opposing interests. Failing in this, they arbitrate, and, in order that the arbitration may be just, the employers at length produce their books of account and submit their ability to pay to the decision of a fair tribunal. On the other hand, the workingmen are free to proclaim their grievances and to assert their rights. They submit them to the arbitrament of reason; they accept the award of the tribunal; and it is to their everlasting honor that in no single instance have they ever refused to abide by the award. Having got upon the common ground of free and open discussion, it is not a difficult step to reach the ground of joint ownership. As business is now organized, the workmen do not participate directly in the profits, but they have a first lien upon the profits; in other words, they must be paid before any surplus remains for capital. If they desire to participate in profits directly this prior lien must be given up, and its abandonment will demand far greater intelligence on the part of the workingmen than they have yet displayed. But they are rapidly advancing in all the qualities which go to form the basis of intelligent action. Better elementary education and larger privileges in the exercise of the elective franchise, and the acquisition of political knowledge and sound economic principles through the agency of night colleges, mechanics' institutes and workingmen's clubs, will soon prepare the way which will lead them to make the temporary sacrifice required to effect the great change in their social status which must inevitably attend the ownership of capital.

I shall be told (and I fully appreciate the force of the objection) that there are great difficulties in the way of associating employés in the ownership of the business in which they labor. So long as human industry is mainly controlled by individuals or firms composed of individuals, and so long as the laws impose individual liability upon all the partners for the acts of any partner, it will be impossible to associate a miscellaneous mass of workmen in the ownership of the business. But in England the old legislation has been entirely reformed, with the view to admit of such joint ownership upon almost any terms that may be agreed upon. In this country we need additional legislation, but in both countries there is one fact which points the way to an easy solution of the whole question, and that fact is the enormous growth of corporations for the conduct of industrial enterprises.

CORPORATIONS.

Here, again, I detect one of those unseen agencies which so often in the progress of Christian development have been opposed, deplored, condemned by the best and wisest men, and yet go on gaining in spite of opposition and resistance until they absorb the whole field of action. Although it is not fifty years since the first industrial corporation was organized, to-day corporations control more than half, if not two-thirds, of the manufacturing business of the world. It may be therefore assumed that the corporative principle is a necessity for the development of society and for placing its products upon a basis of equitable division. To attack corporations, therefore, as is still the fashion, is, so far as I can see, to attack that phase of human organization which offers the best promise for the advancement of the working classes. Of course corporations are liable to abuses, and in the early stages of their existence they assume powers which they should never possess. They develop evils, just as strikes have produced great suffering, although the end is seen to have been beneficent. Such evils are incident to progress under all circumstances.

The most conspicuous example is to be found in the introduction of machinery, which has conferred benefactions upon mankind quite beyond the possibility of estimate. With the growth of machinery has come the displacement of labor and the growth of pauperism, evils almost intolerable, and yet by no means comparable to the greater evils which would spring from the abolition of machinery, the result of which would be universal pauperism. Because new agencies produce evils we must not lose sight of the greater good of which they are capable, and which in reality they accomplish. Now the corporate principle is the only one which admits of the association of labor and capital upon the basis of an ownership distributed among those who contribute either capital or labor. Such an ownership is indispensable not merely to harmony, but to the achievement of the largest possible results and the equitable distribution of the products of human industry.

JOINT OWNERSHIP.

This division of ownership must, however, spring not from charity, but from mutual interest. The present owners begin to see that profits are impossible on the existing system, and labor is becoming sufficiently intelligent to understand that it must rely for compensation upon what the business can afford to pay. But until labor becomes an owner it never will understand the capacity of the business to pay. Heretofore great fortunes have been achieved mostly by monopoly of some sort or other, but the days of monopoly are now numbered. Even secrets are no longer kept, and the monopoly of a secret is limited by the duration of the patent. The exact condition not only of any particular business, but of business of all kinds, is now generally understood, and will become more and more the common property of society. In no respect is the influence of the press more potent than in this direction.

Henceforth the great object to be aimed at in the industrial world is rather steadiness and stability of business than excessive or spasmodic profits. When those who labor also become interested as owners it will be easy to adapt the business to the conditions required for steady work; and the habit of association, not only between workmen and employers, but between different organizations engaged in the same kinds of business, will go far to mitigate the evils of the competitive system, by placing checks upon reckless production involving sales at a loss, and by united efforts to extend the markets through the promotion of increased consumption. In fact, increased consumption will necessarily result from the greater intelligence and improved condition of the working classes. It is idle to deny that self-respect usually increases with the possession of property. Property is a humanizing and refining agency. Increased production means lower prices, and lower prices mean increased consumption; and thus there is an entire harmony between the two agencies which are most concerned in the improvement of the condition of mankind.

In order that this joint ownership may be brought about, it is necessary, first, that the employers shall see that it is to their advantage to encourage the workingmen to become interested directly in the business; and, secondly, that the workingmen shall take the necessary steps to become owners. This they can only do by abstinence, which is the parent of capital. They must save in order to have. Their capacity for saving is far greater than is generally supposed, even out of the scanty earnings which they receive in times of depression. It is a matter of record that in the Schulze Delitsch organizations in Germany the workingmen who have become the owners of those successful and wonderful institutions, founded on the principle of "self-help," saved out of their small gains as much as 40 per cent. for a series of years together; and when one reflects upon the vast expenditures of the working classes in all civilized countries for tobacco, liquor, and other indulgences, which, to say the least, are productive of no advantage to them, it is easy to see that in a single year a large fund could be accumulated for investment in business enterprises, and that in a generation the whole capital invested in industrial undertakings might be transferred to the wage-earning class.

THE MISSION OF THE CHURCH.

How are these results to be hastened? That they will come in the ordinary course of society I do not doubt, any more than I doubt the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. But the Church and its ministers, and above all its intelligent laymen engaged in affairs, can hasten the good time coming by efforts to enlighten both those who employ and those who are employed; to point out that though these are evil times, yet they are not so evil as the times which have gone before; that there has been a steady, irresistible, unmistakable progress in the amelioration of the condition of mankind and the relations of men to each other; that the industrial strife which has been so conspicuous in our day, instead of being an indication of the decay and disintegration of society, is the evidence of progress toward a better state of things; and that the questions presented, although difficult at first, grow clearer and clearer day by day, and are advancing to a solution which should comfort the patriot, console the philanthropist, and encourage the Christian.

I am aware that the unrest and agitations which prevail throughout the Christian world have caused great anxiety and apprehension in the minds of good men, amounting almost to despair of the future of the human race. The growth of communism is cited as a discouraging omen for the future, but I have said enough to show that communism is not possible in the Christian scheme as it has been developing itself for the last eighteen centuries; that the growth has been altogether toward individualism, and, individualism being secured, toward that kind of association, and that kind only, which preserves the individual right to liberty and property. Some point with despair to the depressed condition of modern industry, and conclude that the social structure is about to fall. They cite the excess of commodities which has been produced by the association of capital and labor, the lack of employment consequent thereon, and the widespread suffering which unquestionably prevails, as evidence that civilization is a failure. The fact is, that the energies of men have been almost altogether directed to the work of production. They have heretofore had no occasion to consider the question of proper distribution. In the nature of things the question of distribution can not become pressing until there is a very great surplus of production to be divided.

Society, in reference to commodities, is to-day in precisely the situation in which China and India find themselves in regard to food. There is a famine in portions of those countries, although there is a surplus of food in other portions adequate for entire relief. Between the two, however, there is no proper means of communication or distribution. This was formerly the case in Europe; but food famines in Europe are now unknown, because channels of communication have been opened in all directions, and to-day England imports two-thirds of all the food which she consumes, and yet is under no apprehension for the future. So in regard to commodities there is an industrial famine prevailing in one portion of society, an absolute want and destitution of those very commodities which are in great excess in other portions of society. In other words, we have the very rich and the very poor. Surely if man is equal to the task of distributing food he is equal to the task of overcoming the causes which lead to such industrial famines. The work in either case is the same—that of distribution; and I have endeavored to show that this problem has already presented itself as the great question of the age, and that it is in process of solution by the agencies of association between workmen and employers, to be carried farther into more intimate association as copartners not merely in production, but in the division of the proceeds of their joint labor.

The evils, therefore, under which the world suffers are incidental to its progress, and in fact compel progress. Indeed, it would not be difficult to show that the evils in any one age are mainly produced by the remedies which society has adopted to cure the greater evils of a previous age. In other words, the evils are transitory, the benefits are permanent, and the result of the whole is to place humanity upon a higher plane of intelligence, justice, and consequent happiness.

CONCLUSIONS.

The points which I have sought to enforce are, that the great question now pending is the equitable ownership of property, and that no ownership which does not conform to the principles of justice will be tolerated by society.

That the present distribution of wealth does not conform to the principles of justice.

That distribution has been undergoing a change during the whole Christian era, and that this change has been to distribute the ownership more and more over the great mass of society; in other words, that of all the wealth of he world there is a larger percentage to-day held by the majority of mankind than at any previous period in the history of the world.

That this progress toward a more equitable distribution must result in the diminution of great fortunes, the improved condition of the poorer classes, and the consequent extinction of pauperism.

That the conflict between capital and labor, which has assumed such prominence in our day, resulting in strikes, conciliation, and arbitration, is a healthful but transitional stage toward a more intimate and beneficent association of capital and labor through the corporative principle.

That in the nature of things it would seem that corporations must continue to grow and absorb the great bulk of the business of the world, but that these corporations will be organized upon a distribution of ownership among those who are engaged in them, so that in the end the business of the world will be conducted by men in association with each other, each being directly interested in the ownership of the enterprise in which he is engaged.

That the result of the better understanding thus produced will be such an economy in the work of production as to cheapen commodities and extend their consumption, whereby the condition of mankind will be greatly benefited, and the resources which are now utterly wasted in the strife between capital and labor, resulting in strikes and lockouts, may be appropriated toward the creation and maintenance of funds to insure the working classes against the temporary evils which are necessarily produced by the introduction of machinery and the dislocation of labor from causes over which they have no control; that society owes indemnity in such cases to the industrious poor, and that the principle of life insurance, adopted already by the British Government, points out the methods by which such indemnity may be provided, not only without imposing additional burdens upon the producing classes, but that such a provision will be a measure of positive economy, extinguishing pauperism and largely reducing the necessity for public charity.

I am not disturbed by the objection which will be made to some of my positions, that they are at war with the received principles of political economy. Political economy deals only with one side of human experience—the laws of the production and distribution of wealth. It is founded upon observation, experience, and reason. Just as Christianity has assumed various phases in different ages of the world, so political economy will vary in its conclusions with the changes of society. Christianity, addressing itself to the moral nature of man, is the prime mover in producing these changes. Political economy must therefore follow and not lead Christianity, and will conform itself to the conclusions at which society arrives in its progress toward a permanent moral order. What that moral order will be no man can pretend to predict, but that there is a procession toward it all men can see; and political economy takes its place among the elements which go to make up that procession, and its truths, when finally ascertained and settled, will be found to conform strictly to the higher laws which bind man to his Maker by the great bond of love.

Finally, there is one consideration which must never be lost sight of. If during the last hundred years there had been no industrial development, the questions which now stir society to its foundations would never have forced themselves on public attention. It is the marvelous improvement in the condition of the human race during the present century which has brought into prominence and created the necessity of dealing with the evils which in previous ages passed unnoticed or were accepted as inevitable. The very growth and abundance of wealth make the inequalities of its distribution more apparent. The standard of conscience has been raised with the standard of comfort. The conflicts between labor and capital are more intense because there is more to contend for. Privilege slowly but surely recedes before the advance of knowledge. The question, "By what right?" penetrates the very heart of power, and is no longer answered by the plea of tradition. Thus at length the way is opened for the amelioration of humanity by growth instead of by revolution, and henceforth society will take no steps backward. Moreover, we can see, it may be as "through a glass darkly," that the methods by which the possibility of peaceful progress has been reached are in accordance with a divine order, not to have been predicted, but to be clearly seen as it develops results, and points the way to new triumphs of justice. The soul of man is thus cheered with hope, and at the same time taught humility, as it is admitted to glimpses, dim and shadowy though they be, of the beneficent plan and purposes of Him who "Moves in a mysterious way

His wonders to perform."

ABRAM S. HEWITT.

NEW YORK, October 15, 1878.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I said yesterday in reply to the inquiry of my colleague [Mr. HURD] that the Morrison bill is not in harmony with the Ohio platform. That bill proposes a reduction in the rate of duties, but does not propose a reform in the tariff. Will the proposed reduction in the rate of duties result in lessening the revenues? In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the reduction proposed will more likely result, through increased importations which it will invite, in an increase of the revenue, so that instead of accomplishing the desired object of relieving an overflowing Treasury, about which we hear so much, this bill will rather add to the surplus complained of.

But, Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to discuss the principles of the Ohio platform and its relation to the bill before us, I propose to reply to some of the arguments which have been made on this side of the House in the discussion of this bill. In these arguments I find two assumptions; in other words, I find that nearly all the arguments which have been made in support of the bill rest almost entirely upon two propositions, both of which I believe to be fallacious. The first of these is that to the extent a tariff raises the prices of manufactured products in this country, to that extent it amounts to a tax, levied by the authority of the Government, upon one class, called consumers, for the benefit of another class, called producers.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON], in his opening speech on this question—a speech which bears the fullest evidence of close thought and guarded statement—has taken that ground. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], in a speech indicating extended research, argues from the same standpoint. My other friend from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], in a very strong and logical argument, has also based his reasoning upon the same premises, and logically pushed his conclusions to the farthest limit. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], a member of the committee, in an able speech, while not carrying his conclusions quite so far, nevtheless apparently accepts without question the same doctrine.

This and the second assumption, that it is the tariff which prevents our manufactures from going into foreign markets, also form the basis of the eloquent speech of my colleague [Mr. HURD], and this, with its finely wrought periods, as well as the arguments of all gentlemen founded upon these two propositions, must fall if the propositions themselves are found to be erroneous.

On the other hand, I will frankly say that if these assumptions be true, then there is no defense of any degree of protection. If by raising the price of goods manufactured in this country over foreign manufactures by a tariff, we are lending the power of the Government, which is the power of all, to enable one class to spoliate another, then there can be no justification for protection at all. If that is the necessary effect of a tariff, revenue should be raised in some other way. Even a tariff for revenue only, if with it the right of one class to levy a tax upon another is necessarily joined, as gentlemen assume it to be, then I go further than they, and say that such an exercise of the powers of Government would be wholly unwarranted. But is that true? Let us see. In order to bring out in the clearest language what this theory is, I will quote from the Treasury report of Robert J. Walker, of 1845, where this doctrine is clearly and forcibly stated. This report, too, is evidently the source of most of the arguments of those who have advocated this theory, at least they conform to and agree with the statement of the doctrine as contained therein.

Mr. Walker says:

If the marshal were sent by the Federal Government to collect a direct tax from the whole people to be paid over to manufacturing capitalists to enable them to sustain their business or realize a larger profit, it would be the same in effect as the protective duty, which, when analyzed into its simplest elements and reduced to actual results, is a mere subtraction of so much money from the people to increase the resources of the protected property.

This is the doctrine, fairly and clearly stated. And this doctrine is the foundation of all the speeches on this side of the House against the encouragement of productive industries at home. Now let us see whether this doctrine be true or not. If true, then how do you justify a tariff at all? If a tariff of 45 per cent. results in an indirect tax on the consumer paid to the producer, of $550,000,000, as charged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], or of $972,000,000, as claimed by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, or $1,073,000,000, as given by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], or $450,000,000, as claimed by my colleague [Mr. HURD], as paid by the agricultural classes alone, then a tariff for revenue only, which would probably be about a 15 per cent. rate, if it had any effect in keeping up prices—that is, afforded any protection—must result in an indirect tax, levied in the same way by one class upon another, in proportion to the tariff rate.

Now, how do the advocates of a tariff "on a revenue basis" justify lending the powers of Government to enable one class to tax another to the extent of even $100,000,000, or $200,000,000, or $300,000,000, or at all? When you have justified that, then you have justified the principle, which is all any monopolist can ask; but you prove too much. No such tax is necessary and no such tax is justifiable. To lend the powers of government to one class to enable them to spoliate another is subversive of the foundation principles of our Government and of all just government. The truth is, the theory itself is fallacious and mischievous—mischievous as the old mercantile theory which dominated Europe for more than two hundred years, during which period, J. B. Say has said, more than fifty years was spent in wars arising out of this strange delusion which blinded statesmen and made enemies of nations.

So this fallacy of indirect taxation is the one delusion which, more than anything else, keeps up dissensions and prevents the settlement of the tariff question upon true economic principles.

Now let us examine the grounds of this theory that a tariff is necessarily accompanied by the transfer to one class of the power to tax another.

The tariff on iron and steel undoubtedly tends to raise to consumers the money price of iron and steel, and the prices of all articles manufactured from iron and steel in this country, over the prices of such articles in England. But who are the consumers? Everybody; those engaged in the manufacture of cotton and woolen goods, hemp, jute, and flax goods, earthenware and glassware—in short those engaged in the production of everything included in the list of what are termed the protected industries, as well as those engaged in the professions and in agricultural pursuits.

Now, if the rate of duty is equal—and that is the principle laid down in the Ohio platform—I say if the duty is equitably proportioned, then the producers of each class pay to the producers of every other class, on what they respectively consume of each others' products the increased price resulting from a tariff. Benefits and burdens become reciprocal. The effect is merely to vary the level at which goods are exchanged. Can the producers of cotton and woolen goods, and the laborers in those industries, say to the manufacturers of steel and iron, "The Government authorizes you to levy on us a tax, and we have to pay you a bounty whenever we buy any of your products?" Would not the manufacturers of steel and iron goods turn around and say, "Ah! but when we buy cotton and woolen goods of you, do we not also pay a higher price in consequence of the tariff duties?" And does not this principle of mutuality run through all the protected industries? My friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], I am sure, will agree with me so far. Then you are driven to the position that the only class that pays this indirect tax is the class not engaged in any industry which is directly affected by a tariff; for it is clear enough that in all the protected industries it is but an adjustment of prices to a given scale. It is simply this and nothing more. It is like trading a horse worth $200 for a yoke of oxen worth $200, instead of a horse worth $100 for a yoke of oxen worth $100. The level at which prices are thus adjusted is not the same level, it is true, that would exist were there no tariff, or if the whole world were admitted to the competition that determines this level; but the relation of things one to another may be the same at one level as at another.

But how is it when we come to the agricultural and other classes?

Mr. SHAW. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. SHAW. Is the horse you speak about protected?

Mr. CHACE. Yes, 20 per cent.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, nominally, at least. But I will come to that in a moment. Is the law of adjustment to which I have referred limited to the protected industries, or does it extend to agriculture and other employments as well? It is a law of capital that it flows always from industries and business where profits are low to industries and business where profits are higher. Labor also moves from industries in which wages are low to industries in which wages are higher.

Let me give the generally accepted statement of this well-known law of political economy, which is as well settled as the law of gravity. Adam Smith says:

If in the same neighborhood there was any employment evidently more advantageous than the rest, so many people would crowd into it that its advantages would soon return into the level of other employments.

John Rae says:

Profits far exceeding the usual rate of profit can scarcely ever be drawn, for any time, from any employment.

Laveleye states the law in this language:

Profits will tend to a uniform level in all the different industries, inasmuch as enterprising men of business, furnished with fresh supplies of capital, engage in such industries as offer any unusual returns. This leveling process, however, is never accurately effected, since the fluctuations of industry and trade cause perpetual variations in the rate of profits. * * * The truth of the matter is rather that profit, being also the reward of labor, will rise and fall simultaneously with wages. Where large profits are made the workmen can and ought to be well paid. In the United States profit and wages are high. In the states of Western Europe they are both much lower.

Except then where there is or can be monopoly the tendency is to equalization in profits of capital and wages of labor in all industries. These movements are not, of course, without much friction. There is greater attractiveness in some kinds of labor than in others. Special fitness and skill are required in some, and wages vary accordingly. So capital will usually accept lower profits with increased security. But that there is a constant tendency to equalization in the distribution of profits of capital and wages of labor is an admitted law of economic science.

Nor is this equalizing tendency limited to special industries, but extends to all industries and all employments included in the same industrial system, except, as I have said, where monopoly has power to prevent competition. As an illustration of this tendency to equalization, some of my friends here know that capital in large quantities has been flowing from the manufacturing districts in the East during the last ten years to the agricultural districts of the West. It has gone into cattle-raising and wheat-growing. Why? Because these employments furnish better security and larger profits than the manufacturing industries, for new capital. Capital has been flowing in these and other directions, and equalization in this way has been going on between manufacturing industries and the agricultural industries. Of course capital is timid and moves cautiously, but nevertheless the leveling process goes on through all forms of investment.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who has just taken his seat admitted in reply to my question, that the profits on capital invested in many manufacturing industries, and especially those in which he is concerned, were so small that it would be better for him to loan his money at 5 per cent. And when asked where he would look for a field profitable enough to enable the borrower to pay 5 per cent. interest, he said he would go to the farm-owners of the West. Thus, while my colleague argues that the tariff takes annually $450,000,000 from the farmers and gives it to the manufacturers, his colleague on the committee, who agrees with him on this bill, says that agriculture is so much more profitable than manufacturing that they can pay 5 per cent. on capital that can not be profitably employed in manufacturing. I am sure my colleague [Mr. HURD] is not right, and I do not think the gentleman from New York is quite secure, either, in his position.

But where protection is carried so far as to permit prices in any industry to be raised above the adjusted level of labor and capital in the country, even though it may not directly constitute a monopoly, nevertheless it conduces to monopoly for the benefit of those engaged in it until home competition restores the general level; and if competition, from any cause, is prevented from operating, then the monopoly continues. But I say it is only where monopoly exists, only where power is given, or from any cause exists, to exclude competition, limit production, and prevent equalization, that the principle of indirect taxation operates; that is, in case of monopoly only; under this one condition and under no other, I say, is an advantage given to one class over another by a tariff. Monopolies, however, may exist from other causes than a tariff, and usually do exist from other causes. But whenever a tariff is so levied as to permit the existence of monopolies it does operate as an indirect tax levied on one class for the benefit of another; it does then turn over the power of the state to enable one class to collect a bounty from another, which is an unjustifiable exercise of the powers of government. But I repeat, sir, that only when the condition of monopoly exists does the evil complained of exist, and I shall show before I close that the Ohio platform carefully guards against that condition and distinctly draws the line against monopolies in any form.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask how much of this tariff will Ohio agree to take off to prevent or break up the monopolies?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Ohio is willing to take off all that is necessary to do that, and I am glad my friend asks the question. I will, however, come to the question of tariff reduction presently, but I will say here that I want a reduction of taxation, but by such an adjustment of the tariff as will cut down the rate which sustains monopoly, but not where any industry would be hurt by it. That is what I want.

Mr. CHACE. You do not want a horizontal reduction?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, sir; I do not. I want a better adjustment of the tariff than now exists.

Mr. MORRISON. Please tell us just what you would like to have. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman will listen to me I will explain in a very few minutes to his satisfaction, I hope, what I want and what his bill does not give.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If you do not support the pending bill, or if the proposed bill does not pass, will not the abuses that you complain of in the way of the inequality of burdens still remain; while if it passes will it not curtail the abuses?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; they will continue and in some respects possibly be made worse than they are now.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But if the bill does not change the basis of taxation, and that I understand to be your complaint against it, will not the basis remain the same as it would under the Morrison bill, but with this difference, that under this bill, if passed, they pay a moderate duty, whereas under the present law the duty is a high, protective one?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will answer the gentleman. In the first place you will have more revenue under this bill than you have now; that is one thing; then on some things duties already low enough will be reduced below the difference in the cost of production here and elsewhere, to the great injury of our own industries, while duties much too high will still remain relatively high.

Mr. SPRINGER. But if they continue under the Morrison bill, then according to your theory the lower the duty the greater the monopoly; is not that it?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman has not understood me.

Mr. BRUMM. The lower the duty the greater the importation of foreign manufactures.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I understood the gentleman to say that under the Morrison bill these monopolies were still continued.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Undoubtedly, though possibly not to the same extent throughout, but in some things the disproportion will be greater. But I shall refer to this again when I take up the Ohio platform.

Mr. SPRINGER. But you said to a greater extent.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was answering another question then, and the gentleman did not understand my position, perhaps.

But, Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to discuss the Ohio platform I desire to finish my argument on the indirect tax or bounty question.

Mr. WOLFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. WOLFORD. If the Morrison bill will not be as great a monopoly and do as much harm as the present tariff, why not go for the Morrison bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will show the gentleman before I am through. But I wish now before taking up anything else to push this doctrine of indirect taxation to its legitimate conclusion, and for that purpose I quote from the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which he says:

The census value of manufactures for 1880 was $5,369,579,191. The wages paid in making them were $947,953,795. The difference in cost of goods is said to be the difference in the cost of wages. But suppose the difference between the cost here and the cost abroad amounts to all the wages paid here, then these manufactures would cost abroad $4,421,625,396. Suppose the average rate of duty which the bill before the House leaves at 33 per cent. was reduced to 22 per cent., and at that rate this $4,421,625,396 in value of goods was imported. It would cost the importer at that rate of 22 per cent., $972,757,587, which not only makes up for the difference in wages but exceeds all the wages paid for making all the goods.

He says in substance, if I understand him aright, that there would be a saving of $972,757,587 if we bought our manufactured products abroad instead of producing them at home; in other words, that the tariff compels the consumers of these products to pay $972,757,587 more than they otherwise would have to pay.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], in an article last summer in the North American Review, calls it an "incidental" tax and places it at $550,000,000 a year. To show his understanding of the question I quote the following:

I have based my estimates upon the rates of duty imposed by the tariff law of March 3, 1883. If I have erred in any way it is in placing the amount of incidental taxes too low. The people of the United States have been subjected to a burden of at least $556,000,000 every year for the past twenty years, making an aggregate of over eleven billions of dollars, not one dollar of which went into the national Treasury.

My colleague [Mr. HURD] in his speech yesterday placed this bounty at $450,000,000 as paid by the agricultural class alone. I give his language as reported in the Post this morning:

What was the effect of the ruinous system on the farmer? It increased the price of all articles which entered into his daily consumption, and this increase amounted to an annual sum of $450,000,000. For this there was absolutely no compensation in the protective system.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] figures up a much larger sum. He says:

To summarize these figures, the tariff yielded to the Government in 1880 a revenue of $186,522,065, while it exacted from the people over and above what the Government received $1,073,915,738. In other words, for every dollar of revenue that the tariff carried into the Treasury it placed in the pockets of the manufacturers $5.77.

Some gentlemen have put it much higher than this even. I do not wonder that they differ so widely; they are all traveling in a circle, and some seem to go around it more times than others. But let us take the estimate given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], and push it to its logical conclusion and see how we come out. Let us take round numbers, and to give the advocates of this theory the benefit of every advantage in their argument, take our manufactures at $5,000,000,000, and suppose the tariff to be the cause of $2,000,000,000 of that. Then suppose some foreign country would make us the proposition to furnish all these commodities laid down in our markets, as they are laid down by our own manufacturers, for $3,000,000,000. You gentlemen would say there would be a clear gain of $2,000,000,000, would you not? Ah! but there are always two sides to a bargain. On one side is the sale and on the other is the payment. Now, how will you pay for the $3,000,000,000 worth of goods? What with? Not with gold, for we have not enough to more than begin such a payment. Nor with the kind of goods you buy, certainly. If you stop your manufacturing industries and buy your manufactured goods from abroad, what, I ask again, will you pay with? With agricultural products? If you do that you must turn your millions to agriculture to produce your supply. Then at what price will you turn over agricultural products in payment? At present prices?

Ah! if you could do that you might come out all right; at any rate, the argument would be on your side; but you can not do that. The world took from us altogether $800,000,000 of our products, last year of which 90 per cent. were agricultural products. Would they give the same prices for twice as much? Would they for three or four times as much? By no means. There are some old statistics applicable here. Gregory King, an old authority often referred to, showed that in England, in the same market, a decrease of 10 per cent. in the wheat crop raised the price in that market 30 per cent.; a decrease of 20 per cent. raised the price 80 per cent.; while an increase of 20 per cent. lowered the price 40 per cent.; and that to double the quantity of a commodity suddenly in the same market often diminished the price three-fourths. England took of us last year 75,000,000 bushels of wheat at about $1.15. Would she take 150,000,000 bushels at the same price? At what price, then, do you suppose she would take 500,000,000 bushels in the same season? At what price would England take double our cotton crop?

But we must pay for these three thousand millions of goods with agricultural products of some kind, and at such prices as they or the world will give for them. It is not necessary to follow this reasoning further. I think I have gone far enough to show how, when you have furnished agricultural products in quantity sufficient to pay for the three thousand million dollars' worth of manufactured goods, you will come out in the trade. You could not sell the quantity of farm products necessary to pay such a sum in the markets of the world at a price that would not bankrupt the country. There are, then, two sides to a transaction of this kind, the purchase and the payment, and the agriculturist would find that in the end for the same commodities, taking the aggregate, he would have to give twice as much and perhaps three or four times as much of his labor or of its products for the same goods, if we had no manufactures at home, and farm products had all to be sent across the ocean to be exchanged for goods. After one experiment of this kind I think our agriculturist would agree with Jefferson that the manufacturer should be placed beside the farmer and with Adam Smith, that "whatever tends to lessen the number of artificers and manufactures, tends to diminish the home market, the best of all markets for the rude produce of the land, and still further to discourage agriculture."

Individuals may buy in foreign markets at low prices and sell at home at high prices; but millions can not, and nations can not trade in that way; and here is where our friends have made their mistake. Individuals can go abroad and trade in that way, but the whole country can not. So that the law governing the distribution of capital and labor and the equalization of prices extends not merely to the protected industries, but to all the industries of the land. It extends as well to

> Those who gather in the golden grain,
> And those who fling it to the winds like rain, as to those engaged in the other industries of the country. It includes everything in the same industrial system.

Another point, before I come to the Ohio platform, and it is a vital one in the arguments on the other side, and hence I dwell somewhat upon it. Our friends who argue for free trade, or a tariff for revenue only, say that what we want is to open the markets of the world to our productions. Gentlemen, they are open now. Tell me why you do not go into them?

Mr. SPRINGER. I can tell the gentleman why we do not go to Mexico, if he will allow me.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it will not take too long.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the Mexican treaty was made (it is not confirmed yet) a firm of wagon-makers in the State of Indiana, anticipating the ratification of the treaty, sent a thousand wagons to the Rio Grande for the purpose of shipping them into that country. When they got them there they found that the duty on them was $40 a wheel, or $160 a wagon. The rate was prohibitory, and the wagons still remain on the banks of the Rio Grande waiting for the confirmation of that treaty before they can be taken into the markets of that country. It is restrictive laws which prevent trade between nations; remove those restrictions and trade will spring up.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You may find an isolated instance of that kind, and one prejudicial to us, perhaps, although the bar against us is no higher than against other countries who would be our competitors in the Mexican market, and what is best for Mexico I will leave for Mexicans to say. I ask you why we do not go into the world's markets now? I will tell you why. It is because we are not willing to sell the commodities we produce of the same kind and class that are produced in other countries at the same prices at which other countries will sell them. In other words, we are not willing to give as much labor, or the produce of as much labor, for a given price as some other countries are willing to give.

My colleague [Mr. HURD] said yesterday that he wanted the manufacturers of this country to have the benefit of the markets of the world for their productions. You can go into the markets of the world with your productions and sell them there when you can lay down in those markets what you take there at as low a price as they can be laid down in the same market by any other country, and not till then. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You will have to deliver your hundred yards of cloth in Brazil as cheaply as England will deliver it there, or you can not go there and sell such goods. On what conditions can you deliver your products there as low as anybody else? On these conditions and these alone: that all the conditions of production shall be as favorable, everything as low in this country as it is in any other country with which we must compete. Not merely the raw material which my friend from New York [Mr HEWITT] wants to have free, not merely the buildings and the machinery employed in production, but every element that enters into production must be as low here as there, and that includes labor. Yes, besides having material as low and all other conditions as favorable you must have labor as cheap too, or else you can not go there.

There is this exception: if in the production of any article of commerce you have any natural or acquired advantage which is not possessed by any other country, then your labor need not be reduced to the level of labor elsewhere. If there is any natural advantage, I say, or any specially acquired advantage, the result of genius, skill, invention, or machinery, then you will not have to reduce the pay of labor to the level of labor abroad in order to get into other markets. In that case your advantage—superior skill or whatever it may consist of—will let you into other markets, and leave to labor a better reward.

But we must remember that England is our equal in nearly all these things, as far as they relate to manufactures, so that we will be able to go into the markets of the world with our manufactured products when we economize in their production as her manufacturers do; when we take as little profit on capital as they take; when we have materials as cheap as they have, and when we reduce our labor as low as they do, and not till then. [Renewed applause.]

And the counterpart of that is, that with free trade, goods produced at the least cost—that is, with the lowest profits on capital and the cheapest labor—will come into our own markets, and our own producers can sell here only when they can produce and sell as cheaply, and that will be when capital can be had at as low interest and labor at as low wages, and under no other conditions can manufactures, under free trade, hold our own markets, except when they possess some natural or specially acquired advantage.

My colleague [Mr. HURD] said yesterday he wanted a laborer here when he had earned his $2 for a day's labor, to have the privilege of spending it in the market in which he could buy the most. But does he suppose a laborer can long sell his labor in one market at a high price and buy the produce of another's labor in another market at a low price? One laborer, to be sure, may do it, but can a million? Who will be the buyers of the labor of a million men at high wages here, if he must sell the produce of their labor at the same price that the produce of another million cheaper laborers in another country is sold for? He would have fish swim in the air and birds fly in the sea. Or could any other class depending upon earnings, or the professional class, continue very long to receive the same reward for their services as now if they ceased to take in exchange the products of others at a corresponding price? Only those having fixed incomes would continue to receive the same while permitted to buy for less. This is the one class to be benefited by cheaper labor and lower prices.

I tell you, gentlemen, this is a question of industrial systems. I said a few moments ago that in all the industries of the country there is a tendency to equalization by leveling up or leveling down; so there is; but this so far operates only in the industries belonging to our own industrial system. Within this system there should be absolute equality of rights, and so far as government is concerned, of opportunities; but when it comes to a question between our system and other systems, the public welfare, which is the interest of all, rises superior to the interest of any one. But it is one thing to equalize the many industries in our own system and quite another to equalize our social and industrial system with the social and industrial systems of other countries. Let me call the attention of the committee especially to this question, for it is of the utmost importance. I should be, with my friend and colleague [Mr. HURD], a free-trader if all the countries of the world had the same industrial system, the same social organism, with the same freedom from class and caste; the same liberty of the individual that we have. But that is not the case. The social systems of most countries of the world are very different from ours, and so are their industrial systems.

The industrial system of England is what it is because her social system is what it is—an aristocratic class, owning the land, a middle class, a laboring class, doomed forever to be a laboring class, with only enough set aside from what they produce to keep them in existence. Allied to England and the British system is India with her 365,000,000 of population, divided by law and immemorial custom into castes, with a vast labor population kept at the lowest level of existence and too frequently not above starvation.

On the other side of us are the Mongolian hordes, with a social system which has come down through innumerable generations. Their industrial system includes also vast masses of laborers accustomed to live on the least amount of food that will support life. A few years ago we passed a law to prevent this population from coming into this country to occupy it. We said if they are permitted to come here, without restriction, they will supplant, take possession of, and occupy the land that should be reserved for a higher civilization. We said it was not for the interest of humanity to try to graft our civilization on Chinese stock, or to turn over a part of this continent for the cultivation of a Mongolian civilization. We determined rather to preserve it for the growth and development of our own race.

The House has before it now a proposition to prevent the importation of contract labor, and I think the time has come when it were well to consider where the gain lies, either to ourselves or to humanity, in adding such elements to our population. But if we open our doors to free trade are we not taking a step which must result in the end in lowering our laboring population to something near the level of laboring classes in monarchical and aristocratic nations? I hold that it is not possible to put our industrial system in competition with such as these without immediate loss to ourselves and the permanent injury of our social and industrial organizations. They will have power to drag us down, not we to lift them up. Free-trade writers admit this.

Professor Cairnes says:

The influence thus exerted by changes in the demand for commodities may be operative on an international scale, and may thus affect the average level of wages throughout an entire community (the world); the gain, however, to the country profiting by the movement being always compensated by a corresponding loss incurred by some other country or countries.

Would it pay us, then, to give to the world the advantages of our markets for the poor privilege of reducing the cost of production, including wages of labor, that we may compete in other markets thousands of miles away? For, as I have shown, that is the only condition on which we can go there. Shall we establish this equation of trade and thereby equalize the industrial system of this free country with the social and industrial systems of the worst forms of tyranny that exist in the world?

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to free trade. I believe in the policy of preserving this continent, the fairest on the globe, for the development of the race now occupying it—the latest born of time, and along whose pathway of progress the light of all the ages shines. I want this land preserved for the children of this race, for I believe it capable of a higher and nobler civilization than any other. I am not willing, therefore, to see the virgin soil of this land converted into food products to be sold to other countries for what we really little need. In less than a hundred years our own population will have reached the limit of food supply; it will no longer then be a question of finding markets for food products, but finding food enough for the population that will then occupy this great country. We will be glad in that day to buy back the soil we have parted with for so little. Keep the continent, I say, and keep its richness for this population—our children and their children—who will soon enough fill its wide borders.

There will be need then also to have among us all the arts and industries known to men, and let us therefore preserve and support what our fathers thought fit to establish and encourage. Population, says J. S. Mill, dominates all other questions in political economy, and it will soon enough dominate all other questions with us.

There is another question I can not pass by without notice, since the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who preceded me has made so much of it, connecting it, as did also my colleague [Mr. HURD] yesterday, as a principal cause of the present depressed condition of trade in the country. According to their doctrine it is overproduction, caused by the tariff, that is ruining manufactures, destroying trade, and reducing the people to starvation; and my colleague becomes alarmed over the discouraging prospect for the farmers unless the tariff is reduced—reduced on wool I suppose. He said, if rightly reported:

In that day—

And that day I understood him was close at hand—

the farmers will be beggars in the midst of their own plenty, paupers by the side of their own golden-gathered sheaves. There is absolutely no relief except in making foreign markets for agriculture.

That is good. Farmers with bursting granaries beggars; paupers with full barns! I never met any of that kind myself. These are the farmers I look to for "square meals" when I am in the country. I can think of nothing more ludicrous than that, unless it be the idea somebody suggests, of rats starving to death in a wheat-stack. [Laughter and applause.] Overproduction the cause of distress and low wages!

Do these gentlemen mean to have us understand that there is a surplus of everything in the country? That would mean that we have too much wealth, more than we can divide up; or do they mean to say that we have supply but not demand? But that does not help them; for nobody has the power of demand unless he has supply of some kind to offer; in other words, every one's supply is the measure of his power of demand, and supply and demand in the aggregate of things are necessarily equal. For every supply stands as a demand against every other supply. Of course there may be overproduction in a single industry and that industry would be depressed in consequence; and where there are but few industries in a country, and that country has to depend for a part of its wants upon others, then there may be overproduction in such a country. Hence the importance to any country of a diversity of industries. For where industries are widely diversified, although even then production may get out of proper proportion, general overproduction can not exist, for overproduction in all things, economists agree, is an impossibility. And yet overproduction, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from New York, is the great evil which is to sink the producing classes of the United States to the lowest depths of poverty, and the remedy is to stop production, or remove the tariff and let foreign cheaper products flow more abundantly into our market, for the poor privilege of competing with them in distant markets. Let me illustrate the fallacy of this doctrine of general overproduction in another way: Suppose on an island, separated from the rest of the world, there were 10,000 people having diversified industries, engaged in producing the things they need to supply their wants, which they exchange among themselves in a common market; then suppose somebody should persuade them that they were overproducing and that they would be better off if they produced but half as much; is it not clear that there would be but half as much to exchange, but half as much for each to takeas his share? So in this country, if we stopped production and produced but half as much as we have been producing, would the market be any better? Would trade increase? In the end all trade is but the exchange of commodities, and the more there is to exchange the more each may have. Diminish it one-half and there is but one-half as much to trade on or to be divided.

Can wages be increased and production at the same time be decreased? Can you raise wages by lessening the quantity of things with which wages are paid? For wages are in the end paid from what is produced. The wage fund is in reality the share of the things produced that goes to labor; and if you reduce the total you reduce the share that labor gets. The greater the production to a given population the greater will be both the profits of capital and the wages of labor. But I do not deny that there may be a surplus of products of some kinds, or that there is not a surplus now. There are of some things but so much wanted. There are but so many heads, so many feet; and, of course, you may produce more hats and boots and shoes relatively to other things than are required; but what is wanted is more supply of another kind, which supply makes more demand. Demand and supply in the aggregate therefore are, as I have said, the same things. This doctrine is so well stated by Professor Cairnes that I will read his clear statement of it:

Demand, as a general phenomenon, can not exist without supply, and can not increase except in proportion as supply increases. This, I repeat, is fundamental in the theory of exchange, and all assumptions to the contrary must be regarded as baseless and absurd.

Again:

The illusion which I am combating, that demand and supply are independent economic forces, sometimes assumes another form in the notion that producers and consumers are distinct classes, and that production and consumption are acts which may go on irrespective of each other.

That production and consumption can go on irrespectively and that there is a producing class and a consuming class is not the case, at any rate, in this country, except the few living on fixed incomes; and this is the class that is clamoring for free trade, for it is to their interest to have the greatest possible amount of labor, or its product, to swell their incomes.

I turn now to the Ohio platform.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Before the gentleman takes up the Ohio platform will he allow me a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will allow any question if I only have the time to reply.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I understood the gentleman to say in his opening remarks that the only reason he opposed the Morrison bill was because it might increase the revenues of the country. I wish to know whether that is his only reason for opposing the bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not say that was the only reason. I said that would be the effect, and I am going on to show why.

Mr. BLAND. You would not object to increasing the revenues going into the Treasury if it was used to pay off the debt?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not if the surplus were used to pay the public debt. I would not object to a large revenue—that is, provided it were steadily and regularly paid out on the public debt. I am one of those who believe that one of the most important things to keep in view is the rapid and final extinction of the public debt. Is the gentleman from New York in favor of that?

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I am in favor of the Morrison bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I must confine myself now to the principles of the Ohio platform, which reads:

We favor a tariff for revenue, limited to the necessities of the Government, economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies.

The first principle is that the amount raised should be no more than is required for the legitimate expenses of the Government, including, of course, the payment of the national debt.

The next thing is the adjustment of the tariff so as to raise this revenue. In doing that by what principle shall we be guided? That is the great question. On what articles shall duties be levied, and at what rates? In determining this what shall be the governing principle? Shall it be simply to get revenue regardless of consequences? That is what I understand by a tariff for revenue only. Look only to your revenue, not to the consequences that must follow any tariff.

Does anybody suppose we can levy a tariff of $200,000,000 on commodities without seriously affecting production, trade, and commerce? It is impossible. But the theory of a "tariff for revenue only" is, "Levy your tariff regardless of the consequences that may follow." Now, I say that is a blind man's tariff. It is a tariff without any intelligence in it.

Mr. SPRINGER. What business has the Government in the matter but to get revenue?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Because public interests are involved. Our fathers recognized this fact, and since the gentleman has called my attion to this point, I will answer him in the language of a better Democrat than I can hope to be, or, I believe, than my distinguished friend from Illinois can claim to be. I will let the answer come from the same pen that drafted the clause of the Constitution which I will read:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

In introducing the first tax bill into the First Congress of the United States, before the first President had been inaugurated, the very first measure that was discussed, Madison said:

There is another consideration. The States that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade, they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions. By adopting the present Constitution they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands. They must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here.

That is what Madison said, and I will let Madison answer the gentleman's question for me. And this act, introduced by Madison, when it passed contained this language:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

That would make a good preamble now.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much were the rates of duty proposed in that bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, the principle is there, and that is what I am now considering. The Ohio platform does nothing more than announce the same economic principle which was well understood and acted upon by the fathers of Democracy for the first half century of the history of this Government. Its very language is borrowed in part from Madison, Jackson, and Jefferson; and it is nothing more, I say, than a statement of the doctrine which they well understood and acted upon; to prove which I will quote a little more, although I intended to confine myself in the time I have to the economic features of the question only. I will quote first some other things said by Madison in the debate on this bill. He says:

I presume that however much we may be disposed to promote domestic manufactures we ought to pay some regard to the present policy of obtaining revenue.

And that is what we think now. Mr. Clymer thought "encouraging manufactures and obtaining revenue" ought to go together. Madison said "he thought ship-building an object worthy of legislative attention." Mr. Hartley said:

If we consult the history of the ancient world we shall see that they have thought proper, for a long time past, to give great encouragement to the establishment of manufactures, by laying such partial duties on the importation of foreign goods as to give the home manufactures a considerable advantage in the price when brought to market.

And all through the debates on the first tariff bill there runs the expressed purpose of encouragement to productive industries at home.

In his seventh annual message Madison used this language:

In adjusting the duties on imports to the object of revenue the influence of the tariff on manufactures will necessarily present itself for consideration.

Washington, in his last annual address, said:

Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible.

Franklin said:

That it was the duty of government to encourage and protect industry, in all shapes, in all instances, and by all means.

Jefferson, in his sixth annual message, asks:

Shall we suppress the impost and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufacturers?

And in his letter to Colonel Humphreys, says:

My idea is that we should encourage home manufactures to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw material.

Monroe, who more ardently, perhaps, than either of the other early Presidents espoused the cause of American industries, in his third annual message said:

It is deemed of great importance to give encouragement to our domestic manufactures. In what manner the evils adverted to may be remedied, and how far it may be practicable in other respects to afford to them further encouragement, paying due regard to all the other great interests of the nation, is submitted to the wisdom of Congress.

Jackson, in his second annual message, says:

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case; this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, who each have repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

I am then confirmed in my opinion not only by the opinions of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, but by the opinion of Jackson also.

Much more might be quoted to show that the founders of Democracy not only did not question the power of Congress to levy duties with a view to the protection of American industries, but advocated and supported such measures.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would the gentleman be willing to reduce the present tariff rates to those imposed by Mr. Madison's bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh! circumstances have much changed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Ah, yes! and so have men changed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The principle remains; and what I complain of is that you have changed and got off of the principles the founders of the Government laid down and acted upon.

Mr. COSGROVE. The Ohio platform, I believe, demands the raising of only so much revenue as is necessary for the purposes of the Government properly administered. How, then, does the gentleman reconcile with the Ohio platform the present tariff, which annually collects $50,000,000 more than the purposes of the Government require?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it were applied to the public debt I would rather have it more than less, but the bill before us will not reduce the total revenue.

Mr. COSGROVE. You can not so apply it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly we can. There are over $250,000,000 of interest-bearing debt, payable at our option.

Mr. BLAND. And it is a crime it is not paid.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But I must return to the Ohio platform. Here is the next principle: The tariff must be "so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens"—I think all will agree with that—"and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies."

I showed at the outset of my remarks that the only point at which the tariff operated as an indirect tax is where monopoly arises; not anywhere else. And we say in the Ohio platform, adjust the tariff so as to prevent monopoly, but encourage productive industries at home. I ask the attention of my Democratic friends to this principle; to me it is of the utmost importance; it is the cardinal principle in the Ohio platform. It means that where there are no climatic or other natural reasons why commodities may not be produced in this country as well as abroad, that duties should not be reduced below the line which marks the difference in cost of producing such commodities in this and other countries. I said our industries stood correlated one to another and adjusted to a given scale of prices, and that this adjusted scale is determined in a large measure by the cost of production; and we say there is a difference in the cost of producing many commodities here and in other countries. This difference, we say, arises largely from better-paid labor and higher interest on capital. But, from whatever cause it arises, the difference exists.

Now, the cardinal principle of the Ohio platform, I say, is that the tariff shall not be reduced below the line that marks the difference in cost of producing a given commodity here and abroad. Suppose the difference to be 40 per cent. and you reduce the tariff to 20 per cent., what is the result? The foreign producer is given the advantage in our own market of 20 per cent. What would be the necessary consequence? An inflow of foreign products and the stoppage of our own industries. That result would as certainly follow as night follows day.

Let me illustrate by taking a single commodity. Suppose the difference in the cost of producing steel rails in the United States and Great Britain to be, as things stand now, $10 a ton—and that is about the actual difference. Suppose you put the tariff down to $10; then this industry here and abroad is on a plane of equal competition in our market, is it not?

Mr. SHAW. No.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, they would be then.

Mr. SHAW. There is $10 difference.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The $10 duty makes them equal, and that goes into the Treasury of the United States. On the supposition I have made, steel rails produced here and abroad, when the foreign product has paid the $10, go into our market on an equality. Now, I would not lower the duties on anything below that line, and that is, I repeat, the guiding principle of the Ohio platform. But I would put it enough above that line to give some advantage to our own industries and our own labor in our own home market.

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman forgot to add the transportation from the seashore.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of course transportation is to be taken into account.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX, of New York). The gentleman from Ohio must address the Chair. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be able to enlighten the Chair. [Laughter.] But suppose, the difference in cost being ten dollars, you reduce the duty to five, what is the result? An advantage of $5 a ton in our own market in favor of the foreign product. Consequently our rail-mills must shut down till there can be a readjustment of things. And let me tell you these readjustments are costly. They mean always conflicts, struggles, suffering, losses. Never, therefore, except for the most potent reasons, I say, lower tariff rates below this line of difference in cost of producing a given commodity in this and other countries. That was sound doctrine in 1879 and it is sound doctrine now, and it will be, Mr. Chairman, sound doctrine a hundred years hence.

On the other hand, with a tariff on steel rails at $17 per ton, while the difference in cost is but $10; or worse yet, $28, as it was before the last reduction, a few large establishments are enabled to combine, and by limiting the production, if need be, raise the price just under the line which would keep foreign rails out. That would be creating and fostering monopoly, which the Ohio platform carefully guards against. And I submit that where the tariff rate is never above, or much above the line of difference in cost of production, monopoly is impossible, and hence none of the evils complained of as resulting from a high protective tariff can arise under such a tariff as this platform calls for. There are good reasons, however, for putting the tariff rate sometimes above the line of difference in cost of production rather than below it. In the first place, to encourage home production the rate of duty should be somewhat above the actual difference in the cost of producing. In the second place, with duties a little above the line of difference in cost, at the seaboard, say, the importer, in order to come into our market at all, must scale down or give up a part, or all his profits, and to that extent he pays the duty, and not the consumer.

It is then precisely like two farmers going into the same market with wheat, one having to go through a toll-gate where he pays a toll, and the other not; they both get the same price when they reach the market. This principle is recognized and admitted by John Stuart Mill. Where the market is fixed by other conditions, if a part of the value is intercepted by a tax, he says: "The price can not be further raised, and it must be taken from the profits."

He further says:

> It may, therefore, be laid down as a principle that a tax on imported commodities when it really operates as a tax, and not as a prohibition either total or partial, almost always falls in part upon the foreigners who consume our goods; and that this is a mode in which a nation may appropriate to itself, at the expense of foreigners, a larger share than would otherwise belong to it of the increase in the general productiveness of the labor and capital of the world, which results from the interchange of commodities among nations.

I might give any number of examples to illustrate the difference between a tariff that merely favors and preserves our own industries and one that permits or fosters monopolies, but my time will not permit; and I will proceed to show the difference between a tariff in accordance with the Ohio platform and a tariff for revenue only, or a tariff that would yield a maximum of revenue. In the Walker report, from which I have quoted, this principle is laid down: "That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue." This is called the point of maximum revenue, and is a different one from what I understand gentlemen here to mean by a revenue basis. I desire to show, first, the difference between the maximum revenue point and the line of difference in cost of production.

Take again the case of steel rails, assuming as before the difference in cost here and abroad to be $10 a ton. At that rate of duty, or at a rate a very little above, our rail-mills would undoubtedly keep most of the home market and the duties collected would be comparatively limited; but suppose the duty to be reduced to $7 a ton, the result then would be an advantage to the importer, and he would undoubtedly take, for the time being at least, the larger part of our market. If we suppose 100,000 tons to come in—and that is about what came in last year—with duties at $10 a ton, the revenue derived would be $1,000,000, but with duties at $7 a ton, if 500,000 tons come in, and more than that doubtless would come, the revenue derived would be $3,500,000. Now, the maximum revenue point is that point at which if duties are levied the largest revenue will be derived. In other words, maximum revenue is the greatest product obtainable by multiplying the rate of duty by the quantity of the thing imported. And it must be plain to all that the maximum revenue point must necessarily and always be below the line that marks the difference in cost of production here and abroad. The Ohio platform adopts as the proper base-line to work from the difference in cost of production.

Which is right, this line or the maximum-revenue line? I tell you the line of difference in cost of production is the line our interests require us to take, and this country will stand by that line. To adopt the maximum-revenue principle would double the revenues of the country and break down half our industries.

Let us next find out, if we can, what is meant by a revenue basis, or a tariff for revenue only; the latter phrase, however, I take to mean any tariff that will bring in revenue, regardless of consequences, and that I say is a fool's tariff, because it admits of no intelligence in its application. But what is a revenue basis? If it means a horizontal tariff just high enough to bring in the required amount of revenue, I can understand it. If such a tariff rate were applied to everything imported it would scarcely need to be above 15 per cent. If, however, it is meant the lowest horizontal rate of duties which, if levied upon merchandise now dutiable, would bring in the required amount of revenue, I can understand that. That would be a tariff for revenue, with such protection as the rate of duty required to yield the necessary revenue, would afford. But that rate would probably not be above 15 or 20 per cent. Now I propose to show what the result would be of repudiating the principle of the Ohio platform and adopting either the maximum-revenue line, or the lower line of a revenue basis.

First, suppose the point of maximum revenue to be fixed upon, and all duties to be adjusted as nearly as practicable to that line, what would be your total revenue? Over five hundred million dollars' worth of dutiable merchandise came in last year with a rate prohibitory on many things. With a reduction of 20 per cent. in the duties it would require an increase of but 25 per cent. in the importations of the same merchandise to yield the same revenue. A reduction of 40 per cent. in the tariff rate would require, to bring the same revenue, an increase of 66⅔ per cent. in the imports; a reduction of 40 per cent. would still leave the average tariff rate about 26 per cent., which is probably not far from the maximum revenue point. But such a reduction would let in not only classes of manufactured goods now prohibited, but would lead to immense importations of everything—two or three times the quantity now coming in—which at a duty of 26 per cent. would yield necessarily a vastly increased revenue. Is this what is wanted? No; nobody wants that. But I say to you that every step downward from the line of difference in cost of production to the line of maximum revenue, which I have pointed out, must and will result in an increase in the total revenue. That, Mr. Chairman, is one of the reasons why I am opposed to this bill. It will not reduce the revenues that go into the Treasury, but result rather in an increase.

The consistent thing to do, therefore, would be, if it is determined to adopt the revenue basis as the guiding principle, to go there at once and carry to the free-list and make the rate low enough on other things to yield only the required revenue. But that of course would flood the country with foreign products, break down our own industries, stop our machinery, and send labor adrift, with consequences worse than if an earthquake, like that which visited Java, should shake our continent.

Now, I ask you gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means, in all seriousness; I ask the chairman of that committee, and I ask the distinguished Speaker of this House, who assisted, it is understood, in the preparation of this bill, what do you mean by a revenue basis? What do you propose by this bill? What principle do you adopt? Do you propose to go from the present level down first to the point of maximum revenue, and increase the revenues collected in the Treasury, and then on down to the revenue basis, or until you reach the line of lowest duties that will bring the revenue needed for the support of the Government? I would like to know what principle the committee is acting on. The people want to know; our people in Ohio want to know; they are deeply interested in this question. They have many industries, not the least among which is wool-growing. Now, what does this bill do for them?

Take wool, for instance—and nothing shows better the operation of tariff reduction than the effect of the present tariff on this product. During the six months ending December 31, 1882, we imported 5,364,466 pounds of wool at an average price of 22.5 cents per pound; the duty collected was $671,415, which was almost exactly 55 per cent.

During the six months ending December 31, 1883, under the new tariff we imported 10,431,655 pounds, at an average price of 23 cents per pound; the duties collected were $1,073,311, the rate being 45 per cent.

From these figures, which are taken from the report of Mr. Nimmo on the tariff act of March 3, 1883, it will be seen that on a reduction of 10 per cent. in the duties on wool, the imports nearly doubled, and at 45 per cent. $401,896 more revenue was collected than when the duties were 55 per cent., while the price of imported wool rose one-half cent per pound and the price of domestic wool fell from 3 to 5 cents per pound, which was exactly what might have been and what was foretold.

This bill proposes a further reduction of 20 per cent., which would leave the duty about 36 per cent.

A duty of 36 per cent. would probably result in increasing the price of foreign wool to 25 cents a pound. At that price how much would come in? If 50,000,000 pounds, then the revenue would be increased to $4,500,000. But 36 per cent. is not down to the point of maximum revenue. If that point were taken at 30 per cent., and we assume that 100,000,000 pounds would come in at that rate, the revenue would be $7,500,000. But this is not down nearly to the revenue basis, or to a tariff for revenue only. During all this time, however, the price of foreign wool would rise in our market and domestic wool fall, until they come together at some indeterminate point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the wool-growers of my State and the wool-growers of the country want to know, and they have a right to know, what the ulterior purpose of this bill is. Is it to go ultimately and as fast as we can get there to a revenue basis of 15 or 20 per cent. on wool? Which shall it be, the principle laid down in the Ohio platform establishing the line that marks the difference in the cost of production as the datum-line from which to adjust tariff rates, or the line of maximum revenue, with an increase of revenue from $200,000,000 up to $300,000,000, and possibly $400,000,000; or the lowest revenue or revenue-only basis?

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We have a right, I say, to know by which principle we are to be governed. Let us know it and let us go to the people with a full understanding of what we mean. As for myself I stand upon the Ohio platform. Its principles can be defended anywhere and everywhere. It is bomb-proof and can not be battered down here or anywhere else.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir, if it will not come out of my time.

Several MEMBERS. We will extend your time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe, so far as I know it, the general sentiment on this side of the House is to deal with this question on the basis of the following resolution:

Resolved, That we denounce the present tariff, as well as the substitute lately introduced in the House of Representatives by the Committee on Ways and Means, as a gigantic robbery of the labor and industry of the country; that they are solely designed to advance the interests of a few thousand monopolies, and that they should no longer be submitted to; and that no candidate for Congress nor for any other office is worthy of support who is not in favor of a low revenue tariff which closely approximates to free trade; that in the arrangement of any revenue tariff all the necessaries of life should be absolutely free of duty.

This was in the platform adopted by the Democratic party in the State of Ohio in 1870, and which was no doubt indorsed then by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And we were beaten in Ohio on that platform; and I did not indorse it then and I do not now.

Mr. SPRINGER. We made those pledges, and whether beaten or not we should stand by our pledges to the people.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But last year we adopted another platform, a platform which was indorsed by every Representative from Ohio on this side of the House except one, and that was my colleague [Mr. HURD] who spoke yesterday. He would not indorse it, and I believe made no speeches on it. But let me tell you the result. My colleague did not get as many votes on his platform of free trade as Governor Hoadly got last year, when the Ohio platform was in issue, by 3,890. In 1882 the Ohio platform was essentially the same as now, and on that platform Mr. Newman, candidate for secretary of state, received 1,256 more votes in my colleague's district than he received on his brilliant free-trade record. I state this only because of the question of the gentleman from Illinois, and because my colleague so triumphantly yesterday announced that he wanted us on the record that he might appeal to the Democracy of the State in their next convention, which I hope he will do, for I have great confidence in the Ohio Democracy.

Other gentlemen here, as good Democrats as are on this floor, as my distinguished friend from the Mansfield district [Mr. GEDDES], standing upon the Ohio platform, beat the Republicans out of time even in old Republican counties. And that is the platform upon which I believe the Democracy of Ohio will go before the people again this year; and on that platform we hope again to carry the State, for there never was a platform adopted in that State which received more unanimously the accord and approval of the entire Democracy of the State than did the platform adopted last year, the principles of which I have endeavored to expound.

Mr. COSGROVE. Was that the platform on which the Senatorial contest was conducted which the gentleman denounced so vigorously?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Better not introduce that question now. [Laughter.] The Ohio platform is opposed to all monopolies.

Mr. Chairman, I have not dealt in statistics. I distrust them unless I know how they are collected and that they are properly correlated with the things to which they relate, and that they are the only elements affecting the problem under consideration. For instance, my colleague yesterday said wheat had fallen under the terrible state of things the tariff had brought about, to 80 cents a bushel, the lowest price, he said, ever obtained in Chicago. Why, sir, I myself when a boy hauled wheat seventy-five miles over the worst kind of roads and sold it in Chicago under the low tariff of 1846–'60, at 42 cents a bushel. My statistics—if such facts may be called statistics—standing alone, prove nothing. There were a hundred other things perhaps that affected the price of wheat then. Nor do his statistics, standing alone, prove anything. I merely state a fact. His statement, not a fact, was accompanied with a flourish of rhetoric; but it would have had no more force of proof if it had been delivered with the accompaniment of a full brass band.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] gave statistics to prove that our manufactures had flourished well under low tariffs. His conclusion seems to have been reached, however, from comparing prices only; but how many other elements have been left out? Absolute price depends on volume of money, and during some of the periods to which he refers there was great inflation of paper issues by State banks. At other periods prices were broken down by violent contraction of the currency. Gold was exported and paper collapsed.

The first effect of the reduction of tariff duties now will be upon the volume of money. Imports will increase; and in the first instance, at any rate, goods sell for money; gold will then go out as importations increase. Our money volume will thereby be reduced, and that will react with compound force upon prices. So that we will not only have increased imports, taking the place of and shutting out of our own markets our own products, but the prices of everything will be reduced by a contraction of the money volume.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has expired.

Mr. STORM. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wish to ask for more time since there are so many other gentlemen who desire to speak. I should like, however, to touch on one or two points more, for five or ten minutes perhaps.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended for five minutes. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have been asked what the Government had to do with anything but revenue in levying duties. I replied by quoting from the early Presidents. But there is another reason which I did not then give, as I did not know that I would have time to give it. It is this, and our fathers well understood the principle and acted upon it: There is often a difference between private interests and the public welfare. When the war of the Revolution closed all saw the importance of having transferred to this country a knowledge of the arts and manufactures. It was especially important that a practical knowledge of metallurgy should be possessed by our people. But it was not the interest of any private person out of his own means, if he possessed any, to establish the iron industry on this side of the water; and why? Because without the requisite knowledge and skill, and without the necessary plant here, it could not be undertaken till these were all imported. They could not be imported except at great cost. Higher wages must be paid to induce skilled labor to leave another country to come here. And any single individual or company that would undertake such an enterprise, without Government aid or Government protection, would certainly have failed. Mr. J. R. McCullough, a high English authority, however, gives the reason better than I can, and I will quote from him:

It appears, therefore, reasonable to conclude that such new beginners having to withstand the competition of those who have already arrived at a very high degree of perfection in the art must be immediately driven out of every market equally accessible to both parties, and that nothing but the aid derived from restrictive regulations and prohibitions will be effectual to prevent the total destruction of their establishments, &c.

The evils which it details have been realized in Russia and Poland since the conclusion of the act of the 7th and 19th of December, 1818. Agriculture without a market, industry without protection, languish and decline. Specie is exported and the most solid houses are shaken. The public prosperity would soon feel the wound inflicted on private fortunes.

But had not the whole country an interest in having this and other industries established here? Is it not to our interest now as a great nation to have among us a knowledge of every art and industry possessed by man? My friend from Rhode Island who spoke the other day [Mr. CHACE] referred to the watch industry which had been so recently established in this country. That was one of the industries which it might never have been for the interest of any private citizen to establish here, for the reason I have given. But it has been an immense public gain to have that industry established among us. And why? Because, as he showed, on four dollars' worth of raw material four million dollars' worth of labor was expended.

A better illustration of the importance of a diversity of industries could not be given. This diversity of industry together with the knowledge and skill it gives rise to is in itself an important source of national wealth. It was a theory of Fourier that there was nothing to be done that some one was not better fitted to do it than any one else. Diversity of employment gives scope to every faculty of man, and whatever multiplies resources increases the wealth of a country. The individual seeks only his own wealth, and whether he gets it from another or by helping to increase the public store, does not concern him; but it does concern the whole people. For the great wealth of a country after all consists in its power to produce; not only in its machinery moved by the power of steam and electricity, in its railways over which the locomotive thunders with its burden train of a thousand tons, but above all in the educated brain and skilled hands of its millions of workers.

Sweep clean the land of all that has been built upon it, but preserve the knowledge, the skill, the inventive genius possessed by our people, and how long would it take to recreate everything? We can buy, to be sure, what cheap labor has produced in other countries; but we can not buy the genius of a Stephenson, a Fulton, or a Morse; but the inventive minds of these men have added more to the wealth of the world than the unskilled labor of a million of men. Such mental qualities are the inheritance of the accumulated experience and skill of many generations. And what a country like ours must have to keep it in the van of the progress of nations is the fullest development of all these powers. We must diversify, specialize, differentiate—if I may use the term—if we would achieve a higher civilization than the race of man has yet attained. To do this we must take care of our industries—the human hives where the honey—wealth—is made.

And how we have been gaining in wealth under our industrial system let an English authority tell. Mulhall, in his balance sheet of the world, says:

It would be impossible to find in history a parallel to the progress of the United States in the last ten years. * * * Every day that the sun rises upon the American people it sees an addition of two and a half million dollars to the accumulation and wealth of the republic, which is equal to one-third of the daily accumulations of all mankind outside of the United States.

Let us not be deluded with the notion that we had better sell the soil we have inherited, for the products of the labor and skill of other countries, rather than encourage and maintain for ourselves an industrial system broad enough to include all the knowledge and employ all the skill which the centuries have handed down to us.

I know that gentlemen will say that our industries will flourish better under free trade and that we would be safe from foreign competition under such a system. You might as well tell me that the dam which nature has erected at the falls of Niagara has no effect in keeping back the waters of the great lakes, or that these waters flow down the Niagara River because the dam is there, and that if you would remove it the waters would be dissipated or would flow westward to the Mississippi River.

If you unwisely lower your tariff the quantity of importations flowing over it would increase, production at home would be stopped, labor would be thrown out of employment, and misery and wretchedness would follow as a necessary consequence. [Great applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman before he takes his seat answer one question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will if I can.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not learn from the gentleman whether the present law was in accord with the Ohio platform.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is not. I am for a reform in the tariff, but I want that done on the principle of the Ohio platform and not by a horizontal reduction. Reduce the tariff, I say, wherever it is above the line of difference in cost of productions here and abroad, down to that line, and shut out monopolies, but give our own industries at least an equal chance in competing for our own market.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman tell us what reduction of the present rates he would have in order to make the tariff comply with the requirements of the Ohio platform?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would if I had time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, when this discussion began I did not intend to take part in it, but as my position in regard to the tariff has been misunderstood by some and willfully misinterpreted by others, I feel it is due myself and the constituency I have the honor to represent to say a word.

When the bill to revise the revenue laws of the United States was under consideration in the Forty-seventh Congress I took a brief part in the debate. What I said is of record; but before proceeding further I ask permission to reproduce the observations then made. I then said:

WHAT SHALL BE THE RATE OF DUTY?

I am a protectionist; I do not believe in free trade. But I do believe in free thought and free speech. Although I may differ with some of those with whom I am associated, that difference will be simply this: I claim the right to determine according to my own convictions how much duty ought to be imposed on a particular commodity in order to secure that industry protection. In thinking upon this question years ago I came to this conclusion, and there is nothing novel in it, that if we could ascertain the cost of a particular product abroad, taking into consideration the cost of material, labor, and a proper return for the capital invested, and also ascertain the cost of producing the same article in this country, the rate of duty to afford protection to the American manufacturer and laborer would be the difference between the cost of producing the commodity here and the cost of producing it abroad.

In making this estimate the cost of transportation to market should be taken into the account. A tariff commission might ascertain how much it would cost a foreign manufacturer to lay down, we may say to illustrate the idea, a ton of bar-iron in the American market, and, on the other hand, ascertain how much it would cost an American producer to lay down a ton of similar iron in the same market, and then the difference between the cost to the two manufacturers should be the tariff duty. This would protect while it would not cut off competition. Now, I admit that there will be fluctuations in values, but they are as likely to occur in the foreign market as in our own. That the tariff duty might surely protect I would add to it a small sum above the difference in the cost of production in this country and its cost abroad. I am here to-day as a protectionist, to vote as nearly as I can to put a duty on these manufactured products equal to the difference in the cost to the foreign manufacturer of putting his product in the American market, and the cost to the American manufacturer of doing the same. Let me say, however, that having obtained all the information I can secure, I must be the judge, when the vote is taken, as to the margin of difference or the duty to be imposed. The responsibility for my vote is with me. * * *

Gentlemen admonish me occasionally that I belong properly to the other side of the House. I thank them; I am not afraid to vote with the Democratic party when I believe it to be right. Indeed, I am rather glad to vote with them when they do very rarely go right. I want to encourage them; it is not often I have an opportunity, I admit. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I represent a constituency engaged in both agricultural and manufacturing pursuits. We have large manufactories engaged in making plows, furniture, reapers, drills, mowers, thrashers, rakes, wagons, and every variety of agricultural implements. These buy their iron, coal, steel, lumber, paint, everything abroad. They go to Michigan for their lumber, to Ohio and Pennsylvania for their coal, iron, and steel; into different markets for their paints, oils, varnishes, and the other material that enter into these implements. They pay a duty on everything they buy. This may be added, it is true, to the price of the product and be ultimately paid when the implement is sold, but then my farmer constituency pay the duty.

These manufacturers are in favor of protection, fair protection, although they do not produce a single commodity protected by this bill. They do not ask protection for themselves. They build their reapers and boilers and drills, their hay-rakes and plows and wagons, and are willing to lay them down in equal competition in our markets beside similar products of any other country in the world. Upon steel, iron, coal, paints, upon all materials used by them, they are willing to pay such a duty as will enable the American manufacturer and laborer to compete with his foreign rivals. They do this in the interest of the whole country, disregarding the mere Congressional district or the mere section. They do this that labor may receive a fair return. When we have gone this far in the interest of protection they ask that I go no further.

WHAT IS THE EFFECT OF A TARIFF ON PRICE?

I confess I have not been able to understand the logic by which it is said that the imposition of a tax on a commodity cheapens it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have always been willing to impose a duty for protection—protection purely—disregarding the idea of revenue altogether, if such protection were necessary to build up a languishing industry. Again, I have not been able to understand how the narrowing of the area of competition increases competition. I confess I have always thought that as you enlarge competition, that as you increase the number that enter upon it you as a rule decrease the price of the commodity put upon the market. I may be mistaken about that. It is insisted, I know, by those who believe in the protection theory, pure and simple, that if you confine competition exclusively to American producers you reduce the price.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know the protectionist who adopts that theory.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It was just adopted a moment ago by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE].

Several MEMBERS. Not at all.

Mr. BROWNE. It has been assumed, if I understand the logic of this controversy, that if you close our ports against a foreign product and leave the market wholly in the hands of the American producer it cheapens the commodity.

Mr. PEELLE. Has not that been the result, I will ask my colleague?

Mr. BROWNE. Now, sir, I am a protectionist, but I want it understood distinctly while I am a protectionist, I believe that as a rule a duty for protection enhances the price of the protected commodity in the American market——

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Of course it does.

Mr. BROWNE. But it brings to us a corresponding advantage, which, if the duty is properly imposed and adjusted, is equal to the enhanced price. My recollection extends back forty years; and I remember this: that during these forty years under the protective system almost all the time every manufactured article put upon our markets has been continually cheapening. Fifteen years ago I paid for an ordinary farm wagon $140. Now in the same market a similar wagon can be bought for $60 to $70. I remember that less than forty years ago farmers in my district sold their pork at $1.25 per hundred net; to-day they obtain for it 6 to 7 cents per pound. While every manufactured article has been diminishing in price everything grown by the farmer has been correspondingly increasing in price. While this is true, I believe at the same time that the imposition of a tariff duty increases the cost of the manufactured commodity, as a rule, in our markets; but as it increases the value of labor, as it makes a market for the agricultural product, it has brought in return for this increase the enhanced value of labor and the increased value of the agricultural product. In this way protection benefits alike the farmer, the manufacturer, and the laboring man.

THE CARRYING TRADE: TAX ON LUXURIES.

It has been apparent to every reader of our commercial history that our merchant marine has been disappearing from the high seas for more than a quarter of a century. Yet when it is proposed that the American Congress shall do something in the way of restoring this important industry, it is antagonized by the suggestion that we have done nothing to relieve the producers of tobacco or the distillers of intoxicating liquors.

Sir, it strikes me that the carrying trade is a matter of national importance, in which every producer, whether on the seaboard or in the interior, is interested. But it is said that we may not grant subsidies in that direction because we ought to relieve the chewers and the smokers and the slobberers of this country from the tobacco tax.

I want my friend from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] to understand that the very last tax which I as a Representative of my constituency will vote to repeal is the tax on liquors and tobacco. If there be any protectionist in this House who would abolish the entire internal-revenue system in order to compel the Government to derive its entire revenue from import duties, if there be such a one, I have no sympathy with him. I have but one idea on this subject; that is to impose upon tobacco and intoxicating liquors the highest duty that can be honestly collected. If we can derive the most revenue from liquors by a tax of 40 or 50 cents a gallon, I am in favor of a tax at that rate. If the revenue may be increased by a tax of $2 or $3 or $5 a gallon, I am in favor of that rate. So with tobacco and cigars. In other words, if specific taxes are to be imposed upon commodities, I am in favor of deriving the largest possible revenue from luxuries and the smallest possible amount from those commodities which are necessary.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I agree with you in the last part of your proposition, and I have never taken any other position. Taxes should be lightest on the necessaries of life, both internal and tariff taxation. * * * Does not the gentleman know that the crop of tobacco raised by the poor man is not a luxury to him, but is a necessity? For with it he buys the necessaries of life for his family. It is only a luxury to the man who uses it, not to the producer; and it is unjust to discriminate against it and burden the producer with taxes that are not imposed upon producers of barley, rye, or corn, or to restrict the farmer in his right to sell for the best price the tobacco raised by him, the product of his own labor.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, in my view tobacco whether produced by the poor man or the rich man, by the small farmer or by the planter of large acres, is but a luxury. There is no good in it. It brings nothing of health. It brings nothing of real enjoyment to the domestic circle. It might be dispensed with without injury to anybody and with benefit to all.

What I have said as to tobacco applies with still more force to intoxicating liquors. On this subject of taxation, whether by import duties or by internal taxes, I stand here in favor of imposing for the purposes of revenue as large a tax as possible upon luxuries, and as small a tax as may be possible upon articles which are necessaries.

I see the Speaker's gavel is about to fall; I hope I may be indulged a moment. I only speak once in a decade anyhow. I hope the House will give me unanimous consent to go on for two minutes. [Cries of "Go ahead!"]

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be extended two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNE. Now, on the subject of the bill. I do not profess to understand it in all its details. I am a landlubber. I believe I have been on a sailing vessel once or twice in my life. I am, however, in favor of encouraging the industry known as ship-building, and particularly that industry engaged in the foreign carrying trade. I have listened to this discussion with much interest, and have determined in my own mind that when those gentlemen who seem to understand the subject have perfected the bill as nearly as may be I shall vote for it. If I were allowed to exercise my own personal judgment I would permit every American to go into any market and buy any ship at the smallest posible cost. I admit that this might be against ship-building interests; but if I understand the object of this legislation, it is not to promote ship-building but to promote the carrying trade. If you are to promote ship-building you will as a matter of course adopt this eighteenth section, with its drawback upon tariff duties, and those other sections to which I need not refer. But if we intend to secure a merchant marine and to put it in competition with carriers in foreign bottoms we must have cheap ships. To get cheap ships we must buy them where we can buy them at the smallest possible cost. This seems to me to be a proposition that need not be discussed. While such is my opinion, however, I wish to say that when this bill has been perfected I intend to vote for it, notwithstanding the fact that it contains some provisions that do not meet my approval. I doubt very much both the power and propriety of exempting ships or any kind of property from State taxation; but will waive that question and vote for this bill, expecting that if it be imperfect experience will so demonstrate, and that future legislation will cure whatever defects may be made manifest, for I hope to see the time come again when our people can compete successfully with any in the world for the carrying trade.

CHEAPER SUGAR.

I can see a reason why gentlemen who favor a tariff for revenue only can vote to keep sugar on the dutiable list, because it is a fact that can not be controverted that 90 per cent. of the sugar consumed in this country is imported, and the duty, so far as it may be paid upon that commodity, goes into the Treasury. But I must confess that I can not understand the logic of the protectionist who favors the imposition of a duty upon this product.

I believe in fostering an American industry, the product of which may at some time be equal to the demand of the country. But there are physical reasons, climatic reasons why the sugar product of this country can not be materially enhanced, and at the same time its consumption is constantly increasing. We produce now, as I have said, about 10 per cent. of the amount of sugar that we consume. The time is not far distant in the future when the per cent. of our production compared with our consumption will be even less than that.

Now let me ask gentlemen how it is that we in the Northwestern States can be expected to pay 1½ to 3¾ cents duty on every pound of sugar which we consume, in order to foster and promote an industry which in the very nature of things can not exceed one-tenth of the amount we consume. Will they tell me?

Mr. ELLIS. We will tell you directly.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman is utterly mistaken in his facts.

Mr. BROWNE. I want to be corrected. There may not be many of us, but I am one of those who want to know the truth, and will follow it to the end wherever that may be.

I take the statistics as I find them. There is only a limited area in the United States where sugar can be produced successfully; everybody knows it. Now, let me ask gentlemen on the other side, let me ask my friend from New York [Mr. COX] who is so fierce for a tariff for revenue only, why it is that they are in favor of putting tea and coffee on the free-list, which are not produced in this country at all? If those articles were put on the dutiable list every cent that might be paid in the shape of duty would go into the Treasury. And yet these men who are for tariff for revenue only propose that they shall remain forever on the free-list.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no.

Mr. BROWNE. I know that my friend is in favor of protecting lumber, yet he is in favor of free trade for everything else in the world, because Texas happens to have a very large number of acres of primeval pine forests.

Now, I am for protection upon every article that may be produced in this country, the possibilties of which may reach the amount of the demand. But when you gentlemen tell me that an article equal in the amount of its consumption to that from which we make the bread of our people, an article the American product of which can not reach—and I put it as high as my imagination will permit me—can not reach more than one-fifth of the consumption, when on account of twenty pounds out of every one hundred that we consume we are compelled to pay 3 cents per pound, not upon the twenty produced only, but upon the whole hundred pounds imported, and charge every dollar of it to the consumer; until gentlemen explain that, I confess as a tariff man I can not be in accord with them.

It will be observed that so far as it may be necessary to impose taxation on specific commodities I would discriminate in favor of such as enter generally into the consumption of the people and are known to be essential to their maintenance. Tax the luxuries and relieve as far as may be the common comforts of life. The tax on tobacco and intoxicating liquors should not be repealed. These are in no sense necessaries, and from them we derive a large revenue, a revenue amounting annually to $91,369,000. While the national debt exists and an immense pension-roll is to pay, as long as the Government exacts hundreds of millions of yearly tribute from the people to meet the demands made upon its Treasury, these taxes should continue. They are paid by the consumer and may be escaped almost wholly without injury to the person or business of the citizen. If the imposition of a tax on these articles should lessen their production and discourage their use, the wealth and happiness of the people would not be diminished but materially increased. If the manufacture of intoxicating liquors is to be continued, it will be a wise policy to make the business reimburse the Treasury for the enormous outlay it compels the Government to make to protect the people from the crime and pauperism it inevitably entails.

A home product that can under the most favorable circumstances furnish but a small per cent. of the home demand may well be omitted from the list of protected commodities. A tariff on such an article is "for revenue," and is dutiable on that theory only. Protection should be given to such industries as may be able to produce a supply of their manufacture equal or nearly equal to the demand of our own people. It is claimed, and it is true, that protection should be extended to an industry which by making it remunerative will invite competition and thus stimulate its production until it may become at least equal to the home market. By building up enterprises of this kind and producing all we need consume we make our people independent of all the world. There are well-known causes why our sugar product can not reach more than 12 or 15 per cent. of our consumption. It is estimated that in 1880–'81 we consumed 2,100,000,000 pounds, upon which was paid a duty of about $46,000,000. Of this sugar the United States furnished but 300,000,000 pounds or less. It will be seen, therefore, that we pay a duty of over 2½ cents per pound on 1,800,000,000 pounds of the foreign product to protect 300,000,000 of our own. Forty-six millions is too much to pay to protect our small sugar industry in Texas and Louisiana. It would be cheaper to the consumer to pay our sugar planters 10 cents per pound bounty for each pound put by them into our markets. And this industry is not increasing, but upon the contrary is falling away. It gives us a smaller supply now than it did thirty years ago.

The crop year of 1853–'54 yielded 495,000,000 pounds of sugar, the crop year of 1860–'61 yielded 528,000,000 pounds, while 1880–'81, as I have said, gave us less than 300,000,000 pounds, and the last year went even below this. In twenty years this production has fallen off nearly one-half, while the consumers of it have increased by quite 20,000,000 of people. As the consumption is about forty-two pounds per capita, we can easily estimate this increase. As this industry can never supply our wants, as it is not increasing under the most favorable tariff legislation, as sugar goes on every table and costs our people as much as do the breadstuffs they consume, I am in favor of putting it on the free-list. If there be other home products occupying the same relation to our production and commerce I would put them there also.

I have been criticised for saying that I failed to comprehend the logic of one of my colleagues, who assumed that the imposition of a duty on a commodity cheapened it in the market. In a talk of five minutes, that being all the time then allowed me, it was not possible to either fully or accurately explain my position. It is true, I repeat, that the immediate effect of putting a duty on imported goods is to enhance their price in the market. If this is not the result, the tariff tax is not protective and utterly fails to accomplish its purpose. It is because, as is truthfully said, the foreign manufacturer, availing himself of cheaper labor and cheaper capital, can produce cheaper goods than we can make that an impost is demanded. It is demanded that the cheaper foreign product may not destroy our manufacturing industries and deprive our wage-people of remunerative employment. But while the immediate effect of this duty is to raise the price of the taxed article, that effect is but temporary, and ultimately the competition protection invites gives the laborer better wages and a cheaper product. This philosophy is well stated by Alexander Hamilton, who said, nearly a hundred years ago:

> But, though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of a tariff was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it can be afforded, and accordingly seldom or never fails, to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away with everything like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience.

Washington, Jefferson, and other great men of that day agreed with Hamilton and were advocates of protection. Having said this much by the way of supplement to views heretofore hurriedly and imperfectly given, I will proceed, if the committee will indulge me, to briefly discuss

THE TARIFF ISSUE.

This discussion is crystallizing the issue for the coming political struggle. Shall our policy be free trade? Protection is put on trial, and it is vigorously declared that there is and can be but one rightful, constitutional function of taxation—that is, to raise revenue for the support of the Government; that even an adjustment of a revenue tariff so as to afford protection as an "incident" is a fraud and a deceit. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] thus characterizes a revenue tariff with the protective incident:

> The alleged incident has notoriously become the chief object, and revenue serves mainly as a pretext for accomplishing protection.
> Against this fraud in the use of language I protest. If protection is good, if protection is right, if protection is constitutional, let it stand on its own merits, and not seek, as has been suggested, to lean on something so respectable as revenue. If a huge system of monopolies is to be perpetuated, and fatten on the substance of the land, let it not escape the odium and execrations an appropriate appellation invites.

The point is tersely put: let protection stand or fall on its own merits. That protective legislation to enable the American producer to fairly compete in our markets with his foreign rival is the true policy of the nation is abundantly proven by all our past experience. It has had the support also of our leading statesmen. The last Democratic President, in the tariff debate of 1828, said:

> The American system consists in affording equal and just legislative protection to all the great interests of the country. It is no respecter of persons. It does not distinguish between the farmer who plows the soil in Pennsylvania and the manufacturer of wool in New England. Being impartial, it embraces all. * * * The Legislature of Pennsylvania have given us what, in my opinion, is the correct version of the American system. They have declared that the best interests of our country demand that every possible exertion should be made to procure the passage of an act of Congress imposing such duties as will enable our manufacturers to enter into fair competition with foreign manufacturers, and protect the farmer, the growers of hemp and wool, and the distiller of spirits from domestic materials against foreign competition. The people of Pennsylvania do not ask for such a tariff as would secure to any one class or to any section of the country a monopoly. They want a system of protection which will extend its blessings as well as its burdens as equally as possible over every part of the Union; to be uniform in its operation upon the rich as well as the poor. * * * By encouraging domestic industry, whether it be applied to agriculture or manufactures, you promote the best interests of your navigation. You furnish it with domestic exports to scatter over the world. This is the true American system. It protects all interests; it abandons none. It never arrays one against the other.

In his inaugural, March, 1857, he asserted the same doctrine. Here Mr. Buchanan states the case clearly and fairly, and the policy he advocated is all the true protectionist demands. It is such legislation as will protect all interests and give a monopoly to none. From the first administration of Washington to the administration of Arthur I assert that protection has been either the object or the "incident" of our customs-revenue legislation. At no time, by no administration, has the idea of protecting our industries been wholly ignored. Free trade, as applied to our American policy, is a new growth, an exotic, a transplant from the "paradise of the rich—the purgatory of the poor." The first protective tariff was passed by the fathers and approved by Washington. In his message to Congress he said:

The safety and the interests of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military, supplies.

Jefferson's democracy will not be denied, and he was a protectionist. So was Monroe, and Jackson, and even Van Buren. As to the position of these distinguished Democratic statesmen I quote the language of a leading Democratic journal:

Thomas Jefferson, the father of Democracy, was a protectionist. In his report on the commerce of the United States in 1793, immediately before his retirement from the Cabinet, he indorsed the principle of protection. In 1802, in his message, he declared proper protection to American industry to be one of the "landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings." Again, in his last message to Congress, in 1808, he congratulated the country that the new manufacturing interests would under "protecting duties" become permanent.

President Monroe, in his inaugural in 1817, said: "Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of our Government."

Andrew Jackson, in his letter to Dr. Coleman in 1824, said that our manufacturing interests "ought to have extended to them adequate protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in fair competition with those of Europe."

In his message of December 7, 1830, President Jackson upheld the constitutional power of the United States to maintain and adjust duties on imports, "with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry."

HOW DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTS UPHELD INCIDENTAL PROTECTION.

Martin Van Buren was nominated and elected President by the Democratic party long after he had established his position on the question of the tariff. In the United States Senate Mr. Van Buren had opposed excessive protection and favored a tariff for revenue, with incidental and equally distributed protection to home industry. He voted for the tariff of 1824 and the much higher tariff of 1828.

Tyler favored a tariff affording incidental protection, and so did Polk and Pierce. President Polk in his first message invited the attention of Congress to the importance of tariff legislation, and said:

The terms "protection to American industry" are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer or planter who toils yearly in his fields is engaged in "domestic industry," and is as much entitled to have his labor "protected" as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic, who are engaged also in "domestic industry" in their different pursuits. The joint labor of all these classes constitute the aggregate of the "domestic industry" of the nation, and they are equally entitled to the nation's "protection." No one of them can justly claim to be the exclusive recipients of "protection," which can only be afforded by increasing burdens on the "domestic industry" of the others. * * * The advantage under any system of indirect taxation, even within the revenue standard, must be in favor of the manufacturing interest, and of this no other interest will complain.

Mr. Calhoun was the author of the tariff act of 1816, and voted for that of 1833, and both of these were protective. To the list of Democratic protectionists I may add the distinguished names of Silas Wright and George M. Dallas; and to the list of those who advocated incidental protection that of Daniel S. Dickinson. The views of the great Whig leaders on this question were too pronounced, and are too well known to require a statement of them here. Having seen the opinions to which the leading statesmen of the past have given expression, we may well ask what has been the history of our revenue legislation? I must be brief here, for I pass over a well-beaten track and explore a field that has been frequently visited before. Our first tariff act was passed in 1789, and the preamble declared that it "was necessary to the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on imported goods, wares, and merchandise." So satisfactory did this system of taxation prove that the duties upon imports were increased by the act of 1790, and again by the act of 1792. These were succeeded by several acts of Congress, including that of 1812, which, as a rule, increased the rate of duty. In 1816 Lowndes, of South Carolina, introduced a tariff bill which was most decidedly a protective measure. Here is an abstract of its provisions:

The average increase was 42 per cent. above the old rates preceding the war, and arranged with particular reference to the encouragement of home industries. After considerable debate the duties on woolens and cottons were fixed at 25 per cent., to be reduced after three years to 20 per cent. The duty on rolled and bar iron and anchors was $30 per ton; on bar and bolt iron not rolled, $7; on sheets, rods, and hoops, $50 per ton. On brown sugar the duty was fixed in favor of the Louisiana planters at 3 cents per pound, and on loaf sugar at 12 cents. On silks, stuff goods, and blankets 15 per cent. ad valorem was fixed. A number of articles were subjected to 20 per cent. ad valorem duties.

This measure was actively supported by both Mr. Webster and Mr. Calhoun. If I am not mistaken this act imposed a much higher rate of duty than any that had gone before it. The first tariff act levied a duty of about 8½ per cent., while the rate under this act of 1816 was of an average of over 30 per cent. The next legislation of importance was that of 1824, which increased the rate of duty to the equivalent of 37 per cent., and that was soon followed by the act of 1828, further increasing it to an average of 41 per cent. This was the highest levy that up to that time had ever been proposed in the American Congress. The following are a few of its features:

The duty on molasses under the act was 10 cents per gallon; on wool 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent., to increase 5 per cent. annually until 50 per cent. was reached; on bar-iron not rolled, $22.40 per ton; if rolled, $37 per ton; and on hemp, $45 per ton.

This act passed the House by a vote of 105 for to 94 against it. In favor of it were 61 Whig and 44 Democratic votes, and 35 Whig and 59 Democratic votes were given against it. In 1832 and 1833 the tariff duties were reduced, and there was no further interference with the question until 1842. In this year a highly protective act was passed, and continued until that of 1846, which again reduced import duties and put the law on a revenue basis with slight incidental protection. Following this came the financial distresses of 1857, then the war of the rebellion, and then the Morrill tariff, so familiar to all. I need not trace the history of this legislation further, for enough has been given to show that our statesmen have fully recognized the necessity for protecting our manufacturing and industrial pursuits; that protection has been the uniform policy of the Government and has been advocated by our wisest and most patriotic men. Now, what has been the result?

The prosperity of our people is without a parallel. In thirty years their property values have increased ffom seven thousand millions to over forty thousand millions. They have invaded the great forests and cleared up farms; they have planted their gardens in the prairies and have been provided a market for their abundant harvests. They have developed the natural resources of a continent—have opened mines of coal, lead, iron, copper, silver, and gold; constructed 110,000 miles of railroad; built shops, mills, and furnaces, and given remunerative employment to hundreds of thousands of our people. The wages paid by them are higher than can be obtained in any other country in the world.

We have opened a better and larger market for the farmer and have given higher prices for the fruits of his toil. We have enabled the people without oppression to either labor or capital to furnish the Government with ample revenue for its current expenses, to largely reduce the national debt, and to enrich and enlarge their happiness. Our system of protective legislation has stimulated production and competition until the product of our mills, looms, shops, and forges have been cheapened. On the other hand, it has enlarged the market for the farm product and enhanced the price of everything the husbandman has had to sell. It has multiplied and diversified our industries, and made us a strong, self-reliant, and independent people.

I do not insist that all these blessings are directly attributable to our protective system, but it is a fact in our history from which there is no escape that prosperity and protection have come together to our people. And certainly our experience exposes the absurdity of the assumption that protection oppresses labor, is disastrous to agricultural pursuits, and fosters monopolies. It is true we have had financial panics and seasons of business depression; that the laborer has been at times out of employment and our manufactures without a market; but it is a significant fact that these periods have followed in the wake of laws that made great reductions of duties on imports and invited excessive purchases of foreign goods. The four marked epochs of free trade depression were 1790, 1824, 1837, and 1857, and the disasters of those years were appalling. These truths prove more than do volumes of unsupported assumptions, and sternly refute a theory "poor in fact and rich only in assertion."

The free-trader argues that protection means monopoly, that the most of the duty goes into the pocket of the manufacturer, is paid by the consumer, and that the tariff is, therefore, a tax imposed upon one class for the benefit of another. If it be true that the duty is paid by the consumer, then it is both unjust and unwise to levy it unless it brings to the consumer a corresponding benefit. The benefits, to be fair and just, must be equal and reciprocal. I insist that protective legislation that enables our manufacturers to compete with the cheap capital and pauperized laborers of Europe brings these reciprocal benefits. Now, there are three classes of our people who are mainly affected by this legislation—the capitalist, who owns the mills and shops; the laborer, whether he be an artisan or a worker in the forests or the mines, and the farmer. The first of these, the capitalist, is benefited all admit. That he should be is highly important to the other classes named, for prosperity to him means more shops, more spindles, looms, and furnaces, a greater demand and a higher price for labor and the farm product. Capital and labor in their normal relations are dependent on each other. Each depends on the other for its profits. The manufacturer could reap no profits without the laborer, and labor would find a dull market if the fires in the forges and furnaces were out and the wheels in the shops stood still. If the employer is prosperous he is enabled to pay labor a better price, and thus greater comforts are put in the reach of the laborer. Instead of an antagonism between capital and labor, the individual prosperity of both—and national prosperity as well—depends upon the existence of harmonious relations between them. Legislation should deal fairly with both.

I am asked, what return has protection through impost duties brought to the skilled or unskilled laborer? I answer, it has given him a more certain employment and higher wages. The American wage-people are more prosperous and better paid than any in the world. They have brighter fires on their hearthstones and better and healthier food on their tables, and their children are better clad and educated. Our system of protection has enabled the temperate and the frugal wage-worker to own his own farm and his own cottage. It is bringing hundreds of laboring men and women every month from abroad to abide with us and enjoy its blessings. It has enabled the laborer to become the capitalist, the dependent to rise to independence, the poor to become rich. Many of the opulent of to-day were poor but a decade or two ago. I never hear the demagogue denouncing the "bloated capitalist" but I am reminded that with us a majority of the rich have come up from the ranks of the laboring people and their fortunes are but the result of labor saved. To illustrate, let me quote:

Here are six shoemakers working in one shop. One of them attends to his business; you can hear the music of his hammer late and early. He is in love, it may be, with some girl on the next street. He has made up his mind to be a man, to succeed, to make somebody else happy, to have a home; and, while he is working, in his imagination he can see his own fireside with the light falling upon the faces of wife and child.

The other five gentlemen work as little as they can, spend Sunday in dissipation, have the headache Monday, and as a result never advance. The industrious one, the one in love, gains the confidence of his employer, and in a little while cuts out work for these other fellows.

The next thing you know he has a shop of his own, the next store, because the man of reputation, the man of known integrity, can buy all he wishes in the United States upon credit.

The next thing you know he is married, and he has built him a house, and he is happy, and his dream has been realized.

After a while the same five shoemakers, having pursued the old course, stand on the corner some Sunday when he rides by. He has got a carriage, his wife sits by his side, her face covered with smiles, and they have got two children, their faces beaming with joy, and the blue ribbons are fluttering in the wind.

And thereupon these five shoemakers adjourn to some neighboring saloon and pass a resolution that there is an irrepressible conflict between capital and labor.

I can imagine that when this shoemaker by his frugality and industry had saved enough to run a shoe factory and employ these five workmen, he was denounced as a monopolist. But pardon this digression. I was proving, or at least trying to do so, that our tariff laws procured for our people better wages. I do not care to bewilder the committee by long columns of confusing figures in the shape of labor statistics, but will content myself by calling your attention to an oft-repeated and indisputable fact, that we pay labor, on an average, nearly twice as much as is paid for it in the Old World. Referring to the admirable argument of my friend, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], it will be seen that ten of the leading employments in the cotton-works of Manchester, England, are paid weekly wages averaging $6.18 each, while in Massachusetts the weekly average for the same kind of labor is $10.84. You can readily compute the per cent. of difference. I borrow from the same speech the following table:

Wages paid in potteries at Hanley, England, and in the United States—from letter of Robert P. Porter, in New York Tribune, April 2, 1883.

	England.	United States.
Flat-presser	$11 10	$20 30
Dishmaker	9 62	19 43
Cupmaker	9 92	19 67
Saucer-maker	7 63	18 58
Handbasin-maker	9 66	19 73
Hollowware presser	8 14	17 90
Hollowware presser jigger	11 62	21 89
Printer	6 55	13 56
Ovenman	6 86	13 18
Sagger-maker	8 46	19 33
Moldmaker	10 23	20 79
Turner	8 00	16 97
Handler	8 39	16 62

Here are thirteen classes of laborers in the potteries. At Hanley the average weekly wage in 1882 was $11.61, while the same were paid a weekly average of $23.70 in the United States. In this industry our laborer receives twice the pay given the British employé. I might institute similar comparisons and with like results between our wages and those paid in Belgium, France, Germany, Spain, England, and indeed by all the industrial nations of the world, but to do so would be trespassing upon your patience. Presently I will try to show that the high rate of our wages as compared with those paid abroad is directly attributable to a tariff for protection.

I am now asked: "In what way is the farmer benefited?"

And first I will let President Jackson answer. In his letter to Dr. Coleman, of April 24, 1824, General Jackson asked:

Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus products? Except for cotton he has neither a foreign nor a home market. Does not this clearly prove, when there is no market either at home or abroad, that there is too much labor employed in agriculture, and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense at once points out the remedy. Draw from agriculture the superbundant labor, employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs and distributing labor to a most profitable account, and benefits to the country will result.

Take from agriculture in the United States 600,000 men, women, and children and you at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes us.

In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of the British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of Europe, feed our own, or else in a short time by continuing our present policy we shall all be paupers ourselves.

And again, long enough after the tariff of 1824 had been passed to give ample opportunity to note its effects, President Jackson in his third annual message, December 6, 1831, said:

Manufactures have been established, in which the funds of the capitalist find a profitable investment, and which give employment and subsistence to a numerous and increasing body of industrious and dexterous mechanics.

The laborer is rewarded by high wages in the construction of works of internal improvement, which are extending with unprecedented rapidity.

And in every succeeding annual message President Jackson congratulated the country on its steady growth in population and wealth, or, as he states in his seventh message, 1835—

The unexampled growth and prosperity of our country.

This is Jacksonian democracy. You observe the answer: Protection gives a larger market, and as a consequence secures a better price for the farm product. It keeps a large body of laborers from the fields and puts them in the workshop; it makes them consumers of the farm product, when, if the workshop did not exist, they would be producers of it. While this system narrows the field of competition among agriculturists, it enlarges the body of buyers. If farming is to be profitable it must have a good market for its surplus, and this can not be had abroad. The farmer is almost wholly dependent upon his home market; and when this fails, his occupation, except in so far as he can consume its fruits, is gone. The gross farm product of 1882 is estimated at $3,600,000,000. Of its surplus not more than 15 per cent. was sold abroad. The balance had to find a home market. Who make this market for the 85 per cent. of what the farmer raises for sale? I answer, the farm surplus is largely consumed by the 4,000,000 of our people who work in the shops and mines and factories. Drive these laboring people from their employments by any system of legislation that will have that result, and let them become producers instead of consumers of the farm product, and the farmer will soon realize the value of tariff protection. All our industries stand together, and an injury to one is felt by all.

It is asked, how does protection increase wages? All know that labor is the chief element of value in every manufactured commodity. If, therefore, foreign labor is cheaper than ours, manufacture here is only possible upon one of two conditions—either our labor must be reduced to the level of that abroad or we must put a duty on the foreign product when it enters our markets equal to the difference. Everything else between the foreign and home producer being equal, the tariff need only be the difference in the cost of labor to insure fair competition. It is certain that this must be had, or manufacturing industries can neither be established or continued in this country. Now, if the cheap labor of Hanley enables the British manufacturer to furnish pottery 50 per cent. below what it costs us to produce it, paying American prices for labor, we can manufacture no pottery without a tariff on that article equal to 50 per cent. at least. Having given this business that reasonable protection, it may proceed securing labor employment at a price above that paid abroad equal to the duty imposed. And if we fix the tariff rate on the imported manufacture at the fair difference in the actual cost to the foreign and home manufacturer of putting his product in the market, the monopoly, if there be any, is that of the laborer, for he gets the benefit of the duty in the increased price paid him for his toil. I have announced myself a protectionist, but I have never advocated a rate of duty beyond that necessary to enable our people to compete with their rivals in those countries where cheaper labor and cheaper capital are to be obtained. I would insure the capitalist a prosperous business and a fair profit on his investment, and no more.

We have now seen that protection gives a market to labor, to the farm product, and has enhanced the value of each, and I now assert that these more than compensate the consumer for any increase of price on what he buys.

But to what extent does a protective duty increase the price? I quote briefly from Mr. Giles B. Stebbins:

Even if a duty sometimes keeps prices up for a brief time, compensations come at once, and lower prices soon follow. Free-traders craftily ignore the compensations that they may the more plausibly deny the benefits. Take, for instance, the Brinkerhoff charge that $40,000,000 went into the pockets of our iron-makers in 1868, as a result of the "iniquitous tax" imposed on the people by the duty on iron, and grant (what is not true) that the price was raised that amount. Mr. A. S. HEWITT, in his report as United States commissioner, said: "The entire difference in the cost of making iron here and in England is the wages," which he gave as 87 cents to $1 per day there and $2 here. So we find that the Brinkerhoff $40,000,000 went to the workmen, and the farmers got about $10,000,000 of it.

Napoleon created the beet-sugar industry in France under a prohibitive embargo. Sugar was high, but it soon fell, and hundreds of thousands of tons of beet-sugar are made in France to-day, practically their entire consumption, and it is exported to the London market.

History tells the same story in different countries—the building up of vast industries and the cheapening of prices under protective tariffs. In England woolens formerly had a high tariff, sometimes a prohibition, and the duty on iron was raised a score of times, from $2.50 up to $35 per ton, and woolens and iron grew cheaper all the time.

What is our own experience? I will not repeat the figures so often given, but the fact dare not be controverted that under our protective system labor and the farm product have been constantly advancing, while every manufactured product has been cheapening in price. Farm labor has gone up 100 per cent. and more within forty years. Cereals, poultry, beef, pork, hay, the product of the dairy, everything the farmer puts on the market has gone up, while woolens, cotton goods, hats, shoes, agricultural implements, every manufacture, indeed, the laboring man buys has steadily gone down.

Mr. Chairman, I remember when, as a boy, forty years ago, I stood behind the counter of a country store in my district; we bought butter at from 5 to 10 cents per pound, eggs at 3 to 6 cents per dozen, chickens at 75 cents to $1 per dozen, pork at from $1.50 to $2.50 per hundred net, and other farm products at prices equally low. These products have advanced three to four hundred per cent. since then. On the other hand, cotton fabrics, such as prints, brown sheetings, tickings, drills, &c., that sold then at 12 to 15 cents per yard, are to be had to-day in the same market for from 6 to 9 cents. There have been like reductions in the prices of lawns, cassimeres, cloths, flannels; but I need not give details, as these facts stand admitted. The conclusion is clear; we can safely continue a policy that has brought these conditions to the country.

Under the genius of our economical legislation we have stimulated industrial enterprise until our raw material is no longer being sent abroad to be made up by the foreign artisan. It is manufactured largely at home by our own people. A few years ago in my own State of Indiana the noise of the wheels and hammers of the mill and shop could be scarcely heard and the glow of the manufactory fires seldom seen. To-day almost every village has a manufactory filled with busy workers in wood, iron, or steel. There are in my little State 12,442 manufacturing establishments, representing an aggregate investment of $53,000,000. These give employment to nearly 80,000 working people, and last year they consumed $97,000,000 of raw material and put of their products in the market the value of $160,828,000. Here we have 80,000 wage-people for the farmer to feed, and here nearly $100,000,000 is paid for raw material. Indiana is proud of these thriving and growing industries, and her political influence will be given to that policy that will maintain them by securing them a market. Our wool, iron ore, coal, and all kinds of raw material are, by reason of these industries, made up at home. The cotton of the South will soon be spun and woven in mills erected by the side of her own cotton and corn fields, thus giving her own work-people employment and her planters a home market.

Alabama has now 23 cotton-mills; Georgia, 62; North Carolina, 92; South Carolina, 81; Tennessee, 33; Virginia, 14; Maryland, 24; Louisiana, 7; Mississippi, 11; Texas, 6; Kentucky, 5; Arkansas, 4; and Florida, 2.

These mills were returned in the census of 1880 as producing $21,000,000 worth of cotton goods; but the product of 1884 is estimated at $35,000,000 to $40,000,000.

Since the census was completed $25,000,000 of earnings of these mills has been sent North for the purchase of new and additional machinery, for though the South itself is rapidly advancing toward such a manufacture of iron and steel implements as will enable her to supply the machinery for her own cotton-mills, at present she has got no further than agricultural implements. In these, however, the South in 1880 had 296 manufactories, which turned out a product worth $3,557,604, the growth having more than doubled between 1870 and 1880.

But, Mr. Chairman, this subject is exhaustless, and I have talked upon it much longer than I intended. I leave it here, and leave much unsaid. I conclude by saying that no legislation should be invoked that will oppress any, even the poorest and humblest, and no special privileges should be secured to any. Our laws should bless all and equally protect all. A true statesmanship has regard for the interest of every calling and every class, for the national prosperity is but the aggregate prosperity of the individual citizen. Believing that fair protection distributes its blessings equally to all; that it has secured an unexampled prosperity to all classes; that under it the nation and the people are enabled to be independent, I shall give it, as a system, my support.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the details of the tariff. That duty is devolved upon the members of the Committee on Ways and Means; but as I shall vote for the Morrison bill with or without the amendment suggested by Mr. Speaker CARLISLE, which proposes to abolish the tax upon tobacco and to reduce to a nominal amount the tax on brandy distilled from fruits, I propose to submit some of the reasons that control my vote.

The sentiment of a majority of the people demands a reduction in the rates of tariff taxation, and it is the duty of the House of Representatives, and especially the majority of it, to make an honest effort to comply with this demand. If such an effort shall fail of success the people will place the responsibility of a failure upon those who contribute to it.

It is the policy of the Democratic party, as I understand it, to cut out by the roots the protective system and substitute in its stead a tariff for revenue as contradistinguished from a tariff for protection.

How that policy shall be enforced is the great question before Congress and the country. It would be an act of party destruction to avoid the duty which is now devolved upon the majority of the House.

Wise and wholesome legislation upon the tariff must be based upon existing conditions to which it relates. What are some of these conditions?

The protective system has prevailed for many years, and under the influence of the bounties and protection bestowed upon the manufacturing industries a vast amount of money has been invested in that business. These industries have grown to great proportions. Their wealth, influence, and power are recognized throughout the entire country, and their business relations are intimately mixed and blended with all the affairs of the people.

The demand for labor in these industries has withdrawn from other callings millions of toiling men, women, and children who, after long years of employment therein, have become parts and parcels of the business. In dealing with the fixed relations of vast industries to the affairs of the people by legislation important changes should always be made with that caution and prudence that high considerations enforce.

It can not be denied that the manufacturing industries are in an unhealthy condition. Under the influence of high protection against fair and just competition they have been hoisted upon stilts. The hot-house influence of bounties and subsidies has fostered a reliance upon the favors of law and not upon the merits of business conducted in the face of fair competition.

Violent or inconsiderate legislation, though leveled at such an oppressive and iniquitous a system of taxation as the protective system is believed to be, would not be justified by existing conditions nor the judgment of the people.

The bill under consideration is a conservative approach toward a tariff for revenue. Its conservatism, fairness, and liberality are all apparent when considered with reference to the conditions to which I have adverted. The reduction in the rates of tariff taxation proposed by it can not present a just cause of complaint from any quarter. After the reduction proposed shall have been applied the average rate of duty upon imports will be 33 per cent., a rate far above a revenue basis. Opinion as to the effect of the bill upon revenue is very much divided. It is believed by some that the amount of revenue that will be realized under its provisions, in case it becomes a law, will be thirty millions less per annum than the amount usually collected under the existing tariff; but I do not concur in that opinion. On the contrary, I believe the revenue will be increased, and I am supported in that opinion by the uniform operation of tariff taxation.

Every reduction in the rates of the tariff from high protection toward a revenue basis increases importations, and consequently the amount of revenue; but such result will present no objection to the bill, to my mind, for the reasons I shall hereafter give.

Mr. Chairman, the great point gained by the people, if this bill becomes a law, and that which constitutes its chief excellency, will be a reduction of 20 per cent. upon the cost of nearly all manufactured products consumed by them. The burden of tariff taxations of which the people complain is the exorbitant prices that they are required to pay for manufactured products, foreign and domestic. Such prices are the result, in the main, of high rates of tariff taxation. A 20 per cent. reduction will be a great saving of expenses to the people, especially to the poor, whose scant wages and meager incomes are, for the most part, consumed in the purchase of the actual necessaries of life, so enhanced in price by the tariff.

Considerations of a just public policy stay the work of reconstruction of the tariff at the limit fixed by this bill, but the demand of the people who have been so long oppressed by tariff taxation will not be wholly satisfied until the work of reconstruction shall be complete by the substitution of a tariff for revenue for the protective system. This measure therefore must serve as notice to all interested that the Democratic party means to advance step by step to the only just and constitutional mode of raising revenue by a tariff.

Mr. Chairman, it is indisputably sound policy to collect no more money by taxation than the Government needs to meet its current demands. A plethoric or overflowing Treasury invites legislative spoliation and encourages wasteful extravagance in all the departments of the public service and the appropriation of public money to objects of doubtful propriety.

The annual withdrawal of large sums of money from the people, not needed for public purposes, is an oppressive exercise of power, if not a grave political crime. I do not think, however, that the Government will collect more revenue under the provisions of this measure if it shall become a law than will be needed to meet the demands upon the Treasury, and therefore there need be no fear of an overflowing Treasury and the harmful results of idle money.

It is said that we are now and have been for several years collecting a large surplus, and that we now have a redundant Treasury. Schemes robed in the guise of benevolence, projects of shameful extravagance, and demands for large appropriations are pending in Congress, all seeking to reduce the cash balance in the Treasury and make room for more money to be gathered from the people.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a surplus dollar in the Treasury. Over $250,000,000 in bonds drawing 3 per cent. interest annually are overdue and unpaid. The tax-payers are paying from seven to eight millions of dollars interest on these bonds annually. How can it be said that we have one hundred millions, or any less sum, of surplus money in the Treasury when the people are paying millions of dollars interest annually upon overdue bonds?

The truth is, that those whose duty it is to apply the money to the payment of these bonds have no disposition to obey the law in that respect. They believe that the public debt is a national blessing because it furnishes a necessity from year to year to gather taxes from the people and a pretext to keep in full vigor the national-banking system, that must expire as the public debt is discharged.

A large proportion of the series of 3 per cent. bonds now outstanding and overdue are owned by the banks. If they were paid off these pets of Government patronage would be compelled to go into the market and buy other and dearer bonds or surrender their circulation. The whole field of legislative expedients is being explored to find some mode to avoid the payment of the public debt, in order to furnish a perpetual foundation on which to rest the banking system, the most remorseless of all monopolies that feed upon the spoils of legislative favor. If it should transpire that the pending bill will yield the Government more revenue, in case it becomes a law, than the present tariff, that result should furnish no just cause of complaint against the bill, but should add to its favor, already great, among the people, who demand that the public debt shall be paid as it falls due, and that national-bank notes shall give way to legal-tender Treasury notes. I support the bill, therefore, because it enforces a reasonable and conservative reduction in the rates of import duties, and to that extent a reduction in the cost of manufactured products to the people, and because under its provisions, as I believe, sufficient revenue will be raised to meet the current demands of Government and extinguish the matured bonds outstanding.

Mr. Chairman, a tariff for revenue, as contradistinguished from a tariff for protection, represents the theory and principle of the Democratic party, as I understand them, upon tariff taxation, and is the only constitutional and just mode of raising revenue by impost duties.

The fundamental principles upon which a tariff for revenue ought to be constructed are that taxes ought not to be levied except for public purposes over which the Federal Government has jurisdiction; that no more money should be collected than such public purposes require under honest and economical administration; and that the burden of the tax should be in proportion to the ability of the tax-payer to bear it.

A tariff constructed upon such principles and fairly adjusted, with reference to existing conditions, excludes the idea of a redundant treasury. It excludes wholly any recognition of right in favor of any individual or class of individuals or corporations to the advantage or protection of tariff taxation in the promotion or advancement of their private interests at the expense of the public.

The results which follow such a tariff system, as has been clearly demonstrated in the history of the Government during the period of the existence of a tariff for revenue, are most beneficent and just when compared with those which flow from a tariff for protection. By it economy in the administration of all the affairs of Government is enforced, because no money is provided for wasteful expenditure or extravagant appropriations. Unequal burdens are impossible, because taxation is proportioned to the ability of the citizen to bear it.

Industries flourish because they must be conducted upon their own merits, without reliance upon the principle of protection and bounty. The laborer rejoices in a better living upon the expenditure of less money. The necessaries of life, indispensable to the poor as well as to the rich, are cheapened or made free of tax. Monopolies are not fostered, because protection to investments or bounties and subsidies paid to individuals or corporations are forbidden by this just system of taxation. Monopolies are not the product of individual or corporate exertion only. Legislative favor, advantages, bounties, and subsidies secured by law are the promoters of monopoly. And, finally, under such a system whatever of prosperity comes to gladden the country is shared by all, from the humblest tiller of the soil to the millionaire.

If there is any question fully settled, so far as the courts can determine, it is that the taxing power under our system of government can only be lawfully exercised to provide revenue for public purposes within the jurisdiction of the Government, and that the exercise of that power for the special benefit of individuals or corporations is a usurpation of power pure and simple. A tariff for revenue falls within the legitimate sphere of the taxing power of the Government because it is the imposition of import duties for public purposes, and not for the special benefit of individuals or corporations.

The Supreme Court of the United States say in the case of the Loan Association vs. Topeka (20 Wallace, page 657), that—

> The power to tax is therefore the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of the Government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. It was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.
> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.
> Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or state." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes."

Coulter, J., in Northern Liberties, vs. St. John's Caurch, says, very forcibly:

> I think the common mind has everywhere taken in the understanding that taxes are a public imposition, levied by authority of the government, for the purpose of carrying on the government in all its machinery and operations; that they are imposed for a public purpose.

Although this decision was made upon a question that involved the power of the Legislature of Kansas to tax the people of that State for a private purpose, yet the principle announced is equally applicable to the power of Congress when exercising the taxing power. If there is no limitation of the uses for which this power may be exercised it may be employed, as it is now, to maintain a protective tariff to ruin one class of individuals and increase the wealth of another. The imposition of import duties for the purpose of raising money to donate to manufacturing industries to enable them to compete with foreign industries would be a clear violation of the taxing power. No protectionist would undertake to defend a violation of the Constitution so open and flagrant. What is the difference between taking the property or income of one citizen by direct means and giving it to another, and in accomplishing the same result by indirection? So far as the citizen who is injured is concerned, there is no difference. His loss is the same, whether his property is taken by one or the other method. The indirect mode suits the recipients of the bounty better, however. If the bounty-money was raised directly, Congress would have to apportion it out among the "protected classes" according to some rule of division. Each establishment would get its proportion. There would be no opportunity for the several parts of each "protected industry" to get more of the stolen goods than its share; whereas under the indirect system that protected industry gets most of the bounty, that drives the hardest bargain with labor. It would be far more honorable to raise the money openly and divide it among the protected classes. The people would then realize how much they pay for the support of the manufacturing interests, and labor could understand its interests in the bounty.

But, Mr. Chairman, this indirect method of taxing the people for the benefit of a few who are engaged in manufacturing is the only safe mode by which to secure the bounty. If this burden was laid openly, so that its enormity would be exposed, the people would revolt against such unjust exaction. Self-interest always rebels against open robbery, but fraud, robed in a patriotic garb, deceives while it plunders.

There will never be a period of time in the future of this Government when a revenue tariff will not give an advantage to the home manufacturer over his foreign competitor. That advantage is not the offspring of right, but it comes as the inevitable result of taxing imports at all. Why should the home manufacturer not be content with the advantage which flows to him under the provisions of a constitutional tariff? What right in morals or law has any private business to be supported from the income of the people?

The proposition is abhorrent, and repugnant to every sentiment of justice and fair dealing, and is an assault upon the equality of right, the very foundation upon which our institutions are supposed to rest. A private industry which can not maintain itself upon its own merits ought to be abandoned. This is the rule of business applicable to all the affairs of men, and simple justice and fair dealing forbid exceptions to it made by bounties extorted from the people under the guise of raising revenue for public purposes.

Mr. Chairman, the contrast between the operation and effects of a tariff for revenue and those of a tariff for protection is marked and significant. It has aroused universal inquiry among the people. There is unrest and disquiet under the burden of a protective tariff plainly discernible in all sections of the Union. While the war raged the burden was borne by the people with patriotic fortitude. For a long time after the close of the war the great public debt silenced their murmurs; but now that peace reigns and the public debt is no longer an incubus, neither patriotism nor sense of honor demands further submission to the cruel exactions of protection.

If a tariff is a tax imposed upon the people who consume foreign commodities that are taxed, and it can not be otherwise, the gross injustice and onerous oppression of the existing protective system is easily demonstrated. I can not go into details, but the total value of all the taxed commodities imported into the United States during the last fiscal year was $493,916,383.81; the average rate of duty or tax paid was about 42½ per cent., and the total amount of revenue received by the Government from the tariff was $194,464,758. These figures mean that the people paid that much revenue for the privilege of buying the foreign taxed commodities that were imported into the United States during that year. They paid over one-third of the value of the goods for the privilege of buying them. This was an enormous tax not justified by the demands of Government.

Now, why did Congress deem it necessary to fix the rates of the tariff so high? It was not for the purpose of collecting revenue for public purposes. If revenue had been the object of the tax less rates would have been fixed, for everybody concedes now that high rates lessen the amount of revenue, while low rates, if not below the revenue basis, increase the amount of revenue. The main object of fixing the rates so high was to protect home manufacturers from the competition of foreign manufacturers. But high as the rates of the tariff are, and enormous as the amount was that the people paid last year for the privilege of buying the small amount of foreign products consumed, it was a mere fragment in comparison with the amount actually paid by the people to the protected industries by reason of the existing costly and imperial system of taxation.

Nearly nine-tenths of all dutiable goods imported into the United States compete with similar products manufactured here for a market. The "protected industries" represent an immense business. The value of the products manufactured by them during the year 1880, as shown by the census, reached the enormous sum of $2,440,502,649. All of these products which were purchased in the United States sold at a price enhanced by the tariff tax upon the foreign competitors. That is to say, the home manufacturer goes into the market with his goods with the advantage of the tariff tax over his foreign competitor. The higher that tax is the better for him. Just how much that advantage yields annually to the "protected industries" is a subject of estimation, which experts can very nearly approximate.

I have been furnished with a table prepared by Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, which shows the operation of the tariff for the year 1882. It is as follows:

Statement showing the amount of incidental taxes annually imposed on the people of the United States in the increased cost of home products by reason of discriminating duties on imported articles of like character, together with the value of such home products, the amount of wages paid and number of hands employed, and the imports and duties received thereon, for the year 1882.

Articles affected by the tariff.	Merchandise imported during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882.			Value of home products, census year, 1880.	Average number of hands employed. a Planters' product for 1880 was: Sugar, 196,759,200 pounds; molasses, 16,573,273 gallons. Number and wages of laborers not stated.

This table shows that the "protected industries" received during the year 1882 $556,938,637 from the people of the United States, who purchased their products in excess of what their products would have brought if there had been no tariff. That is to say, for every dollar paid into the Treasury as a tax upon imports $3 go into the pockets of the "protected classes." I am aware that other estimates place the amount received by the protected industries at a much greater sum, but I regard this estimate as reliable.

It thus appears that on account of the protective tariff over $700,000,000 were drawn from the people during the last fiscal year. Not quite $200,000,000 of that amount was paid into the Treasury as revenue. All the balance of it went into the pockets of the "protected classes" as enhanced profits by reason of the tariff upon the sale of their merchandise.

Can it be possible, Mr. Chairman, that a system of taxation that thus outrages every principle of justice and fair dealing finds a warrant for its existence in the Constitution which we all so much revere. Its greed and pillage are sufficient to appall every just man.

If this enormous burden fell only on the rich, or if it were equitably adjusted and apportioned among the people according to their ability to pay, the system would in some measure be relieved of its unblushing tyranny and gross oppression; but such is far from the fact. The burden falls heavier upon the shoulders of the poor than upon those of the rich. The poor must purchase the necessaries of life taxed as they are, and so must the rich; but this system of taxation makes no distinction between the ability of the two classes to pay the taxes imposed, even upon the necessaries of life.

What must be the results of such a system of taxation? Unlike those which flow from a tariff for revenues wholly. The burden of the tax falls unequally. Those the least able to supply themselves with the necessaries of life are most oppressed, and the burden decreases as income increases. Its tendency is to centralize wealth, to build up classes by forced contributions upon the people at large, to foster monopolies, and to create an aristocracy of wealth. It degrades labor instead of elevating it, for under the guise of high wages it robs it of its income in enhanced prices for the necessaries of life. Monopoly and serfdom go in pairs, and both are the legitimate offsprings of a system which robs the public to aggrandize the few. [Applause.] Besides, sir, the effect of this system upon the protected industries themselves is most harmful. It encourages overinvestment and overproduction, and the bounties paid enable them to suspend work at pleasure, to the ruin and distress of labor. It creates conditions under which large wealth is accumulated in the hands of few, while the many are forced into poverty.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that the present tariff is the offspring of the war. During that great but ever to be regretted struggle the demand for revenue and manufactured products reached the very highest point of human necessity. The present rates of the tariff were fixed, in the main, for a twofold purpose: for revenue, and as a stimulus to production to meet the extraordinary demands of the war.

Whatever might be said by way of justification of the system as a necessity of war would challenge my respect, for I recognize the fact that the life of a great nation imperiled by war is dearer than constitutions or laws. But the war closed twenty years ago. There is now no war demand for manufactured products and no stimulus is needed. On the other hand, the stimulus applied by way of bounties and protection has resulted in overinvestment and overproduction. On all sides we hear of mills closed or running on limited time. The mill-owner rests on his bounty until demand for his goods revive, while the laborer is turned out to look for work in other employment. The system has outlived its purpose.

Mr. Chairman, it is said that the marvelous development of the resources of the country during the last twenty years and the enormous addition to the wealth of the people and their apparent prosperity are all due to the protective system, and they are eloquently displayed as the beneficent results of protection. Is the credit due? I think not. If you will compare the results of the period when we had a Democratic tariff with those which are now claimed for protection fairly and with reference to the conditions applicable to each, you will find the prosperity of the people under the former period far more satisfactory to the philanthropist and the patriot than that which now exists. During the period of a tariff for revenue, the prosperity of the people (as shown by the census) was marked and significant. It was widely diffused. The acquêts and gains of labor, industry, and enterprise were shared by the whole people, from the humblest tiller of the soil to the millionaire.

The prosperity which is apparent to-day is in a large degree deceptive. The general and substantial prosperity of the tariff-for-revenue period does not exist. It is true that we are dazed by the glare of wealth and stand lost in admiration at the grand development of the inherent resources of the country. But I regret to say that the wealth which attracts our attention to-day lies up in heaps. It is enthroned in palatial residences that shelter the bounty-fed barons of protection. It displays itself in the long lines of railway stretching across the continent, all owned by money kings; in the "million list," who cut the coupons from untaxed bonds; in the long roll of banks and bankers, fattening day by day upon the spoils gathered from the people by the favor of class legislation; in the costly public buildings, more fit for the scarlet henchmen of royalty to dwell in than the servants of a republican people, erected all over the country by the money wrung from the public by this system of indirect taxation; and finally in the baronial landed estates filched from the public domain, the heritage of the poor, under the forms of law. [Applause.]

From 1860 to 1870 the nine leading manufacturing States increased their wealth 173 per cent.; from 1870 to 1880, 200 per cent.; while for the same period the nine most fertile agricultural States show no such wonderful achievements in the acquisition of wealth. The truth is, and I regret to say it, that the wealth of the country acquired under the protective system is most unevenly divided. There is abundant wealth and prosperity, but who shares it? There are to-day more modest homes where the comforts of wealth are unknown, there are more tenement houses where tired people are supposed to rest, there are more cabins clinging to the hillsides or dotting the great plains, there are more hovels where squalid poverty sleeps upon its rags, and there are more able-bodied men and women eking out a miserable existence upon scant wages than at any other period in the history of the country. In the very glare and glamour of centralized wealth and corporate power which the protective system promotes there is a vast army of men, women, and children struggling for the barest living. There is no factor in American politics or policies that has contributed more to centralize the wealth of the country, to make the rich richer and the poor poorer, than the system of protection.

This iniquitous system of protection is defended mainly upon the ground that the aid extended to the "protected industries" is necessary to enable them to pay their laborers compensatory wages. This defense is remarkable in many respects, and in none more so than its entire falsity and want of sincerity. Abstractly considered, it presents no merit founded on right. It assumes that Congress has the right to tax the people for the purpose of making a private business profitable to the owners, a right denied by the highest court of the country. The very statement of the demand is abhorrent and repugnant to justice and fair dealing. It has no warrant in the Constitution. It is the offspring of greed. [Applause].

Life, Mr. Chairman, from the cradle to the grave, is but a combat for a comfortable living and a decent burial against all opposing elements. In that great struggle every contestant is entitled to a fair chance of success, and whenever the Government lays its heavy hand upon the income or property of the citizen, not for public purposes of government, but to transfer it to another citizen to aid him in the struggle, it commits an unpardonable crime against humanity. Besides, sir, this defense of the protective system upon the part of the recipients of its bounty is false and insincere, and in proof of it I present the letter of Dr. Young, the president of a cotton factory in the State of Georgia:

COLUMBUS, GA., March 13, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of 10th instant, in which you ask my views as to what effect a reduction of 20 per cent. would have on the cotton manufacturing interests of the South. To the question I answer unhesitatingly, none.

The South is now engaged in manufacturing, say, standard (or heavy-weight) goods, and which are mainly consumed by the masses of our population South and North; and now the South sends her surplus productions to the North, where they displace all such heavy-weight goods as were formerly made there and sent South. These advantages (in all such goods) must ever remain with the South, over New England and Old England; and New England, on account of closer proximity to the cotton-fields, has a relative advantage over Old England.

A reduction of 20 per cent. in the tariff would not enable England to compete with this country, North or South, in these heavy-weight goods; but if the tariff on all articles entering into the cost of manufacturing in this country were also reduced 20 per cent., then the manufacturers North and South would be benefited; and if the duties on all such goods entering into the cost of manufacturing were made free, then the North and South could compete with England in all markets of the world. The tariff as it now stands of course shuts out all foreign competition with manufacturing productions in this country (except a few specialties of fine goods for the wealthy); and it locks in their productions, and thus confines them to the home demand; and, as a consequence, there is now a glut of goods. To illustrate my position, the company over which I preside consumes about fifty bales of cotton per day. A New England mill consuming that amount of cotton would have to pay $250 per day more for it than it costs this company, and a mill in England would have to pay more than that.

These advantages are so great that the tariff (if entirely removed) would not enable England to compete with this country on heavy-weight goods, and if the tariff was removed on all articles that enter into the cost of manufacturing, then this country could command the markets of the world and the supremacy of England would be ended.

I have visited England three times and have investigated the cost of labor compared with the South, and found it more (or higher) than here; and yet our operatives were in better condition from the fact that food costs less with us, and clothing also, as our climate does not require such heavy clothing.

I think labor at the North about the same as in England.

I also investigated the cost and selling price of heavy cotton goods, and concluded I could sell in England at a profit, but to do so I must adopt their peculiarities of styles, and I prefer a home market.

I believe if all our custom-houses were abolished that this country would find (in England) a large market for our manufactures of cotton and woolen goods. Now, this country is heavily taxed with almost everything that enters into the cost of production, beginning with machinery and ending with the baling the goods with Scotch burlaps.

I believe the manufacturing interests in this country, with their natural advantages, if free from all tariff legislation, would soon become the great manufacturing center.

Yours, truly,

EAGLE AND PHŒNIX MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
W. H. YOUNG, President.

Hon. HUGH BUCHANAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

In order to show the insincerity of those who urge this plea in behalf of protection, I submit that the "protected industries" during the last fiscal year paid their laborers $447,719,876. They received incidentally from the protection afforded by the tariff, as I have shown, over $500,000,000. How was that sum applied? If it was applied to the payment of the wages of their laborers, it was more than sufficient to pay the entire wages due their laborers. So it seems that the people paid the wages of the laborers employed by the "protected industries" and nearly $200,000,000 in excess, which went to swell their enormous demands.

It will be borne in mind that this demand is made in behalf of American labor against the competition of cheap foreign labor.

The history of the transactions of the "protected industries" shows that no consideration of the wages of laborers enters into the demand for tariff bounties and protection. It shows that the iron rule of supply and demand is applied to the wages of the laborer. If the supply is great the laborer must be content with whatever price is offered. Nor is this rule harsh and arbitrary, as it is always applied in the interests of the American laborer. But these "protected industries," notwithstanding the bounties and protection they secure, confessedly in the interest of American labor under the tariff, do not hesitate, whenever they desire to swell their profits, to explore the crowded marts of the Old World for cheap foreign labor to take the place of American labor, until now 30 per cent. of American labor has been driven out of their employment and foreign labor substituted for it.

Sir, the Democratic party makes no war upon capital, but is now and always has been the champion of the rights of the people against the encroachment of power and unjust exactions. It has always battled for a pure and honest administration of Government. It has stood by the people throughout the long war which monopoly and centralized wealth have made upon their income and property. It has been the avowed foe of all class legislation. It has struggled to bestow the blessings and benefits of Government on all alike and to apportion its burdens among all the people. Time and time again it has gone down in defeat, overwhelmed by the combined elements of protection, monopoly, and centralized wealth. But undaunted by defeat, inspired by the great cause of the people against all opposing elements, it will ever be true to its principles and traditions in adversity or prosperity. [Great applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because I believe it wrong in principle, unscientific in construction, hurtful in tendency, and destructive in effect if carried to its logical conclusion. Its very discussion is already disturbing the business of the country, and the only parties who look forward to its passage with hope are the manufacturers of England and the school of politicians who advocate it upon this floor.

The questions involved have been so amply discussed that I should have remained silent had it not been for the fact that I represent a district which this bill strikes with fatal force. The details of tariff legislation have received such full consideration in this debate that I do not purpose to add to the discussion of details. So many figures have been given, which no one remembers except in a general way, that I shall not pile up more figures; but I shall seek to discuss some of those underlying principles to which all details and all figures are subordinate.

We have here a positive antagonism of theories, while their supporters profess a common aim and object. All, protectionists and free-traders alike, profess to desire the permanent welfare of our people, and especially of those who depend upon daily labor for daily bread. Professedly we do not differ in the end, but only in the means of attaining the end. These two theories are:

1. "Commercial freedom," or free trade, the fundamental idea of which is that our market is the world.

2. Protection, or "the American system," with the fundamental idea that by discriminating duties upon imports we may segregate the markets of our country from those of more densely populated countries, and that thereby a scale of wages definitely American may be maintained.

In discussing this qustion we are not to forget that one of these theories has been thoroughly tested, and its results are known and reasonably certain.

Free trade in its full meaning has never been tried in this country, and therefore what its results would be is a matter of speculation only. Whatever names may be used, it must not be forgotten that there are not and never have been any advocates of genuine free trade in this country. Ever since broke down for the want of a stable revenue, and the present Constitution was adopted in order that the Federal Government might have an income independent of the several States, and since the levy of duties on imports was found the simplest and most feasible method of raising Federal revenue, a practical free-trader has been unknown in this country.

To support the Government by direct taxation upon property would necessitate either the employment of a second net-work of tax officials throughout the States, a system most expensive and offensive, or the collection of the Federal revenue through the tax machinery of the several States upon requisitions from the General Government, thereby inviting constant collisions and conflicts of Federal and State jurisdiction, ending at last in the employment of military force or a final breakdown of the Union as the Confederation broke down, for the want of the taxing power. In either case no party would long survive which attempted to conduct this Government by direct taxation on property.

THE ISSUE IS NOT, THEREFORE, BETWEEN TARIFF AND DIRECT TAXATION.

There remain, then, two resources:

1. External taxation, or "tariff."

2. Internal taxation, called "internal revenue." Internal revenue has never been recognized as a part of the ordinary and accepted tax system of the country. It has been unpopular from the foundation of the Government. The cause of this is not far to seek nor hard to find. (1) It is a tax upon production and not upon consumption. It discourages the production of whatever it is laid upon. (2) It is a tax upon the business of the country and brings it under a surveillance at once obnoxious and embarrassing. (3) It can only be carried out through and by a system of espionage, not only costly and odious, but contrary to the spirit of our institutions. (4) Its only place in any system is as a tax upon a few things, such as distilled spirits, which are recognized as not only strictly luxuries, but are conceded to be hurtful to society, and the production of which is rather to be diminished than increased.

The internal-revenue system finds its only true sphere in time of war, when a vast revenue must be raised with a certainty not dependent upon our consumption of foreign products. The weakness of the tariff as a purely revenue system lies in the fact that through our inability to consume foreign products in time of war the revenue is certain to break down when most greatly needed. We are brought around, therefore, to the conclusion that the only ordinary and permanent source of revenue that the Federal Government can rely upon is the duty on imports collected in its own custom-houses by its own fiscal agents.

THE ISSUE IS NOT BETWEEN TARIFF AND INTERNAL REVENUE.

No party since the adoption of the Constitution has ever proposed to dispense with a tariff. No party now proposes to dispense with it, and none ever will so long as the Federal Government must have an independent revenue.

The issue, then, is not between tariff and anti-tariff, nor yet strictly between high tariff and low tariff, but rather between protection and anti-protection. And yet for the purposes of this discussion I shall speak of these two parties or elements as protectionists and free-traders. Both are for a tariff for revenue. Both are not for a tariff for revenue only.

The protectionist system is

THE NATIONAL SYSTEM.

The free-trade system is a cosmopolitan system.

By protection we seek first, foremost, and always to develop our own country—

1. As to its natural resources, its raw material.
2. As to labor, the transmuting power in production.
3. As to its transmuted labor, its capital or wealth.
4. As to its markets, its means of consumption.

By this system we seek and believe that we achieve the following ends, which we consider in the highest degree desirable:

1. National independence—

First. By the development of our own natural resources, our raw material.

Second. By the production within our own borders of all that is needful to national or individual life.

Third. By the creation within ourselves of every form of labor, skill, or invention requisite to national or individual support.

Fourth. By the control of our own markets, free from the domination of foreign powers either in peace or war.

Fifth. By the maintenance of a national scale of wages, creating a greater power of consumption, higher civilization, greater content, and greater loyalty.

And here let me say that no nation can be truly great or truly independent until it can arm, clothe, and munition its own armies in time of war, and control its own markets in time of peace! [Applause.]

2. The next object of protection is the conservation and utilization of the great natural advantages which the Almighty has given us in our broad domain, our ample raw materials and natural facilities for transmuting them into products for the consumption of an advanced civilization.

3. Maintenance of home markets adequate to the consumption of home production, so as to effect a saving upon transportation which shall go to augment the common wealth of the country, increasing the wages of labor, the returns of capital, and the capacity for consumption.

Against all this the free-traders put a single maxim, to wit: "The market is the world; buy where you can buy cheapest, sell where you can sell dearest." In other words, the whole race of life is reduced to a race for cheapness, not for advancement.

What does this maxim mean? When we are adjured to "open the markets of the world," what does that mean? It means that we are adjured to reduce our cost of production to a level that will force our products into the markets of the world. This can only be done by reducing the wages of our laborers to and below the level of the wages of every nation with which we compete in the specified production, for transportation must be added to prime cost. "The speed of the fleet is the speed of the slowest ship," and the level of wages in order to compete in production with the nations must be the level of the nation having the cheapest wages engaged in the specified production.

"FREE TRADE" IS THE MILLENNIAL SYSTEM.

When all nations are on an even plane of civilization, all nations on an equal scale of production and invention, all nations of an equal density of population, and all nations shall have an equal capacity for consumption, then the markets of the world will reach an equilibrium, and when thereafter the epoch of universal peace shall come in—in other words, when the millennium shall dawn—the doctrine of free trade may become practical, but never until then. Until then there must be discrimination and protection in favor of our own resources, labor, production, and markets. [Applause.]

We have now advanced thus far:

1. The Government must have revenue.
2. This revenue must be derived chiefly from duties upon imports.
3. That in deriving this revenue from imports a discrimination should be made in favor of American materials, American labor, and American markets.

I come now to discuss these questions in detail, under the several heads of

RAW MATERIALS, WAGES, AND MARKETS.

And first of "raw material." This is the shibboleth of the free-trade party—"free raw materials!" Now, what is raw material? On this matter of primary definition there seems a great confusion of ideas, but on it depends much, if not the entire question. That eminent economist, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], spoke the other day of pig-iron and scrap-iron as "raw materials." The equally distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] resents this as to pig-iron, but joins Mr. HEWITT in putting alcohol in the list of "raw materials." The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], in his eloquent speech recently, puts wool down as a "raw material." And by some strange contradiction of terms "manufactured lumber" is classed as a "raw material." In the minds of these gentlemen evidently raw material is a "movable quantity," a relative term. It would be defined thus: "All that comes to me is raw material, no matter how many hands have wrought upon it before; all that goes from me after my labor has passed upon it is 'finished product,' no matter how many processes it may pass through between me and the consumer."

Now, in truth and in fact there is no raw material but nature; all else is the result of labor. The ore untouched in the unopened bed is raw material; but when labor has opened the mine, built a track for the ore, put cars upon it, constructed implements for mining, dug the ore, rolled it out of the mine, transported it to the dock, loaded it on ships, carried it to the furnace which labor has built, lifted it with machinery which labor has erected, mingled it with lime which labor has quarried, melted it with charcoal which labor has cut in the forest, burned in kilns which labor has built, and then when grimy and sweating labor has drawn the glowing molten mass from the vast crucible and cast it into ingots or pigs, it is not "raw material," but labor, concentrated labor. More than nineteen-twentieths is labor and less than one-twentieth is "raw material." [Applause.]

In the case of alcohol it is even more absurd to class it as a raw material. The raw material in alcohol is infinitesimal. Labor clears the land and reduces it to cultivation. Labor plows the ground. Labor plants the corn, which labor before has raised. Labor cultivates the crop. Labor harvests it, houses it, shells it, transports it on roads which labor has built to distilleries which labor has reared. Labor puts it through the various processes of distillation, casting nineteen-twentieths of the raw material to the distillery swine or cattle. And when the spirits, the alcohol, emerges from the still 999 parts in every 1,000 is labor, and one part or less is "raw material."

It is little less than astounding to hear that political economy which places alcohol in the category of raw material, but it is no more amazing than it is to hear manufactured lumber placed in the same list.

The raw material is the untouched forest. Labor fells the trees, cuts them into logs, skids them, hauls them to the water, floats them to the mill which labor has built, lifts them into the mill, saws them, piles the lumber on the dock, puts it on the vessel, transports it to the primary market, and there, where four-fifths of its value is labor, it is still classed as a raw material.

In the same way, only to a less extent, wool is a raw material. Nature grows the fiber, but labor prepares all the conditions. If you can estimate the value of the wool clip of this planet before the hand of man had struck a blow upon it, before a tree had been felled or a home reared, you can justly estimate to what extent wool is a raw material.

Wool is as much the product of labor as statuary, in fact more so, for the raw material enters more largely into the marble statue than into a piece of woolen goods, or even a clip of wool.

The sooner we recognize the fact that all civilization, all wealth, all production is the outcome of labor—the great magician, the touchstone that transmutes nature's treasures into life and comfort and human use, the sooner we shall find ourselves upon the everlasting adamant. [Great applause.] All wealth whatever is labor crystallized. "Free raw material," except we use our own raw material, is a delusion and a snare.

We may as well settle our hearts upon this foundation fact, that for the purposes of this discussion there is no raw material imported into this country and from the very nature of the case there can be none, for when it reaches these shores the so-called raw material will be composed of from 900 to 999 parts in every 1,000 of labor and nothing but labor.

Labor, mental and physical, ought to possess the wealth of this world, because it has the right of creator. I thank God that in this land at least they do possess it. And it is only here and there that some one has gained possession of wealth which he did not help to create. The general average of our 54,000,000 people is not greatly disturbed by these exceptional cases.

My colleague from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE] in his able free-trade speech declared that "exchange is the source of all life and wealth." My friend is in error. Labor, productive labor, is the source of all life and wealth, and the less of this productive labor that is wasted or expended by exchange in bringing the producer and consumer together the better for both producer and consumer. Exchange is necessary, but the less the expense of exchanging the larger the residuum. It is the recognition of the fact that manufactured products are only embodied labor that forms the basis of the tariff system.

The tariff duty is intended to be apportioned upon different articles according to the amount of labor that has entered into their production: if but little labor, then but little duty; if much labor, then a larger duty; and the highest duty upon that which involves or embodies the largest amount of labor. With each new process, therefore, through which the manufacture passes comes an addition to the duty which is levied upon it. As the more elaborate and expensive articles are generally consumed by the wealthy, and the simpler forms, involving less labor, by the poorer class, the higher duties are consequently laid upon articles of luxury, and not of necessity. It is the idea of the equitable distribution of the rewards of labor to the actual laborers that lies at the very foundation of the protective policy.

This brings me next to speak of

THE WAGES OF LABOR.

The price of anything is simply the price of the labor in it. The labor is measured by wages, and so wages—the price of a day's work—becomes the measure of value of everything that the world uses or consumes.

If all nations were upon a dead level of civilization, with equal natural resources of the same kinds, for which there was an equal demand, with equal powers of invention and production, with equal capacity for consumption, and an equally dense population, then wages would be everywhere the same. The price of labor, like the price of everything else, depends upon the law of supply and demand; that is, upon the amount of the supply relatively to the demand.

The supply depends upon the power of production, and production depends largely upon brain labor and inventive genius, and the use of labor-saving machinery. One engine, run by two engineers and a half dozen firemen and attendants, will do the work of more than twenty thousand men. So we see that the greater the brain-power—the inventive faculty, in a word—the higher and more vigorous the civilization, the greater the production, and the greater the supply.

On the other hand, the demand depends upon the ability to consume, equal populations being considered. The barbarian can consume but little. His wants are but few and simple. A wigwam, a bow and arrow, a fishing rod and line, a breech-clout, a bearskin, a tomahawk and knife are sufficient to meet his demand. Civilization is the multiplication of wants. Civilization must have houses, grounds, gardens, fields, fences, roads, railways, canals, ships, factories, shops, schools, and churches, and all that these imply. In its homes there must be the accessories of civilized life, furniture, carpets, books, pictures, tapestries, decorations, instruments of music, and a multitude of like objects. A thousand articles of use and beauty fill the home of civilization. All these things must be made, and made by labor. In a word, the higher the capacity for consumption, the higher the civilization; and the higher the civilization the greater the capacity for consumption and the consequent demand for labor.

When we compare the common people of our own land with those of older countries, and especially free-trade countries, we find in those countries, first, a lower grade of civilization and a consequently smaller capacity for consumption of the products of labor, and hence a comparatively small demand for labor itself; second, overpopulation and overproduction, and a consequent oversupply of labor. There are two men to do the work where only one man is needed, and hence the two must divide the wages of one. The consequence is that wages are kept at the lowest living line. If the common laborer can live, it is all that he expects and all that his children hope. On the other hand, in this country the demand for labor is in excess of the supply.

Our conditions are singularly favorable to the working class. We have a vast and undeveloped continent. Its natural resources are great in extent and in variety. Here land, the prime raw material, is free. Here cities are to be built, mines to be opened, farms to be cleared, railroads to be constructed, canals to be dug, and all the forces and accessories of a most vigorous, versatile, and advanced civilization created. [Applause.] The work to be done is vastly in excess of the workers, and the result is that wages are high. This again increases the capacity for consumption among the wage-earning class. And this again an enlarged demand for production, an increased call for labor; and so we move in the endless procession of high wages, large consumption, demand, and production, which constitutes highest civilization. This is national prosperity.

IMMIGRATION

is the great economic thermometer of prosperity. Immigration measures the superiority of the American system over those of the Old World. Every year we see from one-half to three-quarters of a million of people leaving the homes of their youth, the hearthstones of their sires, the graves of their ancestors, to find a home among strangers in this strange land. Why this breaking of all the most sacred ties? Why this uprooting of all the deepest affections? Why this voluntary expatriation? It is because they leave behind them the land of industrial despair and turn their faces to the land of blessed and soul-inspiring hope. Away beyond Atlantis, beyond the blessed isles of the Hesperides, lies for them the sun-lit land of promise, where honest toil is recompensed by honest reward. [Great applause.] It is in vain that you tell them that this is the land of the "robber tariff," that this is the land where the "poor grow poorer and the rich grow richer," for they know that you do not tell the truth, and that their friends who came before them have acquired comfort and a home, and have sent them the means to follow. They know that though they may pay more for a few things, yet bread and meat are cheaper, rent is cheaper, land is cheaper, while a day's work brings more; and at the end of a year they have saved more than they could possibly save in the land which they leave behind them.

Now the question is: Shall we throw away all these advantages? Shall we open our markets freely to the producers of all the world and force our wage-workers into the unequal contest with the half-paid labor of Europe or the quarter-paid labor of Asia?

In collecting our vast revenue shall we aim to collect it from such articles as embody cheap labor, and thereby maintain our standard of wages and protect our manufacturers and laborers, or shall we adopt

A TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY?

We may as well here as anywhere consider what "a tariff for revenue only" means. It is a tariff whose only object is revenue. The moment you seek anything more than this you become protectionists. It is a tariff levied and adjusted with reference to raising the largest amount of revenue in the cheapest manner and with the greatest certainty. It must therefore be levied upon the smallest number of articles and those of most general consumption, and hence upon the necessities of life. Revenue must be most certain and most uniform; therefore the tariff must be laid upon those articles which we do not ourselves produce, and which therefore do not come in competition with our labor. So that the "tariff for revenue only" strikes the poor man twice, and twice fatally. First, it taxes the articles of daily consumption, such as tea, coffee, sugar, and spices; second, it taxes those things which come least into competition with his labor, while those manufactured products which are all labor and come most into competition with him are untaxed or least taxed. It is free trade aggravated with taxation of the prime necessities of living.

A protective tariff is the reverse of all this. It puts upon the free-list those articles which we do not and can not produce, together with those into which the least labor enters, and which do not come into hurtful competition with American production. Upon the coarse and cheap necessaries of the poor low duties are laid, while the higher duties are reserved for such as enter into sharp competition with American labor, and such as are chiefly consumed by the rich. That even the free-traders concede. It was conceded on this floor during this debate by the author of this bill [Mr. MORRISON] in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCKINLEY. But for the purpose of comparison I will ask to print as an appendix to these remarks the tables prepared and used by my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. But they say that it is not protection that makes high wages. For the purposes of this discussion I do not care very much whether we say that protection creates high wages or say that it preserves and maintains them. We know that without protection the maintenance of high wages would not be possible in free and open competition with low wages.

As ninety-nine parts at least in every hundred of the cost of every manufactured article is the cost of the labor that enters into it, it follows, "as the night the day," that the only way in which we can compete under free trade with the cheap labor of the Old World is by cheapening our own labor to their standard. The only alternative to this cheapening of labor is that we shall give up the attempt to compete in manufacturing and devote ourselves to something else. They tell us we "must buy where we can buy cheapest." That is undoubtedly in the markets stocked by the starvation labor of Europe. But remember that every article which we buy abroad is an article that ought to have been made from American material, by American hands, on American soil.

Whenever we encourage foreign importations we are transferring to English shops the work that ought to be done in American shops by American labor. [Applause.]

is simply this: It says to the foreigner who uses cheap labor, and has converted that cheap labor into manufactured goods, "You can not sell in our market until you have paid into our Treasury a sum sufficient to bring you into the market on a level with the manufacturer who employs American labor at American wages." "But," says the free-trader, "that makes your produce cost more." Perhaps so at first, but not at last. There are multitudes of cases, among the most notable of which is the case of steel rails, where home competition has forced the market, and brought down the foreign price to about one-half of what it was when protection stimulated the home production. It leaves the price to be regulated by the energetic and strenuous competition of 54,000,000 of as wide-awake and go-ahead people as there are in the world, which will soon reduce the price to the lowest living compensation. Protection simply puts a fence of law around these 54,000,000 and says to the rest of the world, "Hands off."

Universal experience shows that, owing to the stimulus of this protection, the greater inventive genius of our people, and the introduction of labor-saving machinery, we are soon able to control our own markets, and even to invade the markets of our great competitors. Of course I need not say, because it goes without saying, that when that time comes the foreign producer, and not the American consumer, pays the duty necessary, in order to force his production into our market.

THE AGRICULTURAL CLASS.

But we are told again that while this system may be good for the manufacturer and good for the wage-earner, yet it is bad for the agricultural class. On the contrary, I maintain that there is no class more vitally interested in the maintenance of the present system than the agricultural class. There are none so absolutely dependent upon a near market as the farmers. One large class of soil products will not bear long transportation by reason of perishableness, and the absence of a market near at hand is equivalent to an inhibition of their production. Another large class of farm products are too bulky in proportion to value to bear long transportation. This is true of corn, potatoes, and almost all root crops. In fact, there is no farm crop but that if it be required to transport it from the Mississippi Valley to Europe the transportation will eat up so much of its value as to leave little margin for the producer.

What the farmer needs above all things is a home market and cheap transportation. What the farmer of the West needs is not to send his crop across a continent and an ocean to find a market in Birmingham and Manchester and Sheffield, but rather by the maintenance of the American system to build up a Birmingham, a Manchester, and a Sheffield in the valley of the Mississippi. [Applause.] What the manufacturer wants is a domestic market for his wares, and what both farmer and manufacturer require is a national system of diversified and balanced industries that shall make us wholly independent of foreign domination. Already we consume 91 per cent. of our food products. The foreign market is growing yearly more uncertain. Already our farmers begin to feel the pressure of the competition of the wheat of India and Russia. Every year this competition will increase. The vast and rich wheat-fields of British North America lie just upon our northern border. It will be no surprise to me if within ten years the American farmer is demanding more protection for his wheat, just as he is now demanding more protection for his wool. Once the American wool-grower supposed that he was secure of his home market. But the cheap wools of Australia and South America are crowding him to the wall, and ten years will not go over his head when he will find Indian wheat, grown by labor that costs 10 cents a day, crowding him out, just as Australian and Brazilian wool is already crowding him.

Up to this date we have shipped about 40,000,000 bushels less of last year's wheat surplus than we had anticipated and were able to spare. Looking around for an explanation of this disappointment, it is found that India has increased her exports of wheat from 2,000,000 bushels in 1879, 4,000,000 in 1880, and 12,000,000 in 1881, to 36,000,000 in 1883. This leap is so sudden and so extraordinary that it is important to inquire what it means. Is it a mere spurt of extraordinary yield, or is it due to causes more normal and permanent? The following facts may throw some light on this question:

According to the consular reports to the State Department, India has now a wheat area of about 20,000,000 acres; of which 7,000,000 acres are in the Punjab, 6,500,000 in the northwestern provinces and Oudh, 3,000,000 in the central, 1,500,000 in Bombay, 1,000,000 in Bengal, and the remainder scattered. The usual crop is about 240,000,000 bushels, or 12 bushels per acre; but, with improved cultivation and irrigation, this product is susceptible of being doubled over a large portion of the area. The rate of yield depends chiefly upon irrigation; and that the local and general governments are doing their utmost to extend, with the result of a yearly increase in the yield. One new canal has just been completed in the Punjab 502 miles in length, which will irrigate 780,000 acres of wheat land through 2,500 miles of minor channels. Beyond the now cultivated wheat area, there are 56,000,000 acres of virgin land, at present jungle but mostly available for successful wheat-growing, the clearing of which it is the special object of the India Government to encourage. United States Consul-General Mattson, of Calcutta, says:

"In order to facilitate the development of the wheat resources and to assist the export trade, the Government of India is pursuing a policy of encouragement which has already resulted in better facilities of transit to the seaboard by the construction of new railways and in the reduction of freight; it has removed tares, export and octroi duty; it is diffusing knowledge and instruction in the cultivation of wheat and improvement of the soil; constructing canals for irrigation and transportation; and in many other ways giving moral and material aid to this great cause, in the hope that India may ultimately become the granary of Great Britain."

Trunk lines of railroad are in operation through all the wheat-producing provinces, to which tributary branches are constantly being attached. The Indus Valley road has lately been completed, which brings the Punjab, the principal wheat province, into direct communication with the port of Kurrachee.

The foregoing facts appear to indicate that the sudden increase in the India supply is largely due to the official encouragement given to wheat production in that country. This policy of encouragement is but in its beginnings; and when it is considered that the actual wheat area is 20,000,000 acres, and the possible area 56,000,000 more, or a total of 76,000,000 acres, which is about double the present wheat acreage of the United States, and when it is further considered that the present rate of yield (12 bushels per acre) is about the same as that of the United States, and that it is the policy of the India Government to largely increase it by promoting improved methods of cultivation, it becomes evident enough that the possibilities and even the probabilities of a very large increase of wheat supply from India are serious enough to cause our farmers to ponder gravely on the limits of their market.

The progress of the trade has been truly astonishing. The figures are as follows:

Year.	Cwts.	Bushels.
Amount of Indian wheat exported in—
1873	394,010	735,485⅓
1878	6,373,168	11,896,580⅘
1879	1,056,720	1,972,544
1880	2,201,515	4,109,494⅔
1881	7,444,375	13,896,166⅔
1882	19,901,005	37,148,542⅔
1883 (six months)	15,714,982	29,334,633⅓

This all goes to Europe.

The old maxim is that "it is right to be taught by our enemies." England is in a sense our industrial enemy. What does she want? England wants absolute control of our markets for her manufactures, and the cheapest possible food supplies for her operatives. That is precisely what we do not want. For every cargo of English manufactures imported into this country an amount of American labor equal to that embodied in such manufactures, is forced out of manufacturing, and must support itself in some other way. Whither shall these laborers turn? Not to the mines, for with the iron and coal trade murdered with the knife of "free raw materials" the mines will be closed, or only partially worked. Not to the field of commerce, for under this system the carrying trade will pass more absolutely than ever into the hands of our competitors. Where then shall they go but to agriculture. The millions who are now consumers cease as between these classes to be consumers and become producers. There are just so many less mouths, outside the agricultural class, to feed, and just so many more hands to feed them, and the destruction of the American manufacturers will not increase the food market of Europe. What is the consequence? Overproduction of food supplies and consequent depreciation, destruction of home markets, long transportation both of food and manufactures, waste of force in reaching distant markets, reduction in wages and savings, a diminished capacity for consumption, a general lowering of civilization all along the line.

This is not mere theory, it is more—it is experience; it is history. There never has been a free-trade epoch or, what is the same thing, a "tariff for revenue only" epoch in this country that has not been an epoch of low wages, disordered industries, financial distress, and commercial disaster. On the other hand, every period of a protective policy has been a period of diversified and stimulated industries, of large demand for labor, higher wages, larger comforts, greater content, and greater social order.

I would that I could here reproduce the splendid picture of industrial progress and national prosperity which was held up before us the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY]. The figures are startling and almost incredible. But it is not needful to repeat them here. Never has the world seen so grand a march.

With an increase of population from 31,000,000 to 50,000,000 between 1860 and 1880, covering the period of a terrible and destructive war, the increase in wealth and material development has outrun the increase of population. The total wealth of the United States was, in round numbers, in 1860, $16,000,000,000. In 1870 it had increased to $30,000,000,000; in 1880 it amounted to $42,000,000,000. In other words, the increase and accumulation of wealth in the twenty years from 1860 to 1880 was greater by more than two and one-half times than the entire accumulation from the time when Columbus discovered America until 1860. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken of two distinct, opposite, and antagonistic systems. But the bill before us is neither the one nor the other. It is neither flesh, fish, nor fowl. It is neither protection, free trade, nor "tariff for revenue only." It is a protective tariff, with a free-trade slash 20 per cent. wide directly through its vitals. It is inconsistent, unscientific, inexcusable. "A monster, horrid, shapeless, huge, and blind."

Mr. Chairman, the voice of experience and of that "history which is philosophy teaching by example" admonish us not to surrender the advantages of a proved success for the ignis fatuus of an untried theory. Revenue we must have, and we must have a "tariff for revenue." Protection we need and must have until the increase of our population and the development of our continent shall produce an equilibrium of markets and of wages with the nations of the Old World, which will not be in our day and generation. What we want is not a "tariff for revenue only," nor yet a tariff for protection only, but a tariff for revenue and protection, one and inseparable. [Applause.]

In closing these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I beg to reiterate the words used by me before the Committee of Ways and Means:

I hold this true; that labor and brains lie at the very foundations of society.

The greatest and most sacred duty of the statesman of this day and land is to protect, improve, elevate, and cultivate that great mass of humanity which is, ever has been, and ever will be embraced in the working or laboring class.

That man is a traitor to the best interests of his nation and his race who ignores this fact or is recreant to the duties which it imposes upon him.

The future weal or woe of this great Republic and of free institutions depends upon the future of the working class.

We can pursue a policy which will put them under the grinding heel of poverty, where they are kept in the overpopulated free-trade countries of the Old World, or by shaping our economic system in their interests we can surround them with the comforts of American homes, clothe them with comfortable and comely clothing, feed them with sufficient and wholesome food, house them under roofs of their own earning, and send their children with "shining morning faces" to well-taught schools, where they can be cultured for intelligent, orderly, and patriotic American citizens.

One way lie low wages, discontent, communism, and anarchy. The other way lie good wages, contentment, loyalty to law and order and country, and a strong and enduring commonwealth.

It is only because I believe that protection is in the interest of this great foundation-class of society, that it gives them more work, better wages, better homes, better schools, better life, better death, and a better hope of an endless life beyond, that I am a protectionist; and when I am satisfied that such is not the case I shall cease to be a protectionist.

A national policy can not be a matter of patch-work and pieces—a little free trade here and a little protection there—a little higher tariff for wool and a little lower tariff for salt, and none at all for lumber.

A national system must be consistent with itself and with all its parts. We must determine whether upon the whole a tariff, with diversified interests and industries, home markets, short transportation, and good wages, is better than few industries, foreign markets, long transportation, competition with a world full of pauper labor, low prices, and consequent starvation wages; and then we want to make our system uniform, symmetrical, national.

For almost a round quarter of a century we have tried this experiment of protection. It has given us an age of wonderful development and growth. Within that time an empire has sprung from a wilderness; new States have taken their places in the constellation; wealth has grown among all classes in unprecedented ratio.

Emigrants have swarmed to our shores by millions to reap the rich reward of higher wages, better homes, and a superior civilization. Shall we reverse all this history, dash all this prosperity, and darken the future by reversing our national policy?

Do you hope to put a theory in the place of tested and proved success?

I warn you, gentlemen, that it is a dangerous experiment; dangerous to our industrial system, and dangerous to the party that undertakes it.

That way lies neither political glory nor gain.

Instead of the scheme of free competition with the half-paid labor of other lands, I suggest a better platform, and it is this:

American work for American workers.
American wages for American workingmen.
American markets for American farmers.
American homes for American citizens, native or naturalized.
American schools for American boys.
And America, our trust, against the world forever.

Corn has been depressed in price on account of the tremendous increase of production. While the price of corn is comparatively lower than that of any agricultural product, still the farmer can produce it relatively cheaper, as all know who know anything about it, and he can land it cheaper at tide-water market.

But let me proceed with the table: Under free trade the farmer could buy with one bushel of wheat .91 of a sack of Liverpool salt; under protection it would buy 1.8 sacks. Under free trade the bushel of wheat would buy 8.51 yards of bleached sheeting; under protection 11.04 yards. Under free trade it would buy 422 pounds of coal; and under protection, 719 pounds. Under free trade it would buy 12.21 yards of prints; under protection, 16.27 yards. Under free trade it would buy 107.3 pounds of pig-iron; under protection, 134 pounds. Under free trade, 35.8 pounds of bar-iron; and under protection 57.35. Under free trade it would buy 47.23 pounds of railroad iron; under protection 72.6 pounds.

Mr. DORSHEIMER obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRISON. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] yields, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I yield for that purpose.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 66) providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 336) releasing the estate of the late Frank Soulé, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of the State of California, and his sureties on his official bond;

A bill (S. 869) to vacate an alley in square 234 in the city of Washington;

A bill (S. 1072) for the relief of Samuel B. Seat, administrator of Christian Kropp, deceased;

A bill (S. 1251) to authorize the purchase of a wharf for the use of the Government in Wilmington, North Carolina;

A bill (S. 1553) to remove the charge of desertion against David Wood; and Joint resolution (S. R. 82) in relation to the ceremonies to be authorized upon the completion of the Washington Monument.

ELECTION CONTEST—O'FERRALL VS. PAUL.

Mr. LOWRY, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the contested-election case of Charles T. O'Ferrall vs. John Paul, from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia.

The resolutions appended to the report are as follows:

Resolved, That John Paul was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia, and was not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Charles T. O'Ferrall was duly elected as a Representative from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-eighth Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

The SPEAKER. This report will be laid over and ordered to be printed.

CHEAPER TELEGRAPHIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill at this time from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to submit the report in writing hereafter.

There being no objection, leave was granted; and

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. 6864) to secure cheaper telegraphic correspondence; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6865) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public in the district of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LABORERS FOR CLERK'S DOCUMENT-ROOM.

Mr. SPRINGER. At the request of the Clerk of the House, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

There being no objection, the following resolution, which was read, was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Clerk of the House be empowered, and is hereby authorized, to employ two laborers in the Clerk's document-room to arrange, sack, and ship the "reserve-call" bound documents belonging to members; the said laborers to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, under the supervision of the Committee on Accounts.

MATERIALS FOR HOUSE FOLDING-ROOMS.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend, out of the contingent fund of the House, a sum not exceeding $1,500 for the purchase of folding materials for use in the folding-rooms of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. In explanation of the resolution I desire to say that the fund for the purchase of envelopes and wrapping material needed in the folding department of the House is entirely exhausted; and the adoption of this resolution is necessary in order that speeches recently made may be promptly sent out.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LUCY LE G. JEFFERS.

Mr. STRUBLE, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Pensions with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2198) granting a pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers, widow of the late Commodore William N. Jeffers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HISTORY OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the document I send to the desk, has directed me to report it back with a request that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which committee it properly belongs.

There being no objection, the Committee on the Library was discharged from the further consideration of Executive Document No. 124, a letter of the Secretary of State recommending the purchase by the Government of the Chronological History of the Department of State and the Foreign Relations of the Government from September 5, 1774, to the Present Time, by John H. Haswell, for the use of the heads of Departments, officers in the foreign service, and committees of Congress; and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MECKLENBURG CELEBRATION.

On motion of Mr. COX, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the words "or as many as can be conveniently spared;" so it will read: "Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Charlotte, N. C., two hundred United States flags, or as many as can be conveniently spared, to be used in decorating said city at the approaching celebration of the one hundred and ninth anniversary of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence of May 20, 1775: Provided, That satisfactory security be given for the safe return of said flags, and that the Government be at no expense for transportation."

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I move the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from General W. S. Hancock, asking the immediate appropriation of $25,093.75 to supply deficiency in appropriation for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THREE FORKS, KENTUCKY RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers relative to the application of the appropriation in the river and harbor act of 1882 for the erection of a lock and dam at Three Forks of the Kentucky River, and recommending the purchase by the United States of the land required for its site; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PENSIONS.

Mr. MATSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, as a substitute for H. R. 1189, a bill (H. R. 6866) providing pensions for certain disabled soldiers and certain widows of soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MATSON. I move the minority have leave to print their views.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] will preside at the evening session as Speaker pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the previous order of the House the Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. MATSON in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HALSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT].

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Chairman, I propose to state generally my views with regard to tariff legislation and my reasons for opposing the passage of this bill. I speak for a constituency which is deeply interested in the action of Congress upon this subject. Not only are millions upon millions of capital, which has been accumulated by thrift, sagacity, and prudence, invested in the manufacturing establishments located in that part of the country which I represent, not only are thousands upon thousands of intelligent men daily employed in the prosecution of its diversified and magnificent industries, but the great body of our citizens who are engaged in other employments, and who in their respective lines of duty, enterprise, and labor are advancing the greatness and prosperity of the Republic, are earnestly concerned that the action taken by Congress with reference to the bill now under discussion shall be most carefully considered, judicious, and conducive to the welfare of the entire country.

Nor do I speak only for my own district, because the questions involved in our legislation upon this matter extend far beyond localities and sections. They can not be restrained entirely within the limits of party lines and party ties. They lay hold with searching grasp upon the prosperity of an entire nation. They affect not only the men of capital and their employés, without whose skillful hands and intelligent co-operation capital would be powerless, but they advance or impair the welfare of all classes who purchase and consume the products of agricultural and mechanical pursuits, of manufacturing skill, and creative genius. In other words, no man is excepted from their operations and results. From busy New England with its wheels and looms, from the great central States, from the fertile valley of the Mississippi, from the cotton-fields of the South, from the magnificent Northwest and over the Rocky Mountains, from all along the Pacific slope, go up the sounds of a great nation's industries, which, though diversified and numerous, are yet interdependent and combined.

Legislation which would enrich one class and impoverish the other would be pernicious; legislation which would degrade labor, compel it to yield place to idleness or give its services for starvation wages; which would imperil capital now invested in important enterprises at the invitation of the Government under existing laws; which would discriminate against our own citizens, and by preventing competition with manufacturers abroad would force them to pay such prices for all goods as foreign traders might demand, would be manifestly detrimental and destructive; but that legislation which would preserve and maintain in just and fair proportion the rights and interests of every class, which would build up our internal strength, develop our boundless resources, encourage industries at home, and while protecting the producer would guard the consumer with equal care, would be equitable, conservative, and just.

The bill reported from the committee by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, and which he has advocated with his accustomed ability and skill, embodies the objectionable features I have just enumerated. If enacted into law it will, in my deliberate judgment, still further unsettle values and introduce additional uncertainty and distrust into all manufacturing and other business undertakings. At a time when trade is languishing and values are declining, when it should be the aim of legislation to impart stability and confidence to every branch of mercantile and manufacturing affairs, this vexatious question, uncalled-for and unwelcome, is forced by the leaders of the dominant faction of the Democratic party upon the minds of the business public.

The mere declaration of the Democratic intention again to change the tariff laws, which it had been supposed were settled and established for at least a reasonable period by recent legislative action, based upon the report and recommendation of a commission chosen expressly for that purpose, startled and alarmed the public mind. Proclamation was made before the opening of the present session that the old Democratic purposes were to be renewed. The tariff was to be attacked. The incongruous Democratic majority which, to its own astonishment, had been swept into this body by the tidal wave as it rolled across the land was to be marshaled in solid column, if it could be accomplished, and move forward to lower or tear down the barriers against free trade and unlimited foreign importations which the wise and prudent action of previous Congresses had erected.

A tariff designed to protect American industries and to aid in the development of the immense internal resources of the country was declared to be opposed to the best interests of the people and in contravention of the principles of the Constitution. Influential Democratic papers and prominent Democratic leaders, ignoring all the facts of history, strenuously advocated the idea that the only ground on which any tariff could be justified was to furnish a revenue for the Government; and that protection to American labor and American capital, if it could not be avoided, should be merely incidental to the main purpose of raising money by import duties for the public expenditures.

Free trade, or, in other words, the absolutely unlimited and unrestrained importation of goods from abroad, manufactured by the underpaid labor of an overflowing foreign population, which should be permitted to compete with and make war upon the unaided labor and capital of our own citizens, was asserted to be the true principle on which our public policy should be established and was declared to be the ultimate purpose to be attained by the Democratic party. The advocates of these doctrines were compelled, however, to admit that the public necessities for the time being required the maintenance of a tariff, but for revenue only. But "free trade" and "a tariff for revenue only" are practically synonymous terms, and the arguments sustaining each and their effects upon the general prosperity of the country, differing only in degree, are substantially the same. Thus the Democratic party again unfolded its ancient banners and placed itself squarely upon its ancient battle-ground of principles which are opposed to the industries, the labor, and the welfare of the Republic. These declarations, reiterated and reaffirmed in many forms, increased the alarm of the country, which was already suffering from declining values caused by the tariff agitation and discussion of the preceding year. The storm signals were again set. Sails were again shortened. Manufacturing enterprises were contracted. Capital, always sensitive and timid at the first manifestation of disturbance, shrank into its shelter. Wages were reduced, workmen were discharged, and honest labor was still further denied the opportunity of employment.

The bill now before us is the immediate result of the Democratic policy as thus declared, and we are informed by the distinguished chairman of the committee that even this may not be all which is required; that it is but a step forward, and only a promise of what he considers a more complete tariff reform. Although the revision of the tariff made by the last Congress reduced the duty upon imports "in some cases below the point of necessity or wisdom," and in other cases to "the lowest limit compatible with safety," yet the present measure is designed to make a still further average reduction of 20 per cent., and is, as we have been told, but an advance toward carrying out the Democratic policy of eventual free trade and consequent hostility to home industry and American labor. The reasons for recommending its passage, as contained in the report of the committee, and as urged upon this floor by those who have spoken for the bill, are set forth generally in the claims that it will partially relieve the people from unnecessary taxes, that it will be a measure of justice to consumers, and will conduce to the general prosperity. I take issue with these gentlemen on the grounds thus presented. Gladly would I urge the passage of any bill which would produce such beneficial results. Wherever I can safely reduce duties, if I can thereby lessen prices to consumers, wherever I can advance the general prosperity, there my voice, my vote, and my best efforts will be most heartily given.

But I regard this measure as fraught with danger and directly opposed to every interest, whether manufacturing, laboring, financial, or agricultural. If it were a question merely of details and specific items between the friends and opponents of this measure, doubtless a substantial agreement could be reached. Imperfections and inconsistencies in the present law unquestionably exist. These, however, are questions of detail and not of principle. A distinguished manufacturer of my own State, a gentleman of culture and comprehensive views, has admirably expressed the moderate sentiment of the country upon this question in saying, "Some judicious reductions and modifications of the present tariff with a view to the proper protection and preservation of capital already invested, to future growth in industrial enterprises, and to furnishing remunerative employment for the greatest number of persons could be fairly made."

I entirely agree with him in his views; but this bill proposes a blind, injudicious, and indiscriminate horizontal reduction. If it becomes a law we may expect another long-continued period of depression in every department of business, with consequent suffering and distress among all those who are compelled to depend upon wages for their daily bread. Duties upon imports are not, in any sense, a tax upon our people from which a lower tariff would relieve them. The direct reverse is true. The greatest portion of the revenue the Government derives from imposts is paid by foreign manufacturers, and to that extent is a tax indirectly levied upon foreign nations, which relieves our people of what otherwise they would be compelled to pay. The word "tax" in this connection is a misnomer cunningly devised. Lower the tariff and you make taxation probable; abolish the tariff and you make it a necessity. Enact the present measure and you will be compelled to call for additional internal or direct taxes from the people.

But the claim is made that this bill will reduce duties which have become unnecessary. Is this the fact? In one form or another we must meet the requirements of the Government. It would be cowardly and suicidal to endeavor to avoid it. How do gentlemen know that the present tariff will be too productive for that purpose? The returns for the nine past months of the present fiscal year show a decrease of $20,505,253 in receipts from the internal revenue. The revenues will be still further depleted by the changes made in the tariff at the last session of Congress. As thus lowered the tariff has been in existence for about ten months. Before one single year has swept by us in its circling course; before the ink is fairly dry upon the statute-book; before the full returns of revenue have been made known, they call upon us to make changes in the law in order to reduce what they describe as "unnecessary" taxation.

Will gentlemen upon the other side seriously claim that a reasonable period has elapsed, or that a fair trial has been given to the tariff in its present form, so that it is possible as yet to tell what permanent revenue it will bring forth? Can any man form a reliable estimate of the results of its operation as a revenue measure? Will it be claimed that the country has had time or opportunity to adapt itself to the provisions of the present law, or that the rate of importations for the past ten months will be the rate for coming years? Do not the vicissitudes of trade and the general condition of the country produce the widest fluctuations in the revenue? Is it not true that the returns for a single year are an unstable and unsafe basis on which to estimate with accuracy the permanent workings of a law affecting such vast and complicated interests and dependent upon so many elements for a true comprehension of its results? Is it a prudent method of legislation to pass laws of such infinite importance upon mere guesswork? Is it just to endanger the business interests of the entire country while groping in the dark as to the facts and figures which should control our legislation? Is it right that the wild frenzy and impatience of the Democratic party to create some issue which it vainly hopes may restore it to power and the possession of the Government should be allowed to imperil every interest for its own selfish purposes?

Such action would be reckless and deserving of the severest censure. No man to-day can say with even a reasonable approach to certainty whether the revenues to be realized from the present tariff will be beyond our most limited requirements. I would not gather into the Treasury a single dollar beyond the necessities of carrying on the Government in an economical manner, of providing for the public debt, the interest thereon, and the pensions and other disbursments rendered necessary by the history of the past twenty-four years. If the streams of revenue gush forth so copiously that waste and extravagance result from their overflowing accumulation, let us apply the proper remedy. Let us turn to the internal taxes which the people pay and make some reduction in them before we weaken or destroy the barriers which protect our labor and our industries against the surging tide of foreign importations, which if unrestrained would sweep upon them as a flood of disaster.

Bear in mind that the war taxes by hundreds of millions yearly have been already wiped out by the Republican party; that promptly on the ending of hostilities our immense armies were disbanded, our expenditures were cut down, and whenever prudence and safety justified the step, the taxes which came directly from our people were rapidly reduced. That party may still be trusted to guard the public welfare; and until we become certainly assured that under the present tariff our income will be properly adjusted to our needs, it would be unwise to legislate in such a manner as rashly to deplete our revenues and justly to alarm the holders of the national obligations. The credit of the country now stands untarnished. Its finances have been rescued from incompetent control, and guarded by the wise statesmanship of the Republican party for nearly a quarter of a century, its debt has become a sacred obligation. Its bonds are sought for at a premium. The payment of every dollar is based upon the highest faith.

The world believes that a nation which did not hesitate to give its choicest blood for the preservation of its flag will not hesitate to assess itself sufficiently to meet its obligations with promptitude and honor. But the national credit is dependent upon the national laws providing for national revenues, and past experience shows that our credit rises or falls in uniform accordance with those laws. The first bill introduced into the Congress of 1789 was a tariff bill. In 1790, and down to 1812, frequent revisions were thought expedient, and each revision was in the direction of higher tariff rates and increased revenues. The country prospered and its credit grew.

The war tariff of 1812 expired by its own terms in February, 1816. Then came the tariffs of that year, of 1824, and 1828. They were protective tariffs. Under their provisions the revenues were ample, and in 1834 the last dollar of the public debt was paid and the young Republic which had inherited from the old Confederation $76,000,000 of indebtedness and had passed through two exhausting wars, stood alone among the nations of the world as a country without the burden of a public debt. Protective tariffs had paid its obligations, established and strengthened its credit, and shed upon its people the glad sunlight of universal prosperity. But the laws were changed. Ample revenues from customs, although paid to a great extent by foreign manufacturers, were declared then, as now, to be "unnecessary taxes upon the people."

Seven years of a tariff for revenue only; seven years of such a tariff reduced as is now proposed deprived the country of its revenues and dragged its dishonored credit to the dust. In 1835 there was no public debt. There was a surplus in the Treasury, which, by act of 1836, was distributed among the States. Still, then as now, the politicians yearned o gain a reputation for economy, even at the sacrifice of safety. The compromise tariff of 1833 was passed, under the provisions of which a decreasing, sliding scale of duties was created. The inevitable results followed, and in June, 1841, it became necessary for Congress to assemble in extra session to provide a remedy for the existing suffering. The message of the President to that body set forth an estimated Treasury deficiency at the end of that year of about eleven and a half millions of dollars. From 1837 to 1841 the expenditures exceeded the revenues by more than thirty-one millions, and in order to meet the deficiency it became necessary for the Government to attempt to borrow money to pay its ordinary expenses in a time of profound peace.

Congress in 1841 and 1842 authorized loans and notes to the amount of $15,000,000, but the "tariff for revenue only" was still in force, and under its operation the credit of the country had sunk so low that it was found impossible to negotiate $6,000,000 of the obligations of a nation which but a few years before had been without a single dollar of public debt. Efforts to borrow money were made in the markets of this country, and being unsuccessful here were renewed abroad. An agent duly accredited by the Government entered the financial centers of England and the continent, empowered to negotiate a loan of $5,000,000 or any part thereof, but was compelled to return disappointed and disheartened. In December, 1842, this failure was reported to Congress by President Tyler in a special message, in the course of which he was compelled to say?

> Thus the mortifying spectacle has been presented of the inability of this Government to obtain a loan so small as not in the whole to amount to more than one-fourth of its annual income, at a time when the governments of Europe, although involved in debt and with their subjects heavily burdened with taxation, readily obtained loans of any amount at a greatly reduced rate of interest.

The "tariff for revenue only" had accomplished what all tariffs for revenue only must accomplish. It had ruined the credit of the nation. And so it came to pass that in 1842 a high protective tariff was enacted as a necessary measure of relief. The effect was magical. Streams of revenue flowed into the Treasury, and the veins of the national credit were filled with exultant life and vigor.

But the free-traders and revenue-tariff men again gathered themselves together against what they asserted to be "unnecessary taxation." The laws were again radically changed. The principle of protection was eliminated from our statute-books by the tariff which took effect in 1847, and the inevitable result again followed as surely as darkness follows the setting of the sun. Again the revenues were lessened to a point beneath the necessary requirements; again the national credit was brought low; and although the gold fields of the Pacific slope during the next ten years yielded up their treasures, exceeding a billion of dollars in amount, yet this vast sum, added to the other resources of the country, was insufficient to inspire confidence in men of capital that the Republic would pay its debts. Its loans were negotiated with difficulty. The enormous sum of 12 per cent. was paid in 1860 as interest on the paper of the Government; and in 1861 the Secretary of the Treasury felt compelled to make the astounding suggestion to an American Congress that the States should be requested to pledge as security for a national loan the deposits received by them under the distribution of the surplus in 1836. A "tariff for revenue only" had failed to produce revenue. The authors of a system which pretended to reduce "unnecessary taxes" had imposed a burden of dishonor and disgrace upon the people. The credit of the country had been made a thing of utter derision and contempt.

The war of the rebellion followed. The land was divided into hostile camps and trembled beneath the movements of contending armies. Every energy and every resource of the Republic was subjected to the most unsparing ordeal. The strain was exhaustive and unceasing. The Republican party which had come into the exercise of power to find dismantled fortresses, a dismembered country, an empty Treasury, and a ruined credit, trusting in God and the patriotism of the people, undertook the duty imposed upon it of preserving the life and honor of the Union. Day by day during many months of civil war it was obliged to expend sums which had been sufficient to carry on the Government for years; but notwithstanding this enormous drain, in the face of discouragement, disaster, and difficulty almost insurmountable, it met faithfully the demands necessitated by the appalling situation. Among its first efforts to this end it passed the tariff act of March 2, 1861, and laid the foundation of a true protective policy which, supplemented by successive acts during the next three years, not only enabled the nation to exercise the sacred right of self-preservation but to enter upon a career of unexampled prosperity. I call upon you to bear witness to the effect of this policy upon the credit of the nation. It has stood like a rock against the surges of the ocean; it has aided to secure revenues adequate to the fearful demands upon the Treasury caused by the necessities of a gigantic war; and although billions of dollars were swept into that terrific whirlpool of destruction and a public debt of billions more was necessarily created, it has steadily reduced that debt; it is reducing it every hour, and, although our bonds draw interest at an average annual rate of less than 4 per cent., it has made the promises of the Government better than gold.

If any lesson can be drawn from the history of the past, this truth is certain: Protective tariffs secure the revenues and credit of the nation; revenue tariffs destroy its revenue and credit. We know that we have a public debt of hundreds of millions which must be paid; we know that our annual interest charge is tens of millions; we know that the annual disbursements for pensions to our disabled soldiers and their dependent families and for the ordinary requirements of the Government are tens of millions more; we know that our revenues will be reduced by the abatements made at the last session in the tariff, but we do not know to what extent. We do not know the amounts we can rely upon as the public income under the operation of that law as now existing, and with these certainties as to our requirements and uncertainties as to our resources, remembering the depressing effects of low tariffs upon our public income and credit, remembering that the Republican party has already reduced the war taxes annually by hundreds of millions, and remembering also that the great burden of our tariff revenue is borne abroad and not levied upon our own people, we should violate our duty and be guilty of moral cowardice as guardians of the public welfare, if we permitted ourselves to be stampeded by this wild Democratic onslaught and unduly reduced revenues and incomes which were in ordinary prudence necessary and proper for the public requirements.

I come now to the claim presented in support of this bill: that its passage would be a measure of justice to consumers. Clearly it can not operate as such, unless, as an effect of its provisions, they would be enabled to purchase goods at lower rates than if it were not enacted. The real question, then, presented for discussion at this point is this: Do protective tariffs increase prices to consumers? The supporters of this bill say that they do, and this is the substance of the entire controversy. This is the keystone of the revenue-tariff and free-trade arch. This claim, stated in its various ingenious and deceitful forms and sowed broadcast like seed upon plowed ground, takes hold upon the superficial consideration of men and generates a harvest of error and delusion. To my mind these doctrines are most unfounded and mischievous in their results. The claim is made that for every dollar which is paid into the Treasury from imposts the manufacturers receive from four to six times that sum as a tribute paid by consumers to monopoly. The sophistry which underlies these arguments is this: The free-trader assumes not only that the tariff duty which is imposed upon imported goods is added to their price and paid by the consumer, but that it is also added to the price of the great supplies of similar articles of home manufacture, and that the purchaser pays such added cost thereon. I say emphatically such statements are errors. Reverse them and they are true. I formulate my views upon this point in these three propositions:

First. By far the greater part of the duties imposed upon imported goods are paid by the manufacturers under the necessary concessions they make to consumers in this country, and therefore do not increase the cost of such imported goods.

Second. They do not add to the price of similar articles manufactured in this country. According to the census returns, our home manufacturers produced in 1880 $5,369,579,191 of these goods. We exported during the last fiscal year $111,890,001, thus leaving for consumption in our own markets $5,257,689,190. Last year our imports of manufactured goods of the same kinds were about $300,000,000. The figures fluctuate, it is true, in different years, but generally in favor of a relative increase in native commodities; and at the present time they fairly represent the proportions between the home and foreign productions competing in our markets.

Third. Our home manufacturers, who produce, as above shown, 94 per cent. of the entire substance of the consumption of the country, regulate and control the prices for the same. Supply and demand always establish values. The greater quantities govern the rate of disposition of the smaller; and it would be the wildest flight of fiction to assert that the 6 per cent. of foreign goods seeking a sale in our markets in opposition to nearly sixteen times their bulk of native goods of equal merit, also pressing for purchasers, could compel the prices of the latter to conform to their own standard. Consumers would take the cheaper, of which there would be a comparatively unlimited supply. The competition which necessarily exists among home manufacturers with great stocks to dispose of cheapens their prices, and the foreign manufacturer must sell in our markets, if he would sell here at all, at the cheapened prices established by our domestic producers. Without a protective tariff there could be but very little if any home production; without home production the foreign manufacturer could place his goods upon our markets and extort such prices as he saw fit to demand. A protective tariff, therefore, which by home production creates home competition, thereby reduces prices for all consumers to a point lower than would otherwise be established.

These propositions are not simply assumptions without proof. They are sustained by reason, by the recorded testimony of distinguished Americans familiar with the subject, by the admissions of foreign manufacturers, and by the history of prices in this country.

I read an extract bearing on this point from the celebrated report on manufactures made in 1791 by Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury. As an authority on this question his opinion, expressed after careful study and research, is entitled to sober consideration. He says:

> Though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded cheaper, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away with everything like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience.

I call your attention to a speech of Henry Clay, delivered in the United States Senate February 2, 3, and 6, 1832, in the course of which he said:

> And is the fact not indisputable that all essential objects of consumption affected by the tariff are cheaper and better since the act of 1824 than they were for several years prior to that law? I appeal for its truth to common observation and to all practical men. I appeal to the farmer of the country whether he does not purchase on better terms his iron, salt, brown sugar, cotton goods, and woolens for his laboring people? And I ask the cotton-planter if he has not been better and more cheaply supplied with his cotton-bagging?
> I plant myself upon this fact of cheapness and superiority as upon impregnable ground. Gentlemen may tax their ingenuity and produce a thousand speculative solutions of the fact, but the fact itself will remain undisturbed. Let us look into some particulars. The total consumption of bar-iron in the United States is supposed to be about 146,000 tons, of which 112,866 tons are made within the country and the residue imported. The number of men employed in the manufacture is estimated at 29,254, and the total number of persons subsisted by it at 146,273. The measure of protection extended to this necessary article was never adequate until the passage of the act of 1828; and what has been the consequence? The annual increase of quantity since that period has been in the ratio of near 25 per cent., and the wholesale price of bar-iron in the Northern cities was, in 1828, $105 per ton; in 1829, $100; in 1830, $90; and in 1831, from $85 to $75; constantly diminishing.
> The protection given to flannels in 1828 was fully adequate. It has enabled the American manufacturer to obtain complete possession of the American market; and now let us look at the effect. I have before me a statement from a highly respectable mercantile house showing the price of four descriptions of flannel during six years. The average price of them in 1826 was 38½ cents; in 1827, 38; in 1828 (the year of the tariff), 46; in 1829, 36; in 1830 (notwithstanding the advance in the price of wool), 32, and in 1831, 32½. The facts require no comment.
> Brown sugar, during ten years, from 1792 to 1802, with a duty of 1½ cents per pound, averaged 14 cents per pound. The same article, during ten years, from 1820 to 1830, with a duty of 3 cents, has averaged only 8 cents per pound. Nails, with a duty of 5 cents per pound, are selling at 6 cents. Window-glass 8 by 10 prior to the tariff of 1824 sold at twelve or thirteen dollars per hundred feet; it now sells for $3.75.

Senator John Holmes, of Maine, delivered a speech in the United States Senate in 1832, from which I quote:

> If any one rule more than another is to be relied on it is this, that as soon as protection begins to operate, and in proportion to its operation, the tax is reflected back from the consumer to the producer. Thus, while the duty has been constantly increasing, the price of the article taxed has been constantly diminishing. The reason is as manifest as the fact is true, the domestic article has been increasing in quantity. Suppose the foreign manufacturer furnished three-fourths of your consumption; the greater quantity would command the price and this tax would fall on the consumer. But let the domestic product increase one-half, the competition between foreign and domestic producers will be more equalized and the tax will be divided between the producer and the consumer. Let the domestic product be three-fourths, and your own producers govern the market and the foreign producer bears the tax or nearly so. Again, take the article of nails, the duty 5 cents per pound and the nails, duty and all, but 5½ cents, when the raw material of which they are made is 4½ cents. Cheese, duty 9 cents per pound, and the best cheese may be had for 8 cents.

I read also an extract from a speech of Senator George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, in the United States Senate, February 27, 1832:

The effect of our [protective] policy on this essential metal [iron] has been strikingly evinced, first, in augmenting the number of its factories and its quantity; secondly, in reducing the prices of its manufactures. * * * The reduction of the prices was a necessary consequence of the domestic competition created and excited by the policy.

Nehemiah R. Knight, Senator from Rhode Island, said in a speech in the United States Senate in 1832, on Mr. Clay's resolution respecting the tariff:

With all the rhetoric and arithmetic of honorable gentlemen, they will be much troubled to make a plain man understand that when he purchases a yard of cotton cloth for 7 cents he pays a tax of 8 cents into the Treasury of the Union, or a like sum in the form of bounty to the manufacturer. You may show it by figures and prove it by argument; but, sir, he still will doubt and he will be apt to believe it is only a vision of those who assert it.

Hon. John M. Berrien, United States Senator from Georgia, in 1843, in delineating the effect of the protective tariff of 1842, used the following language:

The credit of the Government was prostrate, and has been redeemed. Its stock is again above par. 2. The Treasury was empty; it is now replenished. 3. The commerce and navigation of the country have increased. 4. Its agricultural condition has improved. 5. There has been marked improvement of our great staple (cotton). 6. A reduction in the prices of almost all, if not absolutely of every article of consumption. The tariff of 1842 has been in efficient operation but little more than a year, and these effects have followed.

Daniel Webster, in 1843, addressing a convention at Andover, Mass., said, in speaking of the tariff of 1842:

A tariff does not necessarily increase prices. One year after the present tariff was established many articles embraced in its provisions were considerably lower than they had before been. And I ask any one if there is now any complaint of undue high prices in any article to which the tariff extends?

Hon. Samuel S. Phelps, of Vermont, in the United States Senate, February 16 and 19, 1844, spoke as follows:

The Senator from New Hampshire, assuming that the duty enhances the price of the article to the extent of the impost, and professing to deal in facts, very gravely proceeds to give us to a fraction the enormous burden laid upon the people of his State by this most oppressive tariff. He tells us that there are 300,000 people in that State; that the consumption of iron there is equal to an average of twenty-five pounds to each soul; that a duty of 3 cents per pound is equal to 75 cents on each person, and amounts in the aggregate to the sum of $225,000, being more than four times the whole State tax. These are facts which will not be disputed. But what use does he make of them? Why, he assumes that the cost to the consumer is increased and his constituents taxed to that amount. Without the aid of this assumption, erroneous as it is, his facts are not worth a straw; they furnish no aid to his argument, and lead him to no such conclusion. The Senator is most unfortunate in his illustrations. Will he permit me to substitute for his assumption certain other facts, which I commend to his especial attention? The most common, nay, universal, use of iron in that section of the country is in the form of cut nails, the duty on which, by the act of 1842, is 3 cents per pound; yet the article can be bought in the village where I live for 3½ cents per pound. Deducting the 3 cents for the duty the cost of the article would be one-half cent. Does the Senator really imagine that if this odious act were repealed the price would fall to that sum?

In the third annual message of President Fillmore, December 6, 1852, he addresses Congress in these words:

Without repeating the arguments contained in my former messages in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer to that extent is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price of the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, by reference to these statements made in the earnest and important discussions upon the questions arising from the consideration of the tariff and its effects upon the country in former years, we find that the same claims made to-day, that protective duties operate as a burden upon the consumer and increase his prices, were made by the earliest champions of free trade and low tariff and were then promptly and completely answered. The debates relating to this subject covered much broader grounds and exhibited in stronger lights the contrasts between the general prosperity and suffering which ensued as the tariff rose or fell in its protective feature.

I have purposely refrained from citing any authorities except such as bore directly upon the point I am now especially discussing, and if human authorities are entitled to any consideration at all they prove the falseness of the theory that the consumer suffers in the long run from protective tariffs. True, the temporary effect of the exaction of high duties upon an article not produced or cultivated here may be a rise for the time being in its cost, only to be followed, as surely as the ebb-tide follows flood, by reduced prices and still better rates when home production and competition have been established. The plenteous supply rushing forward to fill the market as the demand arises compels a fall in values and the consumer reaps the benefit. The impost is certainly not added to the cost of domestic commodities; and as regards goods imported from abroad, the foreign mill-owner is compelled to pay the greater part by making concessions in his prices to enable him to trade at all in our markets. On this point I invite your attention to admissions made by foreign manufacturers.

Robert B. Porter, a member of the late Tariff Commission, was told by a prominent manufacturer in Bradford, the center of the worsted industry of England:

The truth is, the higher the foreign tariff the lower we must make our goods, and the less we can afford to pay labor. The least possible reduction in the United States tariff will be a grand thing for Bradford, but how it will affect your industries I can hardly say. We are obliged to sell our goods in France for the same price we did before they enacted their higher tariff, and the Bradford manufacturer is paying that duty, not the French consumers of the goods; I know from practical experience what I am talking about.

This testimony is supplemented by the statement of Col. Dexter A. Hawkins, a gallant soldier in the late war, and now an eminent lawyer of New York city. He was invited to attend a meeting of the hardware trade, at Sheffield, England, and he says:

An eminent manufacturer in addressing the meeting inveighed with great bitterness against the American tariff. He said he had examined the question with great care, and such examination demonstrated that the English manufacturer was paying at least one-half of the tariff on all goods he exported to America; and they must break down our tariff at whatever cost, or it would build up American rivals to the extent at least of supplying entirely our home market; and then England would have to pay the whole tariff or lose the market, and when that point was reached she would have to compete with the American manufacturer in every foreign market, then her own, almost exclusively.

If our tariff duties are not paid to a great extent as I have claimed by the foreign manufacturers instead of by the purchasers of their goods, will gentlemen tell me why those manufacturers expend such efforts to cause reductions of our tariff? On this point listen again to the statement of Colonel Hawkins, who says:

Another English manufacturer a few years ago while lobbying at Washington against our tariff confessed to a free-trade Congressman that the protective-tariff duties in the long run came almost wholly out of the foreign producer; that if they only came out of the domestic consumer the foreign manufacturer would not care a button about our tariff laws.

Mr. Chairman, I do not rely alone upon that evidence of facts which is contained in the utterances of our leading men, nor upon the admissions of foreign manufacturers. I appeal to reason and to history. I call the record to bear witness to the accuracy of my statement that under the protective tariffs of the past and present prices to consumers have been constantly decreasing and that the market prices of our domestic commodities are in many cases even less than duties upon similar imported articles. If this is true it is an unassailable answer to the claim that a tariff which protects and maintains home industries burdens the consumer with higher prices.

The common experience of men whose memory, like mine, runs back for many years—whose eyes have witnessed the marvelous prosperity of the nation and have seen its periods of depression and gloom—will utterly contradict and overthrow the arguments of those who urge the passage of such a bill as this as a measure of justice to consumers. I speak of producers and consumers simply for convenience of illustration, and for no other purpose. It is folly to declare that there are two such classes in this country, parted by a dividing line which neither crosses. It is untrue to say that our people are separated into two great bodies, with diverse and opposing interests, the producers being gathered in one vast, consolidated array and the consumers in another. The relative positions of men change daily. Their interests are inseparably intertwined and dependent upon each other.

The citizen of this country is not a bushwhacker fighting on his own account alone, but he is one of 55,000,000 individuals, whose aggregation forms a powerful Republic with diversified industries but with one general interest and one destiny. Protection to one means protection to all; prosperity or injury to a portion means prosperity or injury to the rest. We are a nation of toilers. We all have products to dispose of. Labor of brain or of brawn is a necessity with every individual. The rule holds good as an average in every branch of industry that a manufactured article represents in value only about 10 per cent. in raw material, while 90 per cent. is labor. Iron ore or coal as it lies hidden in the earth has a value there which is insignificant. But set sturdy brawn and muscle at work upon it, bring it to the surface of the ground and its worth is increased. Smelt the ore, break up and screen the coal, and place it on the market and it becomes yet more valuable. Then transport your coal where it is to be devoted to its final purpose, where it will drive your engines and feed your roaring forges, and its original valuation in the earth bears but an insignificant proportion to the value which is represented by the labor you have bestowed upon it.

Put your iron also in the market, fuse it in the blazing furnaces, turn it into steel, create with it works of utility and art and beauty, magnetize it into the faithful compass, which, pointing ever to the pole, guides the commerce of the world more surely than human intelligence could do through blinding tempests, through sightless nights, across pathless seas—as unerringly as the stars are guided in their unchanging courses through the universe; fashion it into those delicate and untiring springs which with tempered and elastic pressure help to note the days and hours and minutes of mankind, or twist its yielding strands into massive cables which, when wrought into those grand and magnificent triumphs of human labor and intelligence and suspended in mid air, span great waters and connect vast cities with their touch and bear up toward the skies the travel and traffic of a continent. The unsightly ore, transmuted into beauty by the labor of mankind, has attained a value almost beyond human computation. The raw material was well-nigh worthless, but labor has augmented its value by an untold increase.

In the broad fields of agriculture which the Almighty in His goodness has given to this nation, and which, stretching across a continent in almost unlimited expanse, are watered by His showers and warmed by His sunlight, intelligent labor has its necessary part. Wild and useless are their productions until the hand of man regulates and prunes and cultivates. The rank growth starts up and flourishes and dies away, wasted and worthless, until busy industry stretches forth its arm and with its labor plows and sows, and gathers into golden harvest, so that the products of the farm and the cotton-field may be exchanged for the products of the loom, the anvil, and the furnace. Labor is everywhere necessary to create value as the basis of the interchange of commodities. The farmer on his broad acres produces and consumes; the manufacturer in his mill consumes and produces. All are subject to a common law, and in ultimate results all are aided or injured by the same causes.

The relations of all classes in this country have been uniformly in accordance with these principles. The tariff which has protected the manufacturer and enabled him to build up great industries has in like degree protected those engaged in other pursuits, and made them sharers in a general prosperity. It has increased the purchasing capacity of agricultural productions—has given them a market both stable and accessible, while it has allowed the mill-owner to pay higher wages to his workmen, to reduce his prices, and still make profits upon his enterprise and capital. It is not my purpose to exhaust the list of protected manufactured goods. Tables have been shown by gentlemen upon this floor, and others will be presented for the purposes of comparison and illustration. I shall take but a very few as an example of the whole to prove that every manufactured article deemed a necessary of life has been reduced in price when subjected to the influence of a protective tariff. Will gentlemen on the other side give me the name of a single article whose price has been increased by protection, unless itbe tea, or coffee, or some other product which we do not make or cultivate in this country, and which therefore is not the subject of protection?

Take cotton goods for example. In 1817 they ranged in price from 29 to 40 cents per yard. In 1819 the price of the lower grade above mentioned was 21 cents, in 1823 it was 14½ cents, in 1827 it was 13 cents, and in 1831 it was 10½ to 11 cents.

Come down now to 1860, when a tariff for revenue only was in force. Prices for cotton goods, including prints, averaged 9.6 cents per yard; but under the provisions of a protective tariff the same goods averaged in 1883 7.4 cents per yard. The average duty upon those goods under the existing tariff varies from 5 to 7½ cents per yard. And this reduction has taken place notwithstanding the enormous increase of the country in wealth and ability and readiness to pay high prices.

How, then, can it be true, as our opponents assert, that the tariff duty laid by the Government is added to the cost of all manufactured goods sold in our markets? They may argue as they will; they may indulge in all the graces of rhetoric and oratory; but the solid fact confronts them as an impregnable obstacle. Take cutlery, take saws, axes, nails, as another illustration. Their prices have been lowered as the tariff has been raised. In 1824 a duty was imposed upon cut nails of 5 cents per pound and prices were 7 to 8 cents. In 1833 the tariff was reduced, but the price per pound fell below the duty.

By the tariff of 1842 the duty was 3 cents per pound upon cut-nails, and the price was but 3½ cents. In 1861 the price was 3 cents. In 1876 it was 2½ cents, and to-day the price varies but little from 3 to 4 cents. So that under the protection of high tariffs the price of this article of universal use has been brought to a point only about one-half of its value before the tariff was enacted which created home production and competition. Saws and axes show the same reduction. The manufacture of saws in this country commenced about 1840. English saws then cost our American consumers prices ranging from $15.75 to $19 per dozen. In 1876 American saws of better make were selling in our markets and in England at $10.50 per dozen, being a reduction caused by protection of about 50 per cent.

I quote from the American Iron Trade as follows with reference to the prices of axes:

> Before axes were made in this country, except by country blacksmiths, English axes cost our farmers and others from $2 to $4 each. By the tariff of 1828 a protective duty of 35 per cent. was levied upon imported axes. Under this protection the Collins Company, of Hartford, introduced labor-saving machinery, much of which was invented, patented, and constructed by themselves. In 1836 foreign and home-made axes were selling side by side in the American market at $15 to $16 per dozen. Axes were selling in 1838 at $13 to $15.25 per dozen; in 1843 at $11 to $12; in 1849 at $8 to $10; in 1876 the price of the best American axes in the market is $9.50 per dozen in currency, and the country exports to foreign markets. English writers admit their superior excellence.
> The Collins Company makes its own steel, and a letter from the company claims that it is "better than any English steel we can buy, and we have been steel consumers for fifty years. We now only make for our own consumption, and we have no disposition to cheat ourselves."

Take cutlery and farming utensils. Prices have been reduced by the beneficent workings of protection. The country is dotted with manufactories, which produce in plenty these articles so necessary and universal in their use. Five-sixths of the consumption is now supplied by our domestic producers, and quantities are shipped by them to foreign countries, where the excellence of their material and finish reflects honor upon American enterprise and workmanship.

The articles I have chosen for illustrations of the correctness of my position are fairly selected; they are just and accurate representatives of the whole. It would be useless to extend the list. It is the truth that the necessaries of life—chemicals, clothing, boots and shoes, blankets, cloths, and all the manifold articles consumed by a generally prosperous and progressive nation—have been made cheaper under the influence of protection.

The men and women of the country who remember the days when they drove from their farms to their village stores to barter their own produce for articles of necessary consumption will bear me witness that under the operation of protective tariffs the purchasing power of their agricultural production has been greatly augmented. You may exert your ingenuity upon them and ply them with arguments, and they will tell you that while they may not be able to explain away the sophistries of your logic or your figures, nevertheless they are paying for the necessities of life less than their fathers paid and are receiving for their own commodities much greater returns.

As bearing upon the foregoing statements and confirming their accuracy, I present for consideration the following table, by which farm products are divided into classes, together with the prices which the farmer could obtain for them in 1816 and in 1882. The figures therein contained gained a widespread publicity throughout the country in the columns of the New York Herald, and I have never seen any attempt made to question their correctness. They are in accordance, I believe, with the general knowledge of all who have any practical familiarity with the subject:

Products.	1816.	1882.
Wheat	$0 25 to $0 44	$1 42
Corn	12½ to 20	60
Oats	15	60

Carriage horses, per span	150 00 to 200 00	500 00 to 1,200 00
Sheep, per head	50 to 75	1 50 to 2 50
Farm labor, per month	3 00 to 8 00	12 00 to 25 00

From the foregoing table it will be seen that prices for farm products have increased during the sixty-six years therein referred to to an average of nearly four times their former value.

From the following table, which is taken from the Boston Journal, and which covers the same period, it will be seen that the cost of manufactured articles has been greatly decreased.

Articles.	1816.	1882.
Steel, per pound	$0 17	$0 10
Sawplate, per pound	40	26
Nails, per pound	12½	4
Broadcloth, per yard	$16 00	$4 00
Wool blankets, per pair	$10 00 to 20 00	$3 00 to 10 00
Cotton cloth, per yard	30 to 50	04 to 12
Calico, per yard	25 to 75	4 to 16
Salt, per bushel	$1 00 to 4 00	15 to 25

A large proportion of the American people are dependent upon agriculture for the support of themselves and their families. According to the census of 1880 the entire number of persons engaged in agriculture was 7,670,493. If for no other reason than that they form so large a part of our body politic they would be manifestly entitled to the highest consideration in our legislation whereby the general interests of the country are affected. But there are other reasons for such consideration than this. Upon this branch of industry rests primarily the fabric of society, and to the intelligence and elevated condition of our farmers and the diffusion of education among their families, all of which is intimately connected with their general well-being, we must look for the maintenance of the strength and prosperity of our country and its institutions.

Recognizing these facts as strongly as any man can do, I believe that the true interests of our farmers are enhanced by the continuance of protection to home industry as our national policy. The figures to which I have called your attention express more forcibly and compactly than mere words can express them the general benefits secured to the agricultural elements of our country by the operation of this principle. These benefits are, indeed, often interrupted by extrinsic causes. Droughts and pestilence, wars, panics, and financial disturbances come in to injure them. But that as a general law the increase of domestic productions and the building up of mechanical and manufacturing establishments, with their tens of thousands of workmen, advance the interest of farmers in many ways can not reasonably be questioned.

Not only are they thus benefited, but they also receive direct protection from the imposition by the Government of a duty upon foreign agricultural productions which are sent to this country for a market, principally from Canada. Wool, sugar, corn, peas, potatoes, barley, hay, wheat, rye, oats, butter, cheese, flax, tobacco-leaf, and animals (except for breeding purposes) are subject to import duties. In 1881 these articles paid $4,419,748 in revenues to the Government. Farmers do not look to farmers for their markets. They must sell their commodities to others. They must find a market either at home or abroad. If they go abroad they must compete in foreign markets with the agricultural productions of other countries, and take the risk of their overflowing harvests and all the other incidents of trade to which they may be subjected. If, on the other hand, they would find their market at their own doors, they must be benefited by all such enactments as will enable them to find buyers there, and buyers who are able to pay.

This is accomplished by protection, which by the establishment of immense factories throughout the country, with their swarms of busy, well-paid laborers, favorably affects the material prosperity of the farmer and brings the agricultural and manufacturing interests into mutually profitable relationship. Their farms, their stock, their production, are greatly increased in value, and they find at their own doors, at lessened cost, the articles necessary for their use in the management of their concerns and in supplying the wants of their families. The farmer buys cheaper in our markets than in any market in the world. And for the purpose of showing you that these results spring directly from the principle of protection, I read from the following tables prepared by Hon. Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island. The first table shows the average price of farm products and of articles necessary for the use of farmers during five years of free trade ending in 1850 and five years of protection ending in 1880. The second table is based upon the first, and shows the purchasing power of farmers' articles in the markets under protection and free trade, respectively:

These figures clearly establish the claim I have already made that the purchasing power of farm productions is greatly increased under the principle of protection to all home industries.

I desire now to present but one additional illustration of my views to disprove the statements of those who say that under the operations of protective tariffs agricultural consumers are compelled to bear heavy burdens, and impoverish themselves to support manufacturing monopolists. I call your attention to the official records showing that in 1860 the value of farms in this country was $6,645,045,007. In 1880, under the high tariff of nearly twenty years, notwithstanding the exhaustion caused by three years of gigantic warfare and its necessary injurious results, their value had increased to $10,197,096,776. The value of farm implements and machinery in 1860 was in round numbers $246,000,000, and in 1880, during the era of protection, it was $406,476,055. The value of live-stock in 1860 was $1,107,500,000, and in 1884 it had increased to $2,467,868,924.

This magnificent increase in the material wealth of the farmers of the country occurred during the period of highest protection in all our history, and is a fitting comment upon the statement that agricultural consumers are made poor by the tariff duties which our laws levy upon foreign goods for the purpose of building up home industries, which thereby establish home markets for the products of the soil and the labor of the farmer. I read now from the comprehensive report of the Department of Agriculture, prepared by that able and exact statistician, Mr. J. R. Dodge, under date of February 19, 1884. He says:

> The farmer feeds all, but when all are farmers he can only feed himself, which is a necessary operation but not a lucrative business. This would seem to be a self-evident truth, but extensive distrusts fail to appreciate it and cherish the pernicious fancy that markets are unnecessary, or that distant markets thousands of miles away are as good as near ones.

He then goes on to show that commerce, mining, manufactures, and anything bringing population to be fed aid agriculture. He speaks of paupers, rich idlers, professional workers, traders, and those engaged in commercial pursuits as consuming but giving no production in return. He then adds:

> Miners, mechanics, and especially artisans and operatives engaged in productive occupations, are vastly more beneficial to agriculture for two reasons: 1. They augment the numbers to be fed and increase agricultural values. 2. They make something themselves which farmers need, and reduce the prices of commodities hitherto brought from a distance at unnecessary cost.

He afterward proceeds to show by tables that in every State there is a difference in the value of lands in favor of manufacturing counties; where there is but little manufacturing there being but a small difference, and where the products of manufactures are of large value land bears a high price. Although these tables have already had a wide circulation throughout the country, yet as they are important and instructive I read them and the comments of Mr. Dodge thereon as a part of my argument. I add also an additional table contained in his report, by which it will be seen that in what he groups as the manufacturing States, with their diversified industries, the annual individual income is $457, while in the group of agricultural States it is only $160.

VARIATION BY STATES AND GROUPS.

These States aggregate the value of $5,336,465,954 in products of manufactures, the grand aggregate in 1880 being $5,369,579,191 for all the States and Territories of the United States. Now, the eighteen States and one Territory in the group which has the least manufactures produce a value of $676,427,860, or 12.6 per cent. of the total for the United States, a fraction of 1 per cent. for each State. These may well be considered agricultural States.

The third group includes four States, also essentially agricultural—Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and California—in which there is a quite general determination not to remain in the category of one-idea communities in industrial development. They have $391,585,577 in manufacturing production, or 7.3 per cent. of the grand aggregate for the whole country.

The second group is rounding into symmetry in industry and realizing the benefits of such a status in high prices of lands and farm products and rapid increase in wealth and culture. This class includes the States north of the Ohio River—Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois—and also Northern New England. These seven States return a production of $1,247,046,686, which is 23.2 per cent. of the whole. These may be deemed industrial as well as agricultural.

But there are seven other States in which the industries are more equally balanced than any other, which make more than half the industrial production of the United States, worth $3,021,405,831, or 56.3 of all. These are found in Southern New England and the Middle States, and may properly be grouped together.

They include all manufacturing production except six-tenths of 1 per cent., scattered through two States and nine Territories. The tabulation by States is as follows:

Aggregate value of products of agriculture by States, acres of land in farms, and value of farm lands, by States and groups of States.

THE FARMER'S INCOME.

The fact that the group of States where industry is most diversified (those having only 18 per cent. of all workers engaged in agriculture) afford $457 per annum to each one, while the agricultural States, having 77 per cent. in agriculture, allow an annual income of only $160, is too significant to be explained away, too convincing for pretense of cavil. It stands as proof of the necessity of symmetry and completeness of the productive system, and as a forceful illustration of the solidarity of the industries.

Upon this branch of the question my argument is ended. If a protective tariff with its duties properly distributed upon imported goods has impoverished one class of our citizens at the expense of another, why do the official figures fail utterly to disclose the fact? If it increases prices to consumers, how happens it that the judgment and opinion of students of the subject have been ever so grossly at fault? If the duties imposed by Government are paid in whole or in great part by the purchaser, and not by the foreign manufacturer when he makes his prices for this country, why should the latter be so strongly convinced that he pays them? And why should he expend so much effort and so much money to break down our tariff system, which would not otherwise injure him or hinder his competing at a profit in our market?

If such duty is added to the price of all similar articles of our domestic manufacture, why is it that the cost of such commodities has been steadily cut down as tariffs have been raised, so that they are delivered to purchasers at prices vastly below the values of former years? And why in many instances are they sold at or even below the figures which represent the duties paid upon such goods? How will it promote the interests of consumers to weaken or destroy the system which, wherever its influence has been felt, has added to the buying power of their own productions, given them markets at their very doors, and augmented their material wealth and general prosperity? The claim that the enactment of a lower tariff law will benefit consumers is a false assumption. Unanswerable facts rise up to testify against the theory. It is contradicted by the reason of the thing, by the history of the past, and by the universal experience of mankind. It is disproved by the present social, industrial, and financial condition of the Republic, which, notwithstanding temporary disasters, halts, and obstacles, has advanced gloriously along the pathway of national strength and greatness, and in dignity, honor, intelligence, and enterprise leads the world.

How then, Mr. Chairman, can the general prosperity be increased by reversing all the steps and methods which have hitherto secured it? Can an army be advanced to the front by ordering a retreat? Can victory be gained by abandoning the field? These questions have been in part already considered in my discussion of this bill. I am not prepared to say that the present tariff even as revised last year is, in all respects, what our interests demand. Nothing human ever yet was perfect. It may be true, as urged in argument, that the duties therein prescribed are not adjusted with entire propriety. It may be that some articles now upon the free-list should be taken off and others placed upon it. It may be that into a law enacted nearly a quarter of a century ago, comprehending details so numerous and so minute and dealing with such vast and fluctuating interests, which has been amended and again amended from time to time, uncertainties and errors have crept.

It may be that in the lapse of years, as interests have changed and new industries have arisen, its provisions have become inadequate, so that they should be readjusted and readapted to the new conditions. But such matters are not matters of principle. Changes should be made if necessary by consultation, comparison, and agreement. There would be no difficulty in this if the desire were manifest. But in such changes the principle should not be yielded. Protection should be kept steadily in view and insisted on at every point. But this bill proposes no such action. It makes a blind, clean-cut, unreasoning, arbitrary sweep, simply because the Democratic party, disregarding the interests of the country, demands that free trade and low tariff shall be the national policy. Thus the gauntlet is thrown down and we are challenged to a battle on that issue. No fair examination is proposed with a view to removing existing imperfections without sacrificing the principle of protection. It is a free-trade movement, pure and simple, and must be grappled with as such.

Those who assert that free trade is a good thing for the country have ranged themselves upon one side. I stand with those who believe in protection to American industry of every kind, and in the elevation of American labor and American manhood. This bill is a free-trade measure ingeniously and insidiously prepared. It moves toward its objective point by zigzags, angles, and concealed approaches. It is an admirable illustration of the method of indirection. But it is as destructive of the principle of protection and as disastrous in its purposes as though all duties were repealed at once by a single stroke. It professes merely to cut down duties by an equal and uniform percentage, but it does far more than this.

Along the banks of the Mississippi levees have been constructed within which the great river flows in its majestic course from its source to the Gulf. On either side broad plains stretch out in limitless expanse, covered with verdure, with fruitful harvests, and the peaceful habitations of men. Behind those simple barriers, and protected by their existence, civilization flourishes, and the homes of a people imperial in their greatness are made secure. Those artificial restraints are just sufficient to confine the swollen stream within its bounds; but cut them down one-fifth, and over their lowered surface the rushing waters, uncontrolled and sweeping with resistless force, will pass and in a single day overwhelm with disaster and annihilation the accumulations of years. And in like manner this measure, if it passes into law, by its horizontal reduction will remove all restraints upon foreign importations and subject our domestic industries to the danger of destruction.

Does it not strike the minds of gentlemen as strange that if the condition of affairs requires the adoption of such a measure no sound or clamor has reached our ears calling for its enactment? Not a single industry appeared before the committee to request its passage. Not a single petition was presented praying for relief from the operations of the present tariff. Not a solitary appeal for assistance from any agricultural, manufacturing, or financial interest came to the attention of the committee. But certain abstract theorists, representing the Free-Trade Club of New York city, appeared and made their arguments in general opposition to the principle of protection. On the other hand, delegations appeared in opposition to this bill. Laborers, representing the operatives and artisans engaged in the mills and factories of the country, appeared before them. Mr. Williams, an Englishman, who had worked five years in the Dowlas Iron Works in Great Britain, said:

> We do not think it is right for you to reduce us to the condition of the workingmen of England.

And he appealed to the committee—

> As intelligent American citizens and Congressmen not to pass the bill. You can not reduce the tariff without reducing our wages, and the agitation of the subject makes our work unsteady. There are 1,500 men in the works where I am employed. Until this agitation began we had work, on the average, about ten months in the year. In the last year we have had work only four to five months.

Another representative of the laborers said earnestly to the committee:

> If free trade is such a grand thing for English workmen, why are our factories filled with them, and why do they tell us they sought homes here to escape the dog's life they led in England?

God forbid that by any act or vote of mine American labor should be degraded. God forbid that American manhood or womanhood or childhood should be reduced to the depths of misery and helpless suffering which exist in England under the operation of free trade, where women are debased, men turned into brutes, and little children never know the joy and innocence of youthful life. There, if the testimony presented to Parliamentary commissions has any truth, men, women, boys, and girls work together in the collieries in an almost naked condition. Women are compelled to go through the dark seams and passages of the Lancashire coal mines on hands and feet and knees, with belts around their waists, fastened by chains between their legs to heavy trucks, crawling over wet pavements and slushy floors with soaking garments, maimed and sore and suffering, harnessed like horses to the loads they drag. Thousands of females, old and young, mothers and daughters, with little children by their side, toil day and night. Nail-workers and rivet-makers, women who are mothers, and daughters young in years, but with that look of premature old age always to be noticed in the faces of child-workers, with weary arms and hopeless faces, fashion molten iron into the form of nails for the benefit of what are called the "froggers."

Sixteen thousand females are engaged in this one occupation alone, day after day, night after night, with no prospect of release until death comes to end their toil. The freshness and the gentleness of childhood are unknown among their offspring; who, ragged, hungry, and ill-fed, lead lives of wretchedness and misery, with no hope before them but a future of wickedness and vice. Women with perspiration streaming down their faces, with sooty handkerchiefs around their weary heads, half-starved and gaunt and miserable, work at the bellows of the blacksmith forge and hammer upon anvils to keep body and soul together at starvation wages. Their homes are squalid and misery is manifest in every feature.

In the workshops and large manufacturing establishments their situation is but by few degrees improved, for pauper wages, hunger, poverty, and hopelessness tell the story of their daily lives. The wages they receive scarce keep life within their miserable bodies, and human beings made in God's own image are regarded as but little better than the beasts that perish. I have not drawn upon my imagination in this description, for the statements I have made are matters of record and of evidence. One explanation only is possible for this condition of affairs, and that is the low rates of wages which it is possible for manufacturers to pay under the operation of free trade. They are obliged to reduce the prices of their goods in order to obtain a standing in our markets, and they are therefore compelled to reduce the wages of their operatives.

I turn now from this picture of misery and suffering to the condition of American labor. Protection to our industries has advanced the interests of our operatives in every branch of employment. On the farm and in the workshop, in the mines, and in every department of human effort American labor has been elevated and ennobled. Its services are requited by fair and ample remuneration. I need not cite the tables which show the comparative rates of wages which are paid to workmen in this country and abroad; but I appeal with confidence to the knowledge and experience of all men for the verification of my statement that the workmen of America in their intelligence, their condition, their opportunities, and their general surroundings are superior to the workmen of any country in the world. From the factory to yonder chair, from the log-cabin to the Senate Chamber, and from the towpath to the White House the feet of workmen have already found their unobstructed way.

I for one can not consent to the Democratic policy now sought to be established, which would degrade our working men and working women, deprive them of the comforts of this life and the possibilities of advancement for themselves and their children, debase and convert them into brute creatures, unfit them for the duties of citizens in a Republic where all are free and equal in their rights, and condemn them to lives of hopeless, abject misery. Nor can I consent to a policy which would bring upon this country the evils which have resulted from the revenue tariffs of the past. Go back with me for a moment along the line of our national history. Contrast the general prosperity of the periods when the principles of protection were in force with the suffering and depression when tariffs "for revenue only" were established.

Take the period previous to the protective tariff of 1824. Wages were scarcely worth the name. Sluggishness in all industrial branches was everywhere apparent. The comparatively few mills and factories which then existed had partially shut down. Labor was without employment. Foreign merchandise, unrestrained by the protecting barriers of high-revenue laws, had flooded the markets of the country and ruined our manufacturers by their unchecked competition. Financial embarassment was everywhere the rule, and the courts and the sheriffs found constant employment. The tariff of 1816, although partially protective in its provisions, was insufficient to repel the flood of merchandize with which foreign traders had determined to destroy our infant industries and control our markets in their own interests.

In this condition of affairs the tariff of 1824 was enacted. Immediately the gloomy condition of affairs was changed. The throbs of vigorous life were felt throughout the great body of the country; the sluggish blood circulated with increased rapidity. Mines were opened. The fires roared in the great furnaces. The factories were busy. Trade was active. Debts were paid. Wages were remunerative. Prosperity such as the country had never before witnessed sat down by the hearthstones of a contented people; and in his annual message of 1832 President Jackson declared that "Our country presents on every side marks of prosperity and happiness never equaled perhaps in any other portion of the world."

The following year the compromise tariff, with its descending scale, was passed, and the general prosperity vanished like the mists of the morning. Money became high and wages low. Public and private revenues everywhere decreased. Foreign goods poured like an inundation upon our markets. Panic, bankruptcy and collapse followed, and suffering and misery were universal. Protection was again demanded and the high tariff of 1842 again wrought an extraordinary revival in trade, production, and general business. In 1846 another reduction followed, and in 1857 the tariff was again cut down, and during those periods financial revulsion followed, the progress and advancement of the country were checked and impeded, bankruptcies took place, revenues declined, and the public credit was prostrated. From that day to the present it is recent history.

Amid the thunders of a civil war which threatened to destroy the institutions of the Republic, and to consume the substance which years of labor had enabled its citizens to gather, with extraordinary expenses such as staggered the minds of men in their appalling magnitude, with such enormous amounts of property absolutely wiped out of existence that it seemed as though a century of peace could not replace them, with a debt of billions draining its energies, undaunted and undismayed through years of bloodshed the Republic grappled with its enemies, raised the most magnificent armies the world has ever seen, protected and extended the manifold productions of its people, restored its credit, honored its obligations, and at length, victorious and reunited, has developed its resources, increased its wealth, and built up its internal system of home production, so that to-day and for all time to come it can be independent of the world.

I must not be understood as asserting that the principle of protection which has been enforced during this period has alone accomplished these stupendous results; but if the tariffs of 1861 and subsequent years, which gave domestic industries their greatest impulse, had not been enacted, our present public and private prosperity would not exist, even had it been possible to carry the war to a successful issue. They have unquestionably produced billions of revenue, much of which, as I have shown already, has been borne by foreign manufacturers as a necessary condition of their being enabled to place their goods upon our markets; they have inspired and sustained home manufactures to an extent which is amazing in its results; they have prevented the outpouring of our precious metals and developed our internal resources, so that our exports have vastly increased, and will continue to increase if their operations shall be continued; they have, in other words, made our national income greater than our national outgo, and by these processes have increased the national wealth and more than replaced the waste, ravage, and destruction caused by war.

I recognize the fact that during the period to which I am now referring financial revulsions have occurred and every department of national life has felt their depressing influence. I know that even at the present time the general prosperity is not unclouded, and that business is not in as satisfactory a condition as we all would like. But these are not the necessary consequences of protection. Forces outside of tariff laws intervene to produce them. Speculation, contraction in values following upon the intense excitements of the great national struggle, improvidence and extravagance in financial and business management, the unnecessary and reckless agitation of tariff questions, the doubts and uncertainties of legislation affecting great national interests, more ample production than is needed to supply general demands, short crops at home, overflowing harvests abroad, financial difficulties in the money centers of the world—all these causes, with a thousand others at various times and in different degrees, affect our national prosperity. It will not do for gentlemen to argue that such results are caused by protective laws; because to-day in England, the lair of free trade, the only civilized nation in the world which is without protection, overproduction exists, her industries are drooping, her manufactures are depressed, and the cry of helpless, hopeless, pitiable distress from her underpaid, discharged, and suffering operatives and their families goes up unceasingly to Heaven.

Can gentlemen still doubt? Come with me to New England. Come, gentlemen from Illinois, from Kentucky, from Missouri, from Alabama, and from Texas; come from all sections of our common country, and see the prosperity which protection has given to our people. Our soil is sterile when compared with yours; our hills are steep and rugged, but along the streams which sparkle from the summit to the valley you will see great mills and factories in which looms and spindles sing with cheery music, and ponderous machinery accomplishes its work as though endowed with reason and intelligence. You will hear the rushing of the waters as they dash against the wheels on their way to the sea. You will listen to the clangor of the hammers and the throbbing of the engines as they create those wonderful results of human skill which pour forth in an unceasing tide to every portion of the Union, to every quarter of the world, to supply its necessities. You will rejoice at the sight of thrifty farms cultivated by men educated and informed, who not only understand the institutions of the Government under which they live but can discuss its underlying principles with intelligence, and when necessary can fight and calmly die for them. You will meet multitudes of busy workmen well paid, well fed, well clad, living in homes of comfort, engaged in occupations of every kind which promote the prosperity of a great republic. You will find agriculture and manufactures not in antagonism under hostile banners, but in mutual interest and sustaining power. You will find labor of every kind respected and its rights secured. You will find no degradation of workingmen, no debasement of manhood or womanhood, no hopeless, joyless childhood. The church, the academy, and district school are near each other. The reading-room and debating club stand with open doors; and from among the sons of poverty and toil blessed with advantages like these comes forth a sinewy strength of mind and body that hews its way to influence and power. That system of legislation which elevates and upholds American labor and American manhood and creates such opportunities for every man commends itself to my judgment and my conscience. It is good for us in New England; it is good for every portion of the Union. God forbid that the attempt to overthrow it should be successful.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, "Labor is discovered to be the grand conqueror, enriching and building up nations more surely than the proudest battles." If this be true—and true it is—it becomes any nation to educate, liberalize, ennoble, and protect its labor—labor in its every branch. This is especially true of the United States, for we fight no military battles for glory, renown, or conquest. When we defend our labor, our industries, we defend our people, our institutions of free government; for our laws are made and supported by the suffrages and the patriotism of a free, enlightened, laboring people.

We are enriched by three kinds of property: real estate, personal property, and industry. We are ever ready and willing to defend our lands and our personal property against foreign invasion, and if we would prosper as a people and a nation we must be as ready to defend our industries from foreign invasion. Our welfare and prosperity is measured not by our foreign trade or commerce, but by our productive power and by our self-reliance.

It was the recognition of these principles by our fathers that gave rise to our protective policy. Protection is defense. That nation is truly great which is capable of producing at home all that the people and the nation demand both in times of peace and in times of war.

It always has been and always will be true that the condition of the common laborer, male and female, marks the civilization, the progress, and the power of any country. A happy and a contented people is essential to the perpetuity of any nation. If a nation would long endure as a first-class power, as a self-defending and a self-sustaining power, it must be under a policy that reaches out to and among the masses of the people and guarantees to them the blessing of a good government; the defense by the government of the lives, the liberties, the property, and the industries of the people, all of which are essential to the general happiness.

The United States, still in its infancy, has had its epochs of prosperity and its epochs of adversity. These have been marked more especially by our tariff legislation. At the close of the Revolutionary war the merchant marine of the then thirteen infant seaboard colonies had been swept from the sea by the navy of England. Yet our manufactures had grown at a rate past belief and that excited wonder both at home and abroad. Previous to that war some of our manufactories had been declared nuisances by the British Parliament, and the erection of steel manufactories had been forbidden. In fact, every means had been used by the mother country to suppress our manufacturing enterprise. The impetus given to home manufactures by closed ports during that war was so marked and beneficial that Alexander Hamilton so early as 1791 urged the practicability and duty of protecting and encouraging our manufactures. He enumerated seventeen grand departments which had been developed.

For the seven years following the peace of 1783 we had no protection, and there was no power in the old Confederation for protection and no concurrence among the several States. There came in a perfect inundation of foreign goods, and a member of the first Federal Congress, speaking of this period of free trade, said:

> We bought according to the doctrine of modern theorists where we could purchase cheapest, and were soon inundated with foreign commodities. English goods were sold at lower rates in our maritime cities than at Liverpool or London. Our manufacturers were ruined; our merchants, even those who had hoped to enrich themselves by importation, became bankrupt, and all these causes united had such an influence upon agriculture that a general depreciation of real estate followed, and failure became general among the proprietors.

Another writer in describing the distresses and disorders of that time says:

> The scarcity of money is so great, and the difficulty of paying debts has been so common, that riots and combinations have been formed in many places, and the operations of civil government have been suspended.

Chief-Justice Marshal, speaking of this crisis generally, says:

> On opening their ports an immense quantity of foreign merchandise was introduced into the country, and they were tempted by the sudden cheapness of imported goods and by their own wants, to purchase beyond their capacity for payment.

The consequences he thus describes:

> The bonds of men whose competency to pay their debts was unquestionable could not be negotiated but at a discount of 30, 40, and 50 per cent.; real property was scarcely vendible; and sales of any article for ready money could be made only at a ruinous loss.

July 4, 1789, the first tariff act of the first Federal Congress was passed, and it was followed by another August 10, 1790, which largely increased the duties then imposed. The first act, that of 1789, recited as follows:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, &c.

Here the doctrine of protection to American manufactures is distinctly enunciated.

In 1791 Washington wrote:

> In my tour I confirmed by observation the accounts which we had all along received of the happy effects of the General Government upon our agriculture, commerce, and industry. The same effects pervade the Middle and Eastern States, with the addition of vast progress in the most useful manufactures.

Indeed, the same story was told from every quarter and every branch of industry was revived and invigorated. It is true that the opening war of 1793 on the continent of Europe, which with slight interruptions continued until 1815, the suspension of specie payment by the Bank of England in 1797, and which continued until about 1817, and our own war with England, all aided largely in one way and another in strengthening and rendering effective our tariff, so that in 1815 our cotton and woolen manufactures were $60,000,000 per annum with over 100,000 workmen employed in them.

When these causes ceased to operate in aid of that tariff we were again flooded with foreign importations, until in 1824 we had general distress, as the tariff alone was inadequate to protect American labor and home industry. The result was the higher tariff of 1824, and this, though not perfect, crude and unequal in many respects, proved so beneficial that we immediately entered upon another era of agricultural, commercial, and industrial prosperity. We soon had a surplus in the Treasury, and then, as now, men predicted ruin because of too much money in the national Treasury, and then, as now, "horizontal reductionists" came to the front and argued that all the evils of accumulations in the Treasury would be avoided by a straight cut, a general, uniform "slash." We had "nullification," and the great cry came from the section that lived upon the fruits of slave labor, and refused, or from its social condition was not able, to avail itself of the benefits of a protective tariff. The result was the compromise act of 1833 and the consequent ruin of our American industries, culminating in the general crash of 1837.

During the first three years of the operation of this act of 1833 we imported about $366,000,000, an average of $122,000,000 annually, as against an average of $70,000,000 annually under the act of 1828. We paid out abroad $52,000,000 annually for foreign articles that we had not before imported. We paid that to foreign labor instead of home labor, and we encouraged extravagance of every kind. In the beginning of 1834 our circulation of bank notes was $95,000,000; at the close of 1836, $149,000,000; an increase of $54,000,000. In the beginning of 1834 our bank loans and discounts were $324,000,000; at the close of 1836, $500,000,000; increase, $176,000,000.

In May, 1837, the banks suspended specie payments all over the country. At the end of 1836 there was in the national Treasury a surplus of $46,500,000, $44,500,000 of which came from an increased sale of the public lands; showing that the great increase of imports crippled American manufactures and drove capital and labor to the great West; that we had bought more than we could pay for; that mercantile business had been unduly stimulated. Disaster and ruin followed as a natural and inevitable consequence. When you throw home labor out of employment, when you cripple home industries, when you buy on credit more than you sell or more than you produce, and when you drive home capital to other, far-away fields, as you inevitably must do in this country by a free-trade policy or any tariff scheme short of protection, you bring disaster and ruin to enterprise, agriculture, manufactures, and internal commerce.

There is a taste among Americans for foreign articles. If the lady in society can wear a dress imported from Paris and the gentleman a coat of English cloth and cut they feel that they have more claim to respectability. There is a taste for foreign ways and manners, especially among the wealthy. Even the judges of the New York court of appeals are becoming tinctured with this foreign malaria and they array themselves in silken gowns, à la England, which I suppose are of English cut and make. In all our debates I hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] advocating some measure, an innovation upon American ways and laws, because they have it or something similar in England. Even the American dude is becoming immensely popular because he is the exact counterpart of the English snob.

If we are to have these things, let them be confined to the rich and the opulent; let them be paid for by the capitalists and monopolists; and let the dude pets be labeled, "Fair result of a free-trade tariff." I think it is the only importation of English manufacture that does not pay a high tariff duty. [Laughter.] The point I would make is this: that this disposition or mania for foreign articles would tend largely to the undue importation of foreign manufactures and the consequent injury if not destruction of American industries.

Now, sir, as a result of the tariff of 1833, and which was in operation until 1842, our American industries were prostrated, our home labor was degraded, our business interests were destroyed, and finally the people rebelled, turned its advocates out of power, repudiated the alien policy, and gave us the protective tariff of 1842. This was modified in 1846 by the representatives of slave labor. Still, as modified, aided by scarcity in Western Europe, famine, the gold fever of 1848–'49, the Crimean war, and other causes, it proved beneficial and the country prospered, the Treasury had a surplus, and the people were happy and contented. Then came the 20 per cent. reduction of 1857, and, as might have been expected, and as was inevitable, we had another panic, another inundation of foreign production. Imports for consumption increased from $5.42 to $11.82 per head; the bank circulation and loans were more than doubled, the loans rising from $312,000,000 to $634,000,000, and the circulation from $105,000,000 to $214,000,000, and a general suspension again followed.

But more, the national debt rose from sixteen and three-fourths to twenty-nine million dollars, and to $64,000,000 in 1860 under the tariff of 1857. Our national securities were at a discount of 6 to 12 per cent., bearing a high rate of interest. General distress pervaded all classes, and such was the condition of the country, agricultural, commercial, industrial, and financial, that our enemies predicted that the rebellion commenced in 1861 would find but little opposition, and that we could not devise the ways and means to resist it.

But with the rebellion came the Morrill tariff, highly protective, and although confederate cruisers and English piratical crafts under the confederate flag swept our commerce from the ocean; although the bone and sinew of the country was for four years engaged in the work of destruction, both of life and property; although the energies of the people were directed to the protection of the nation's life instead of the production of wealth; although we became a nation of destruction instead of production, still we successfully combated armed rebellion, we fostered American manufactures, developed American industries, and demonstrated beyond all peradventure not only that the American Constitution can protect the American nation, but that the protective tariff can protect home industries and American labor. [Applause.] But more of this further on.

Mr. Chairman, political parties are always seeking to win the good opinions of the people, and the party in the minority is necessarily driven to the expedient of winning recruits from its opponent if it would ever taste the sweets of power and patronage. It is not slow to discover the weak points of its adversary, and may be tempted to hold out delusive arguments and even hide the truth. Then let us study history and the present condition of our people and heed the lessons taught. That there is an honest difference of opinion with the American people on the subject of the tariff must be conceded. This is owing more to the fact that certain States are substantially agricultural while others are mainly engaged in the manufactures, than to any real difference as to the merits of the proposition as now presented. If the United States was an agricultural country without large manufacturing interests and incapable of developing them, free trade would be the true doctrine.

But, sir, we are to take the country and the whole country as it is regardless of State lines, and study to promote the general welfare. So if we were a manufacturing country producing a very large excess of manufactured articles above home consumption the sale abroad of which were necessary to enable the people to purchase their food from abroad, then free trade might be the true doctrine. Take the South and West from the Union and the Eastern and Middle States might not prosper under a protective tariff. No competition could break down their industries, and as they would import only raw materials for manufacturing purposes and food products for consumption a high tariff would add to the cost of productions and prevent them from competing in foreign markets, and so add to the cost of living that the degradation of labor would follow. Take the Eastern and Middle States from the Union and the South and West would prosper in time under protection, but it would be opposed possibly to their immediate present prosperity. But these States would remain at a "stand-still," their territory would ever be sparsely populated, and their cities would cease to grow unless they should create, foster, and protect home manufactures. They would make no progress whatever. To make themselves truly prosperous they would be driven to protection.

In the first case the Eastern and Middle States would be compelled to compete with foreign countries and sell abroad at as low figures as England. And in the second case, having nothing to protect, a protective tariff would exist only in name and could result in nothing, unless the people should engage in manufacturing, except that the people would be putting large sums in the Treasury from their earnings without any return. That is, they would heavily and unduly tax manufactured articles which they would import from foreign markets. Now New England and the Middle States are not compelled to go abroad to foreign nations for their market, for protection compels the American people to support American manufactures. The question is, is this compulsion justifiable and does it result in the general growth and prosperity of the whole country? In other words, are we justified in so legislating that we compel certain parts or classes of our people to pay more for articles manufactured at home than they could be purchased for in foreign markets? It has been said in substance by a fair and honorable member of this House [Mr. CARLISLE] that protection is spoliation; so it would be if the benefits received by those who really pay the cost of protection were not equal to or greater than the cost.

But if we find that the benefits conferred are greater than the burdens imposed, then it is not spoliation, for "an even exchange is no robbery." With the agriculturists the laborers and the workingmen, unless we give them a fair and equal return for their increased outlay for manufactured articles, our course is not defensible. To my mind this is a fair, plain, common-sense way of putting the question, and on its true answer must the Republican party stand or fall in the coming Presidential election. To those who advocate the doctrine of "State rights" and deny that we are a nation it seems plain that they should not be compelled by a protective tariff to pay for the prosperity of our manufacturing States; while to those who adhere to the doctrine that we are a nation, and that each part is to contribute to the general prosperity of the whole, it is equally plain that they should so pay, provided the protected States return value received to those who contribute. Men who look at burdens imposed and are blinded to benefits received are not in a condition to intelligently judge the situation.

Such is the status of the disciples of free trade. Teachers of free trade in the main are seeking political power, and it is their mission to plainly portray all the burdens while they studiously conceal the benefits of a protective tariff. Beautiful and attractive theories have been and can be built up to allure the unthinking and the unwary. These theories have been spread before this House and the country in their most attractive form, and it is sought to be impressed on our minds that as the result of a high tariff we have too much money in the Treasury, that the people are too heavily taxed, that the country is not prosperous, that labor is not well paid, that our people are growing poorer while corporations are swelling with ill-gotten gains. It is said that high tariffs foster monopolies and are inimical to labor.

It will be my pleasure to answer some of these illusory and delusive statements. But I first desire to call attention to the fact that the people of this country in a common-sense way have again and again answered the question at the ballot-box, and they are now ready and anxious to repeat the verdict of 1880. Aristotle said:

> The crowd makes better judgments than any individual whatsoever. It is in the main incorruptible. Like a large sheet of water, the multitude is less liable to sinister influences than the few, for when the individual is influenced by passion or any similar impulse his judgment must be distorted, while it is hard for all collectively to be led by passion or to err.

The people of this country look to practical results more than to fine-spun theories, and it will be difficult indeed to make them believe that high tariffs are detrimental to our prosperity when they see that with them the rate of interest paid by our Government has been reduced from 12 to 2½ and 3 per cent.; that our country has been carried safely through an intestine strife that cost us billions of dollars; that our debt has been reduced at a rate never before known in the history of the world; that a large area has been added to our territory; that magnificent public buildings have been erected; that large bounties and pensions have been paid to our soldiers, their widows and orphans; that magnificent railroad and other enterprises have been successfully carried on; that new States are constantly added to the Union; when they see our population increasing at a rate that staggers figures; our arts, sciences, and inventions making rapid strides and challenging the respect and admiration of the world, our farmers and mechanics prosperous and happy, and our labor better paid than in any country on the face of the earth, while our liberties remain intact and churches and schools multiply and spread abroad their beneficent influence. They see and realize withal that we have no slave labor, and that labor owns capital and keeps a bank account, owns farms and village lots, and bank, railroad, and mining stocks, and that the son of the poorest mechanic or farmer stands an equal chance with the millionaire to occupy the Senatorial, gubernatorial, and Presidential chairs. In the full enjoyment of all these blessings in præsenti, it will be hard indeed for any political party to induce the people to try dangerous experiments for the sake of imaginary benefits in futuro.

1. Do we protect American labor and home industry?
2. Do we give value received to the consumer who pays a higher price than he would if we did not impose high protective tariffs?
3. Do we degrade or do we exalt American labor?
4. Do we encourage and promote American inventive skill and do we develop American genius?
5. Do we add to the general wealth, intelligence, and prosperity of the people of this country?

First. When we remove the protective tariff—that is, the tariff that is added for the purpose of so increasing the cost of foreign manufactures as to keep them out of the American market or compel them to be sold here at a price at which we can produce at a profit—we necessarily compel our manufacturers to produce at a less price, and they must necessarily reduce the price paid laborers and reduce the price paid for material and machinery or else stop business, "shut up shop." If the price of labor is reduced the laborer must reduce the cost of living—that is, cut down all of his expenses. If he do this he must be able either to purchase food, clothing, and his little luxuries at a correspondingly low figure, or he must wear poorer clothing, eat poorer food, and enjoy less of the benefits of the schools, churches, and all the comforts of life. If we compel him to do the last, we degrade him; if the first, we necessarily compel our farmers to produce and sell their cotton, wool, corn, wheat, &c., at a less figure, and therefore they must be enabled to purchase lands and food and clothing at a less price. When all is done the free-trader says there has been a corresponding reduction all round and no harm is done.

Let us see. We have opened up foreign competition and flooded our country with foreign productions; we have opened a market where every dollar that is paid to the foreign producers is lost to home production and American labor, for when paid to foreign labor it is the richer and American labor the poorer. We have reduced the revenues of the Government, and our internal improvements, public buildings, river and harbor improvements, our pensions, &c., must stop. We have lost much and have gained nothing. But you say it will stimulate commerce, our carrying trade; that our products, our manufactures will go abroad and find a market. Not at all. Our products, as grain, &c., that foreign countries require now go abroad. Our superior manufactures now go abroad. Our equal or inferior manufactures will never cross the water to compete with the same thing abroad. Therefore we must make up our deficient revenue by a direct tax or else cut down the expenses and stop all improvements.

But there is another and a complete answer to all this. The world demands about so much of any article. Europe (especially England) has an excess of labor. When foreign countries export largely to this country at cheap prices we can no longer keep up our manufactures and employ our laborers in manufacturing, for their productions of like kind will no longer be consumed in the home market, and foreign markets will be overstocked by their own home productions. As a direct and necessary result our laborers and mechanics would be driven to agricultural pursuits, and there would be a large excess of agricultural products and the price thereof would be largely reduced for the benefit of the rich and the opulent; the farmer would be impoverished, and soon, as in England, the lands would pass to the hands of the wealthy and we should become a nation of tenant farmers. England now is, and since 1845 has been, a free-trade country. Her mechanics, laborers, and farmers are reduced to a condition of servility, poverty, squalor, and misery. That enterprise, skill, and genius which have been and are so characteristic of the American laborer do not exist in England. As a proof of what I say I desire to quote from Work and Wages, by Thorold Rogers, an advocate of free trade and an enemy of protective tariffs. He says:

> The mass of English workmen are far better off now than they were two generations ago, though population has greatly increased. But relatively speaking the workingman of to-day is not so well off as he was in the fifteenth century, when the population was not one-tenth of what it is now.

This is a confession that as a result of three hundred years of progress and advance in religion, civilization, and education, the condition of the English laborer has been degraded and impoverished. What a commentary on the condition of English labor, and what a warning to us not to listen to the sophistries of those free-traders who ape the English theorists. This confession is pointed when we find the same author giving the wages of an agricultural laborer in the thirteenth century (and it was relatively the same in the fifteenth) at £2 11*s.* 8*d.* per year, while he figures up the living expenses of that same laborer at £3 per year, allowing £2 7*s.* 9*d.* for the coarsest kind of food and 12*s.* 3*d.* for clothing, home-spun russet cloth, hempen or linen shirting, and one pair of rude boots worth 2*s.*

I have read in novels of the haggard, ever-hungry, hollow-eyed laborer of England who every night went to his hut or hovel to meet his careworn, anxious, overburdened wife, and his puny ill-fed children crying for bread, of which he had none to give; but I never expected to see even the shadowy portrait of the reality disfiguring the pages of an English author who advocates free trade for the United States. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that, having no market at home, the English people and their sympathisers here are using their best endeavors to induce us to impoverish our own labor for the benefit of the British Empire.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman why it is that England under the free-trade policy pays her laborers better than France or Germany with their protective tariffs?

Mr. RAY, of New York. The gentleman assumes something that is not true.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Will you answer it?

Mr. RAY, of New York. You might as well ask me why the moon was made of green cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I suppose I might.

Mr. RAY, of New York. You assume something that is not true, and therefore I can not tell you why. When you ask me why England under free trade pays her laborers better than France and Germany under protection, I say it is not true that she does, and therefore I can not give you any reason for a fact that does not exist. I assert here, and I assert the truth, that the French and German laborers are better paid to-day, better educated, and in a better situation morally, socially, and pecuniarily than the laboring men of England.

Why, sir, take even Belgium, with a larger population to the square mile than any other country in Europe, and compare it with England, and behold the condition and situation of the laboring men in the two countries. In England under free trade the land is owned by a few lords, who are turning hundreds and thousands of acres of soil which should be tilled for the production of food for a starving people into parks for the benefit and pleasure of her nobility, whereas when you go across to Belgium you will find, counting five to a family, that every family owns real estate and has a spot they can call home, and a little allotment of soil which, properly cultivated, keeps starvation from their doors. [Applause.]

As Rogers thus confesses that this English laborer thus paid, fed, and clothed was relatively better off than the English laborer of to-day, we may safely conclude that English free-trade labor is somewhat degraded and impoverished, and well may the American laborer hesitate to support that political party that would ingraft upon our system the theories which, put in practice in England, have thus impoverished and degraded labor. But we need not resort to this comparison of this free-trade author's confessions to prove that free trade or non-protective tariffs impoverish and degrade labor, for he proceeds to give us somewhat in detail the condition of the mechanics and artisans in the large cities of England. He says:

> The large cities and towns of England contain a vast population which lives, one hardly knows how, on mean and precarious wages, in dismal and unwholesome dens. Some of this poverty is merely miserable, some of it is vicious, some is criminal. * * * Now, among them is the greatest manufacturing town in the world. Naturally its inhabitants are engaged in an infinite variety of occupations.

Now, if any one supposes that the American laborer desires to be thrown into competition with this squalid pauper labor of England he mistakes the spirit of the workingman of this country. And if any one supposes that the farmers desire that such a condition of things should exist in our great cities they miscalculate. The producers of farm products, corn, wheat, butter, cheese, cotton, rice, sugar, &c., fully realize that the market for their products is not with the farmer, but with the mechanics and tradesmen and manufacturers in the towns and cities; that to enable these men to purchase they must find employment at remunerative wages, and that they may receive these wages they are willing to pay well for their products and keep them from resorting to the tillage of the soil to eke out a living. The farmers know that every worker in wood and iron and brass and every miner is a consumer of their productions, and that if they would have increased consumption they must have more consumers, not more producers.

Second. It will also be considered that a home market is better than the foreign, and that when we encourage and build up a factory, even on a vacant plain, a village immediately springs up around it. Men and women and children are employed; the merchant finds a market and a demand for his varied merchandise; horses and mules are in demand; mechanics find employment in building and in a variety of ways; the railroad is constructed to bring in the supply and take away the products. It becomes a busy mart of trade and commerce. The surrounding farms are doubled in value, as is their produce, and in place of desert fields we soon find fruitful orchards and productive gardens and ever busy markets. In every country on the earth and in every State in this Union the greater the manufacturing interests the greater the value of farming lands and of agricultural products. Taking the United States by counties or by States, singly or in groups, the figures demonstrate the truth of my statement. I select a few.

In Alabama, two counties produced in manufactures $2,785,685. She has in those counties 481,484 acres in farms, worth $3,152,779, or $6.55 per acre. The remaining sixty-four counties manufacture $10,779,819, or $168,434 each, have 18,373,850 acres in farms, worth $4.13 per acre. In Georgia seven manufacturing counties manufacture $19,331,604, have 995,971 acres of farming lands, worth $9,181,254, or $9.22 per acre. Her remaining one hundred and thirty counties manufacture $17,109,344, or $131,610 each, have 25,047,311 acres in farm lands, worth $102,729,286, or $4.10 per acre. In Louisiana her two manufacturing counties manufacture $20,456,396, have 49,075 acres in farm lands, worth $1,010,663, or $20.59 per acre. Her remaining fifty-six counties manufacture $3,748,787, or $66,942 each, have 8,224,431 acres of land in farms, worth $57,978,454, or $7.05 per acre.

The same thing is true in an equal or more marked degree in every State south of Mason and Dixon's line. But, says some one, this is no proof; the South never had any extended manufactures, and her soil is worn out and impoverished by slave labor. Then let us go to the West and the Pacific Slope. In Ohio twelve manufacturing counties manufacture $249,632,186; they have 3,388,305 acres of farm lands, worth $229,903,034, or $67.85 per acre. Her remaining seventy-six counties manufacture $98,666,204, or $1,298,239 each, have 21,140,921 acres of farm lands, worth $897,594,319, or $42.46 per acre. In Michigan six manufacturing counties manufacture $74,928,516, have 1,500,690 in farms, worth $60,373,468, or $40.23 per acre. Her remaining seventy-two counties manufacture $75,786,509, or $1,052,590 each, and have 12,306,550 acres in farm lands, worth $438,729,713, or $35.65 per acre. In Illinois ten manufacturing counties manufacture $340,527,740, and have 4,470,503 acres in farms, worth $196,518,392, or $43.96 per acre. Her remaining ninety-two counties manufacture $74,336,933, or $808,010 each, have 27,203,142 acres in farms, worth $813,076,188, or $29.89 cents per acre. In California six manufacturing counties manufacture $96,217,320, have 2,116,416 acres in farms, worth $76,972,137, or $36.37 per acre. Her remaining forty-six counties manufacture $20,001,653, or $434,817 each, and have 14,477,326 acres in farms, worth $185,079,145, or $12.78 per acre. And yet California has been pictured as the farmer's paradise.

The other Western and Pacific States show the same relative values. But we are told that these are comparatively new States, and that some sections are sparsely populated, and that improvements have not been made on the farms remote from villages. Let us turn to the Eastern and the Middle States. In Massachusetts her four manufacturing counties manufacture $453,360,766, have 1,292,876 acres of land in farms, worth $74,819,191, or $57.87 per acre. Her ten remaining counties manufacture $177,774,518, or $17,777,451 each, and have 2,066,203 acres in farms, worth $71,378,224, or $34.55 per acre. In Connecticut her three manufacturing counties manufacture $122,572,296, have 967,946 acres in farms, worth $69,537,859, or $71.84 per acre. Her remaining five counties manufacture $63,124,915, or $12,624,983 each, have 1,485,595 acres in farms, worth $51,525,951, or $34.68 per acre. In New Jersey her six manufacturing counties manufacture $208,670,151, have 368,675 acres of land in farms worth $35,562,438, or $96.46 per acre, and her remaining fifteen counties manufacture $45,710,085, or $3,047,338 each, and have 2,561,098 acres of land in farms worth $155,333,395, or $60.65 per acre. In New York the thirteen manufacturing counties manufacture $896,651,665, have 4,981,545 acres in farms worth $310,699,132, or $62.37 per acre. The remaining forty-seven counties manufacture $184,044,931, or $3,915,849 each, and have 18,799,209 acres in farms worth $745,477,609, or $39.65 per acre.

Now, sir, these figures plainly show that in States and counties where we have large manufacturing establishments the value of the farms are largely increased, and it is a notorious fact that in many of the counties in some of these States showing the highest value of farm lands the soil is naturally poor, rocky, and unproductive.

In Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and Connecticut manufactures have so stimulated and aided agriculture that farmers by tillage, care, and industry reap rich harvests and large profits from lands that in the West or South would lie waste. Now, sir, another important fact of great interest to the farmers must not be lost sight of in this connection. In those States where industry is most diversified, those having the largest and most productive manufactories, the annual income to each farmer is $457, while the States having small manufacturing industries yield to the farmer an income of only $160 per annum to each. Thus it appears that cheap lands are not most productive to the farmer, and if it be said that they require larger expense for tillage, that labor is higher priced, it is plain that the laborer shares in the blessings the manufacturing industries give to the agriculturists.

It is sometimes argued that a cheap farm involves a small interest account, and that therefore the cheap-farm State is to be preferred. But it can not be said that the purchase of a farm in such a locality is preferable for such a reason, when the figures show that the net income is $457 in the high-priced States, as against $160 in the others, saying nothing of the ready markets, the educational and other advantages that always abound in a manufacturing county or State, and all of which are scarce and difficult of access in the purely agricultural States or counties. The following table shows in four groups the value of the manufactures of each State, the land in farms, the value of farm lands, and in each State and in each group or class of States the average value of such farm lands per acre:

Now, sir, in the first of these groups of States, 18 per cent. of all workers are engaged in agriculture; in the second group, 42 per cent.; in the third group, 58 per cent.; and in the fourth group, 77 per cent.

Now, sir, look at the average annual income of each of these agricultural laborers in the respective groups. In the first group, which has the most manufactures, the average annual income to each is $457; in the second, standing next in value and extent of manufactures, the average annual income to each is $394; in the third, standing next in manufacturing industries, the average annual income to each is $261; and in the fourth group, standing out distinctively as agricultural, and where the land is richest and natural agricultural advantages greatest, but manufactures are rarest, the average annual income to each agricultural laborer is but $160.

Now, sir, taking the same groups of States, we find the average rate of wages to farm laborers in the first group to be, per month, $24.14; second group to be, per month, $23.51; third group to be, per month, $19.51; fourth group to be, per month, $13.67. We also find, and the facts and figures demonstrate, that, living in the same style, the cost of food and clothing and farm implements and household furniture is greatest where farms and labor are cheapest and agriculturists most numerous. It will not be forgotten that in these figures I include not only hired farm laborers, but the farmers themselves. And what adds to the strength of my argument is the important fact that in the agricultural States the roads are poorest, cities and villages remote, and railroad facilities wanting. Therefore the surplus products of the farmer are carted to far-away markets at great cost and delay, and even there they find slow and low markets.

If we look to the question of illiteracy we shall find, not that the workers in factories are the best educated, for a large element of foreign population is drawn to them, but that, taking the States as a whole, the people of the States with the diversified industries are the better educated, and that the fourth class or group of States named contains the great mass of the illiterate of the United States, excluding the colored population. If we look to railroads we find in the first group 18,781 miles; in the second, 31,980 miles; in the third, 16,339 miles; and, in the fourth, 45,312 miles; showing that in proportion to area the manufacturing States largely, very largely, excel in the length and number of their railroad lines, and which, it is conceded, in safety, convenience, and equipment, are greatly superior. They contain nearly all the canals and set afloat most of the river and coast commerce. These figures show, as affecting the interests of the farmers and agricultural laborers, that the presence of large manufacturing interests have the following effects:

First. They largely increase the value of farms and of farm products.

Second. They prevent undue competition among farm laborers.

Third. They largely increase the incomes of the farmers and the wages of the farm laborers.

Fourth. They lessen the cost of clothing, of farm implements, and of household goods.

Fifth. They build up railroad lines, facilitate intercourse, make home markets for farm products, and render distant markets of easy access.

Lastly. The manufacturing States foster the schools, contain the great majority of colleges and academies, and extend education. They also contain more churches in proportion to the population. Let us group these States so as to show the labor engaged in manufactures and the wages paid them per annum:

From these figures we are enabled to see at a glance why it is that the farmer and the farm laborer are better paid and far more prosperous in the manufacturing than in the agricultural States, why it is that farming lands are more valuable, even when less productive and of a poorer quality.

In the first group the farmer is called upon to feed in a home market, 1,585,309 artisans, who receive on the average, including women and children, $363 annually.

In the second group they feed 594,755, who receive on the average $337 annually.

In the third group they feed 150,492, who receive on the average $386 annually.

In the fourth group they feed only 390,675, who receive on the average $272 annually.

It is also worthy of mention that large cities and villages always contain a large population of wealthy persons who live on the interest of their money, doing nothing, producing nothing, but consuming more than any other class. There also the merchants, professional men, and other consuming classes congregate.

Now, sir, I desire, as briefly as I may, to compare the condition of the American agriculturists, farmers, and farm laborers with those of England. The following table shows the total of the people in England employed in labor in the various occupations. In 1881 the population of England (including Wales) was 25,974,439; total workers in all classes of employment, 11,187,564. The table shows the years 1861, 1871, and 1881.

Table showing total number employed in labor in England.

Classes.	1881.	Per cent. of all.	1871.	Per cent. of all.	1861.	Per cent. of all.	Rate of increase— In 10 years.	Rate of increase— In 20 years.
Professional	647,075	5.8	547,362	5.2	481,957	5.0	18.2	34.2
Domestic	1,803,810	16.1	1,633,514	15.4	1,367,782	14.2	10.4	31.9

a Decrease.

It appears, therefore, that 1,383,184 of her people are engaged in agriculture (1881). In 1861, 2,010,454 were employed in agriculture, showing a decrease of 31.2 per cent. in twenty years. Why this large, in fact immense, decrease in such a country as England, enjoying during the whole period the full fruition of absolute free trade, if free trade would benefit the agricultural classes? She can not begin to supply her home consumption, and imports largely. In 1881 she imported 12,633,555,300 pounds of flour and grain. Her principal imports of food for consumption in 1881 were—

Corn and flour	$293,329,621 76
Sugar	110,353,104 70
Tea	55,976,578 36
Bacon and hams (pounds)	462,748,400 00
Eggs (number)	756,719,160 00
Fish (pounds)	153,021,900 00
Butter, &c., (pounds)	216,971,700 00
Beef (pounds)	106,859,900 00
Preserved meat (pounds)	56,053,100 00
Sheep and lambs (number)	1,124,391 00

Therefore we should expect her to increase her agricultural workers and bend every energy to home production for home consumption. Her area (England and Wales) is 58,186 square miles or 37,239,351 acres.

But we find that the farmers are decreasing year by year. In 1882 162,992 Englishmen left their homes, mostly for the United States. Of her territory, excluding bog, mountain, and water land, she has 26,202,230 acres of agricultural lands, devoted to—

	Acres.
Corn crops	6,919,320
Green crops	2,664,522
Clover and grass	2,546,272
Flax	5,097
Hops	65,619
Bare fallow, &c	734,534
Woods	1,466,038
Permanent pasture	11,800,728

And while her people are suffering for the necessaries of life, she is constantly increasing what is returned as pasture land, but what is in fact turned into vast pleasure and hunting grounds for the nobility.

In England and Wales, out of a population of 25,974,439 (London suggestively excluded, for there the proportion is more than quadrupled), only 972,836 persons own real estate, and of these 703,289 (72.3 per cent.) own less than an acre each, and only about one in every twenty owns any land whatever. Of the 269,547 who own above an acre, but few, very few, own more than two to five acres, and these parcels are not held by farmers, but by gentlemen and professional men. The lands are owned in large tracts by the lords, who lease them in small parcels to such as can manage to pay, at enormous rents, $15 and upward per acre.

The farmer who rents a farm of one hundred acres pays $1,500 rent for it, and as in prices they are compelled to compete with corn, wheat, rye, oats, potatoes, &c., imported duty free from India, Australia, Russia, and the United States for the benefit of the manufacturing and the non-laboring classes, we see at once that no farmer can live and pay the high rent. England is compelled to import food for home consumption at cheap prices, else the industrial classes must receive higher wages. As increased wages would add to the cost of her manufactures, she could no longer compete with France, Belgium, Germany, and the United States, who under protection not only protect manufacturers but agriculture.

By three centuries of protection England built up the greatest manufacturing system in the world, and now, when 87.6 per cent. of her entire population is engaged in non-agricultural employments, and with her land held by a few owners who charge therefor exorbitant rents, she has left the farmer and the farm laborer to his fate, reduced as he is to that hopeless condition described by Rogers:

> An artisan may rise to be a master, a mechanic to be an engineer, a factory operative to be a capitalist. But no English agricultural laborer, in his most sanguine dreams, has the vista of occupying, still less of possessing, land. He can not rise in his calling. He can not cherish any ambition, and he is in consequence dull and brutish, reckless and supine. We owe the fact that the great English nation is tenant-at-will to a few thousand land-owners to that device of evil times, a strict settlement. * * * It may be that the mischief which this practice has induced is too widespread for remedial measures. But no Englishman who has the courage to forecast the destinies of his country can doubt that its greatest danger lies in the present alienation of its people from the soil and in the future exodus of a disinherited peasantry. This condition is the result of her forty years of free trade.

Another result of this policy is that the professional, industrial, and non-laboring classes purchase provisions of all kinds at prices measured by the foreign supply, and not by home production or home demand.

The following table shows the area of France, Germany, and England, respectively, with their population and the number in each country engaged in agriculture:

Country.	Area.	Population.	Engaged in agriculture.
France	204,177	37,672,048	18,249,202
Germany	212,083	45,234,061	18,838,583
England	58,186	25,974,439	1,383,184

France, which is self-supporting in agricultural productions, maintains an equilibrium between manufactures (which she protects by a tariff) and agriculture. She has less than four times the acres, something more than a third more population, one-half of which is engaged in agriculture, eighty-nine to the square mile. Germany employs two-fifths of her entire people in agriculture, or eighty-eight to the square mile, having a little larger area and quite a little larger population than France.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman again. I asked the gentleman a direct question, and he answered me I might as well ask why the moon was made of green cheese. In order that he may understand hereafter what is the difference of wages in England, Germany, and France——

Mr. RAY, of New York. Now, let the gentleman quiet his nerves. I will simply say——

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Permit me.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I have given the subject most careful study, and I have figures prepared with great care.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. So have I, and here they are.

Mr. RAY, of New York. If the gentleman will take the trouble to read my remarks in the RECORD he will be enlightened, and never again in a public place ask so foolish a question as why it is the laborers of England are better paid than the laborers of France and Germany. [Laughter and applause.] You start on a wrong basis; you are, no doubt, honest in your impressions, but you are wrong in your facts and wrong in your conclusions. [Applause.]

The gentleman makes no distinction between better-paid labor and a higher price paid in money for the same labor. That labor receives the highest price which for the same service receives the most money. That labor is the better paid which with the price received is able to procure the most food, the most clothing, the most shelter, the most education, the most liberty, and the most happiness. It is quite true as a rule that England pays a higher price in money for the same labor than France or Germany, but it is not true that her labor is better paid, for with a day's wages the German and Frenchman can purchase nearly double the necessaries of a happy existence the Englishman can with the same money.

Even little Belgium, with an area of 11,373 square miles, a population of 5,520,009, the most densely populated country of Europe, 485 to the square mile, employs half of her population in productive labor, and engages 800,000, or 70 to the square mile, in agricultural productions. Her lands are owned by 1,181,177 freehold proprietors, an increase of 266,240, or 29 per cent., in thirty-four years. Allowing five persons to a family, every family owns land. The result is that with this dense population on a small territory, with one-seventh in woodland, she imports $69,900,000 worth of food, and exports $25,708,000 worth, showing that within $8 for each individul she is self-feeding. Her exports embrace the products of thirteen large and several small industries. As in all Catholic countries, there is a large per cent. of illiteracy, but with this diversity of industries her people are intelligent, industrious, prosperous, and happy.

I have no time to picture the condition of the people of Russia and Turkey, where industrial pursuits are not encouraged nor developed, but suffice it to say it is most deplorable.

England, with an area of 58,186 square miles, more than one-fourth that of France or of Germany, and with a much denser population, requiring a much greater effort for agricultural products, employs but one-twentieth of her people in agriculture, or twenty-three to the square mile. When we consider the low, debased, plodding, hopeless condition of her farming community as depicted by her own writers, can we have a more forcible argument that a protective tariff protects not only industries but the farm laborers? The true rule for every country is to so foster and protect a diversity of interests that importations shall consist only of those articles which in the nature of things can not be produced at home. The true lines of imports and exports run north and south, not east and west. The United States may well go south for her tropical productions, but upon herself she can safely depend for all other products essential to the prosperity and happiness of man or of nations.

Now let us compare American and British wages, selecting from all grades:

Occupations.	England.	United States.
FARM LABOR.
Laborers, per month	$13 60 to $17 00	$16 00 to $28 00
COTTON INDUSTRIES.
Men, per week:
Strippers	5 40	6 21
Grinders	5 16	8 42
Overlookers	9 24 to 12 00	17 80
Mule-spinners	7 20 to 8 40	10 09
Engine-drivers	5 04 to 12 00	17 75
Firemen and laborers	3 84 to 5 04	8 33
Women, per week:
Throstle-spinners	3 61	4 38
WOOLEN INDUSTRIES.
Men, per week:
Wool-sorters	5 76 to 6 24	9 43
Scourers	5 28 to 5 76	8 84
Dyers	5 28	7 81
Pattern-weavers	6 00 to 7 20	8 53
Weavers	6 00 to 6 25	7 45
Mechanics	6 48 to 8 40	13 43
Laborers	4 80	8 53
Women, per week:
Burlers	2 64	5 13
IRON INDUSTRIES.
Men, per week:
Pattern-makers	7 92	18 10
Iron-molders	8 40	16 10
Brass molders	8 40	15 75
Smiths	8 16	15 75
Strikers	5 04	8 64
Fitters	7 68	12 82
Stokers	6 12	8 89
Bricklayers	7 20	16 50
Laborers	4 32	8 11

Schoenoff (advocate of free trade) himself says:

In the iron industries American wages average fully 75 per cent. more than English wages.

BOOT AND SHOE INDUSTRIES.

Occupations.	England.	United States.
Sewing-machinists, men	$7 20	$15 40
Sewing-machinists, women	3 80	7 81
Cutters	5 04	14 91
Clickers	6 48	14 91
Riveters	6 00	11 31
Machine operatives	6 72	11 31
Finishers	7 20	12 18

Now, turning our attention to the cost of living in the two countries we find that in the matter of clothing there is not over 10 per cent. in favor of the consumer of the lower grades, such as the farmers and laboring men are compelled to and do wear. We place the good, substantial clothing in the market as cheaply as does England.

When we look to the cost of provisions, the necessaries of life, we find that the American can live better and cheaper with the same money.

Cost of articles.	England.	United States.
Fresh beef, per pound	$0 22	$0 12 to $0 16
Corned beef, per pound	$0 18 to 20	8 to 12
Beans, per quart	9	7 to 10
Bread, per pound	3½ to 4½	4 to 4½
Butter, per pound	29 to 38	25 to 32
Codfish, per pound	6 to 8	6 to 7
Coffee, per pound	28 to 50	20 to 30
Eggs, per dozen	14 to 30	15 to 30
Flour, per pound	3½ to 4½	3 to 4
Lard, per pound	12 to 18	10 to 12
Milk, per quart	5 to 9	8 to 10
Mutton, per pound	16 to 17	9 to 10
Oatmeal, per pound	3½ to 4½	4 to 5
Pork, fresh, per pound	10 to 16	8 to 10
Pork, salted, per pound	10 to 16	8 to 10
Pork, bacon, per pound	12 to 16	8 to 10
Pork, sausage, per pound	18	8 to 10
Potatoes, per bushel	68 to 2 00	75 to 1 50
Rice, per pound	3½ to 8	8 to 10
Soap, per pound	5½ to 10	6 to 7
Sugar, per pound	5½ to 10	8 to 10
Tea, per pound	40 to 88	50 to 60

It will be seen that beef, both fresh and corned, butter, coffee, flour, lard, mutton, pork in all shapes, and sausage cost much more in England than in the United States; while bread, codfish, potatoes, sugar, and tea cost about the same. Meat of all kinds and coffee are luxuries only enjoyed by the English workingmen in their most sanguine dreams. Figure for yourself the cost of supporting an English workingman's family, adding the cost of coal and his exorbitant house-rent, and compare it with the wages received, and you readily see that the best paid live upon starvation wages, and you see that illiteracy, not education, is compulsory in England. And when you see, as hereafter demonstrated, that even England can not compete with the United States in the finer grade of manufactures, you readily perceive that well-paid, intelligent, skilled labor is what adds most to a nation's wealth and prosperity. In England when her people become too old to longer work their home is the almshouse.

Schoenoff, while advocating free trade for the United States, is compelled to admit that our cotton operatives receive upward of 15 per cent. more wages than the English; our woolen operatives 30 per cent. more; that wages in the iron industries are fully 75 per cent. higher, and that in the boot and shoe factories our laborers receive double the English wages. This author further says:

Undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer time of labor.

The longer time of labor at the longest is four hours in a week, but as a rule no longer, and we quite agree that there is much "greater efficiency" with the American operative. In truth, such is the "greater efficiency" of American labor that (as that author confesses) "Wamsutta 4-4 muslin is retailed in London at 6*d*., and has no equal in English brands of like superior quality and price. British manufacturers are not a little exercised at this. Wamsutta (American) muslin is now a well-established brand in the English home market." He also admits—

American goods, stoves, ranges, hardware of all kinds, tools, machine-needles, machinery of all sorts find a ready sale in Germany over and above all the transportation charges and the tariff rates which Germany feels compelled to exact so as to protect her cheap labor against American high-cost labor, with its graceful, solid, and at the same time low-priced productions of superior value and finish. German makers are imitating American stamps on their own fabrics—close imitations of ours, but of inferior quality—so as to palm them off for American goods, the best certificate they can give of American skill and genius. Our exports in these higher branches are equaling those of Germany and France, although the materials of which they are composed are subjected to tariff rates ranging from 45 to 75 per cent.

And I shall show further on that we supply England with agricultural implements and clocks.

The same author says:

It is not by reducing wages that America is making her conquests, but by her superior organization, greater efficiency of labor, consequent upon the higher standard of living ruling in the country. High-priced labor means better food and better living, and these supply the American workman with that energy and nerve power for which he is so justly celebrated. High-priced labor countries are everywhere beating "pauper-labor" countries.

All this but proves what I have already asserted, that a protective tariff has elevated and educated our labor, and given it that very "nerve power" and superiority both in muscle and brain for which it is so justly celebrated. Then, sir, as this bill seeks to remove none of the inequalities of the present tariff, but simply by a horizontal reduction takes away all protection for home industry and American labor and seeks to let in a flood of foreign productions, let us justly stamp and denounce it as a bill to degrade and impoverish American labor and ruin home industries, for it will have no other effect.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Will you permit me to read a single paragraph for you on this subject from Schoenhoff?

Mr. RAY, of New York. I will permit you to read a sentence, but not for me. You can read it for your own enlightenment.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I think the gentleman himself wants enlightenment on this subject.

Mr. RAY, of New York. I think from the question of the gentleman that he himself needs enlightenment.

I am thoroughly satisfied that if the gentlemen upon the other side of the House who are constantly advocating a policy of free trade, which is nothing more nor less than a policy opposed to the interest of every American citizen and every American toiler and advocated in the direct interest of England, would investigate the facts and inform themselves of the real conditions of labor they would, before this discussion closes, abandon their free-trade theory and idea.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. You deny me the right to read the sentence?

Mr. RAY, of New York. And I would like to ask the gentleman if the laborers of England are so much better off, why it is that in the last twenty years the agricultural laborers and farmers of England and Wales have lessened in number 31 per cent.? That is true. And where have they gone? Nearly 90 per cent. of these men who have abandoned the farms, who were tilling the soil in England and Wales under a free-trade policy, have come to the United States, and here under our protective policy, under our protection to American labor, which welcomes every true immigrant who comes to make a permanent home and enjoy the blessings of our institutions, they have found prosperity and plenty. They have found that in a few years they can own a little cottage and a little garden or a little farm, and bid defiance to all the world; because within the safety of this cottage, and within the bounds of this little spot of earth which they call their own and claim as their heritage, they are protected not only in person and property but in their industry and their labor. [Applause.]

Go with me from Boston to Providence, down to Hartford, on to New York, over to Philadelphia, up the Hudson, on to Utica, down to Binghamton, and wander over the rough mountains of Pennsylvania. Visit the cities of Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Cleveland, Minneapolis, Saint Louis, the mines of Colorado, the Pacific slope, and mark the growth and development of the last twenty years; go to the West, and even to some of the valleys and hill-sides of the sunny South, and watch the growth of small towns that as by magic become great cities, and then tell me whether or not a protective tariff builds up American industries and benefits labor and adds to the value of farms, and tell me whether or not these large manufactories pay back to the farmers every dollar paid for increased cost of manufactures with 100 per cent. interest.

The South raises her own cotton and can dig from her mountains her own iron; she can raise her own food from a prolific soil; she has the labor and can educate skilled mechanics. If she will avail herself of the benefits of protection and remember that the North is her twin brother and true friend, and that Europe cares nothing for her prosperity but only for her cotton and would pay only in her own products and not in cash were it not for protection, in a little time her population will double, her wealth multiply ten, ay, a hundred-fold; the iron horse will travel every valley and clamber up every hill-side, the hum of busy factories will be heard on every stream, and she will be the garden and factory of the world. Her soil and climate and mineral resources are all that can be asked. If she "will but use the means that the God of Nature hath placed within her power" all these things are not only possible but inevitable. No man has a right to contrast the present condition of the South with that of the North and intimate that her condition is in any way the result of high tariffs.

Successful manufactures depend on free, skilled, educated labor. This is the kind of labor that develops mechanical and inventive genius. Intelligence is ever seeking to relieve the hardships of manual labor. Ignorance is ever willing to plod on in the old ways with the old tools and with the old results. The present condition of the South is owing to her slave labor prior to the war and the ignorance of her labor since. But she is beginning to see better days; the sun of her prosperity is rising, and the year 1900, if you will protect and encourage manufactures, will see her in the forefront of the manufacturing world. She has the natural advantages; let her improve them and the future is her own. But I am told that such results are impossible, for the reason that the South and West must necessarily remain agricultural in their pursuits, else manufactures would be overcrowded.

So New York remains largely agricultural, and yet she is the greatest manufacturing State in the Union. The true rule is to properly divide and apportion the industries. Population is rapidly increasing, and with it the demand for manufactures. For this increase let factories be erected in new localities. Equalize and diversify industries and you equalize labor and do away with the evils of a dense population, while you bring new colonies to the sparsely settled country. Instead of sending our cotton to Europe to be manufactured let us do the work at home, and if the fabric is not wanted here, then sell it abroad and bring back the cash, or such necessaries and luxuries as in the nature of things we can not produce at home. Wealth is the product of labor. The tree grows; the iron and lead and gold and silver and coal lie buried in the earth as raw material. Labor brings it forth for the use of man, and the moment the hand of labor touches these things they cease to be raw material.

True they may go on from process to process, the hand of labor giving them new forms and shapes and uses, but it is labor at every step that adds to the beauty, the usefulness, the value. Then away with the thought of placing on the free-list any material in any shape or form that American labor can produce with profit from our forests, our soil, or our mountain caverns. Whenever you import a single article in any form that has been touched by the hand of man (if it be one we can produce at home), you are paying money to foreign labor that should go to foster and encourage home industry. Be it a ton of coal, an ounce of lead, a pound of iron, or whatever it be in form and name, the foreign article of the same quality should cost more in our markets than the same thing can be placed by its side for here if American industry can produce the article at a profit.

This is protection to the poorest laborer, and it is what lifts him above the starved and groveling wreck that pines in the mud hovel of England and Germany. I would protect the lowest as well as the highest class of laborers, and I would effect my purpose in this way. As long as laboring men hold the ballot they should hold it intelligently and so use it as to protect their industry, thereby protecting themselves. They can do this in no other way than by keeping out of our markets the product of foreign labor. Every dollar paid to American instead of foreign labor is added to the nation's wealth. And every dollar (save that paid as interest on the public debt held abroad) paid in duties by the importer, while it comes next from the consumer, goes next to the American laborer or else is added to our wealth. It remains in the United States and swells the aggregate of our nation's wealth instead of filling the coffers of the Old World. By this protective policy in the articles of agricultural implements alone we have not only supplied our home market but we have sold abroad during the year ending June 30, 1883, $3,883,919, namely:

Articles.	Number.	Value.
Fanning-mills	140	$2,499
Horse-powers	136	36,651
Mowers and reapers	13,798	1,492,926
Plows and cultivators	39,627	374,477
All others		1,977,366
Total		3,883,919

Now, this exportation is not due to the fact that we can manufacture these articles cheaper than it can be done abroad, but to the fact that we make a better article. It is because our mechanical labor is the more skilled, the better educated. American labor has been protected and inventive skill developed. Foreign manufacturers have imitated, but they can not equal in quality, and therefore they can not compete. The skilled mechanic and the great inventors do not sit in a palace but swing the hammer in the workshop. This inventive genius has also been developed to that degree that our machinery is superior to that of any country, and greater speed and greater productiveness is assured in many of our mills and factories. We also exported during the same fiscal year:

Articles.	Number.	Value.
Steam-engines, locomotives	219	$2,219,081
Steam-engines, stationary	136	191,208
Boilers for steam-engines		226,977
Machinery (not elsewhere specified)		6,223,029
Total		8,860,295

These facts show that our mechanical labor has been so educated under protection that we not only compete successfully with but outsell England in the better classes of machinery. Of these mowers and reapers exported we sent to different countries as follows:

Countries.	Number.	Value.
England	3,797	$339,181
Scotland	125	11,400
British possessions in America	1,688	231,370
British possessions in Australasia	2,105	242,081
Total in England and her colonies	7,715	824,032
France	2,547	197,836
Germany	1,043	97,761

The balance was sent to other countries.

During the same time we exported in clocks and parts of clocks $1,316,086, of which we sent to England and her colonies $861,861.

Agricultural products exported during the year ended June 30, 1883.

Animals, living	$10,789,268
Provisions (not including bread or breadstuffs)	107,388,287
Rice	8,679
Bread and breadstuffs	208,040,850
Cotton manufactured	247,328,721
Fruits	3,005,942
Hay	261,614
Hides and skins	1,220,158
Hops	5,616,370
Lard oil	353,184
Neat's-foot oil	64,405
Cotton-seed oil	216,779
Seeds	4,420,413
Sugar, molasses, &c	3,415,538

Sir, these lists of exports demonstrate that we have the most diversified industries of any nation of ancient or modern times. This fact is the sure indication of our national wealth, intelligence, and enterprise. Our people are able to cope with every adversity, supply every necessity, and meet and overcome every exigency. Grand in our accomplishments, we are formidable in our self-reliance and innate power. [Applause.]

Now, sir, nations must have revenues from some source, and the United States, for the payment of the interest on the public debt, the large pension-list, constantly increasing, and the other expenses of the Government, requires very large revenues. The questions that interest the people are: first, are we deriving our revenues from the proper source; second, are our revenue and tariff laws so adjusted as to bear lightly on the people while industry and labor are protected; and third, is there unjust and unnecessary taxation?

I am willing to confess that I am not one of those who profess to believe that a large public debt is a national blessing. I am in favor of applying every dollar of surplus in the Treasury to the payment of the public debt. At the same time I am a friend to our national banking system. It is the best the world has ever seen. But I think that when our bonds are paid the banks can furnish other security to the Government for a bank circulation. I am quite sure that when capitalists can no longer put their money in Government bonds they will seek and find other paying investments in developing and sustaining industries that will benefit and improve the people. Sir, I would not reduce the public debt too fast, nor by taxation that is oppressive to the people; neither would I perpetuate it in the interest of national banks or capitalists.

The tax on distilled spirits should never be reduced, except on alcohol, &c., for mechanical and medicinal purposes, and for uses in the arts and sciences. The time may come when the tax on tobacco can be removed, and I am not prepared to say that cheap tobacco for laboring men is not a necessary luxury. We have placed tea and coffee on the free-list, while England imposes on them a heavy tax, depriving all classes of her laborers of these healthful beverages and driving them to the use of beer and porter in their place and thus planting the seeds of drunkenness and pauperism. We have also put anthracite coal on the free-list. Whatever internal taxes we impose for the support of the General Government are levied in such a way that they are paid indirectly by the consumer. It is now entirely optional with the American citizen (except the consumer of alcohol for mechanical and medicinal purposes) whether or not he will pay a single penny of internal tax. Let him abandon the use of tobacco and whisky and he will rid himself of this self-imposed tax. I would largely reduce the duty on sugar and many other articles, and many more I would place on the free-list. Raw silk, which we can not produce to advantage, is on the free-list, and the American silk industries are making rapid progress. By a heavy duty on manufactured silk we have built up that industry at home, so that, excluding China and Japan, there are but two countries whose silk manufactures exceed our own, namely, France and Germany.

In Germany and France what are commonly called raw materials are on the free-list, but we can not see that it benefits their industries or their people. England is exhibited as the paradise of the non-protectionist. We have already seen the condition of her people. France and Germany do not protect manufactures as we do; yet their people are far better off than the English. It will pay us to stop a moment and inquire how England, France, and Germany support their governments. England levies a duty on tea and coffee and many other things, amounting to $95,000,000 annually; excise tax, $135,000,000; stamp tax, $60,000,000; land tax, $5,000,000; house duty, $8,500,000; income tax, &c., $50,000,000; post-office and telegraph, $5,100,000; crown lands, interest, &c., $8,500,000; miscellaneous, $20,000,000.

Now, sir, what would the people of this country say to the restoration of the old war stamp tax and income tax? And how would they relish the payment of a second land and house tax for the support of the General Government? They bore the annual visit of the deputy internal-revenue collector requiring sworn returns of their receipts and expenditures and they paid the stamp tax because they were patriotic and desired that the war should be successfully prosecuted, and for no other reason. In my judgment the intelligence of this people will repudiate your proposed return to this English system, where the notes, checks, drafts, deeds, and wills are taxed and stamped, and the land is doubly taxed, once for local and again for general purposes. Germany has the customs duties, excise and stamp tax, post-office, telegraph, and railroad revenues, a contribution by the states, and extraordinary taxes. France has all but the railroad, extraordinary, and house duty. The United States has customs, excise, post-office revenue, proceeds of public-land sales, and a bank tax. Our excise duties are certainly just and equitable; the postal charges are light and gladly borne, and will be further reduced, even to the extent of carrying newspapers free; the public lands are not a burden upon but a blessing to the people; and the tax on the national banks is not a burden.

The free-list can be extended and many of the customs duties reduced in the interest of the people. These reductions the Republican party is ready, willing, and anxious to make. But we are met on the very threshold of tariff reform by our free-trade Democratic non-protectionist reformers with a cry, not for a reduction of taxes in the interest of the people of this country, but for a reduction in the interest of England, the pauper labor of Europe, and for the abolition of all protective duties, which are denounced as "the rotten remnants" of a spoliation system. Thus with a false alarm and under false pretenses is the majority of this House disturbing the business interests of this country. From every section of this land comes an appeal from every protected interest—and every true interest of this people is protected—asking that the tariff be let alone. And the people raise this cry not because the majority of this House proposes necessary good, but because it proposes unnecessary evil.

Now, sir, I would remove every unnecessary tax, but I would protect every manufacturing and agricultural industry. We place a protective duty on the products of every section for the common good of all. We protect the lumbering interests, while we place on the free-list all timber not the product of our native woods; yet it is becoming a serious question whether we shall not invite the importation of lumber as a protection to the American forests. On the whole, I am of the opinion that the remedy is in tree-planting. Our free-trade brethren cry "spoliation," and we prove that there is no spoliation, but great benefits. They cry out that the duty is added to the cost and paid by the consumer, and that it is wrung from the unwilling by force of law, and that the consumer pays to the manufacturer and his employés this greater price for their enrichment. They appeal to the farmer for his vote as one of the despoiled. But if this theory be true let us see what the protective system does for the farmer and how he is enriched in turn at the expense of the consumer of his product.

The following table shows the protection given to the farmers on twelve articles or products:

Table showing the increased price received by the farmers of the United States in their products by reason of the protective duty thereon.

[a] Increased price received by the farmer on that exported.
[b] Ton.
[c] Figured on product not consumed by the producer.
[d] Average.

As the duty imposed on these articles when imported (and all are imported now) adds so much to the cost, we may safely assume that the duty enables the farmer to realize that much more for every pound or bushel he sells both for exportation and home consumption, and we see, taking up the argument of the free-trader, that the farmer is enriched $39,241,557 on these products exported and $160,000,000 (estimated) on the quantity sold in the home markets, for he is not compelled to compete at home with barley, corn, oats, rye, wheat, hops, &c., imported from Canada, India, and Russia duty free. In the article of hops alone, taking the free-trader's argument for the farmer and against the manufacturer, we find that the American farmer is protected $1,730,314, and in my own district they are benefited $334,516 by the duty on hops. How much fallacy there may be in the argument I am not to point out, but there is none if our "horizontal reductionists" are correct in their theories, and certainly as to all articles where other countries would otherwise flood our markets there is no fallacy whatever.

Sir, I heard a gentleman say the other day in this debate that "from 1850 to 1860 our national wealth increased at 12.60 per cent. per annum" and that "from 1860 to 1880 our national wealth increased at 6.30 per cent. per annum." He would have us infer that high tariffs are inimical to national prosperity, as the tariff of the first-named period was a part of the time but semi-protective, if of itself protective at all, while after 1857 it was far below protection. As I have stated, up to 1856 it was made protective by famine and short crops, war, and general distress in Europe.

Sir, does the gentleman remember that in 1860 the securities of this country were sold at a discount of from 6 to 12 per cent. in the money markets of Europe? Has he forgotten that we were then borrowing money to defray the current expenses of the Government? Does he not know that we now have a large surplus in the Treasury, and revenues above all expenses, including pensions and the interest on the public debt, and that our securities, bearing a low rate of interest, are selling in the markets of Europe at a premium ranging from 3 to 23 per cent.? Is it possible he does not know that in 1860 the farm laborer was receiving but $9 to $13 per month, while now he is receiving from $18 to $26 per month? Does he not remember that then we had millions of slaves who were counted as part of the nation's wealth, and that every birth of a slave child was counted as an addition of $50 to $100 to the nation's wealth? Does he not remember that in 1861 was commenced that terrible struggle of suffering and tears and blood which was inaugurated to perpetuate slave labor, State rights, and free trade?

Is it possible that it has escaped his attention that for the four succeeding years we destroyed billions of property annually and sent 5,000,000 wealth-producers to the battle-field, where they turned wealthdestroyers, about 300,000 of whom never returned to the fields of labor? Why does he include in his figures those years of destruction, when property was turned to powder and burned to smoke; turned into war-vessels and sunk beneath the waves; turned into cannon and musket balls and scattered to the winds through the quivering flesh of humanity and sunk in a sea of blood and tears; when more wealth was destroyed in four years than we had produced in the preceding ten or could produce in the ten succeeding? Why does he not tell us that in 1863 the emancipation proclamation struck out of existence forever, as property, millions of slaves, so that they and their descendants shall sing forever of the days of a protective Government supported by a protective tariff? [Applause.] Sir, I would conceal nothing, and I would but speak the whole truth.

Sir, if the gentleman had been more exact he would have stated that from 1850 to 1860 our national wealth increased at 8.5 per cent. per annum, excluding slaves, and that since 1860, including the cost of war, it has increased at 15 per cent. per annum. During the past twenty years we have recovered from the paralysis produced by war; our debased currency has been redeemed dollar for dollar and without hardship upon the people; the nation's wealth has been restored and increased at a rate the most sanguine never dreamed of. The tariff has been once readjusted and reduced, and all burdensome internal taxes removed.

Sir, great stress has been laid upon the fact that the British Empire is the greatest ship-owning nation on the face of the earth. How can she be otherwise? Her shipping is as essential to her existence and prosperity as the great river and railroad lines of the United States are to ours. About one-sixth of the entire human race, scattered over about one-sixth of the globe, is under British rule. In Europe she has the colonies of Gibraltar and Malta; in Asia, thousands of miles over the oceans, Hindostan, Burmah, Ceylon, Hong-Kong, Cyprus, Aden, Singapore; in Africa, also thousands of miles across the sea, Cape Colony, Sierra Leone, Gold Coast, Natal, St. Helena, Mauritius; in America, three thousand miles over the water, Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, British Honduras, Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados, the Bahamas, the Bermudas, British Guiana, Falkland Islands; in Oceanica, half way around the globe, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand. Taking this territory as one whole, and allowing her the intervening oceans, her merchant marine is simply the means of her internal communication and absolutely essential to her interstate commerce, so to speak.

If, like the United States, the British Empire were one solid area of territory, her shipping would dwindle to one-tenth its present volume because no longer necessary. As her necessities have built up within her domain the greatest shipping system, so have our necessities built up within our national boundaries the greatest railroad lines and the greatest river and canal systems of the world. If England can build the best and cheapest ships, we can build the best and cheapest engines and railroad equipment. As well might the United States tear up her railroad lines and fill up her rivers and canals as for England to attempt to preserve her territory and exist without her immense shipping. Free trade among the States and free trade between England and her numerous colonies are but one and the same thing.

Free trade is always an aid to commerce, but in no wise is it the parent of the immense merchant marine of England. Her ships are the arteries and the veins through which flow the life-blood of that great country. Nor is it any wonder that her ships monopolize the carrying trade of the world. Having the ships en voyage passing in front of the open doors of every country on the face of the globe, it would be surprising indeed if they should not take in cargoes whenever and wherever they can find them. Her ships pay because she must have them for her own intercourse and internal commerce. American ships are few in number because we have no pressing need for more. Our railroads, canals, and great river craft are to us what an immense number of ships are to England.

"Necessity is the mother of invention," and also of construction. England from necessity has gone to the front in ship-building, and for the same reason we went to the front in railroad enterprise. If it were possible to connect all parts of the British Empire with railroad lines, one-half her ships would rot at the wharves. When we were a seaboard nation and relied upon a foreign trade for prosperity, when we imported our manufactured articles and paid for them in exports, we naturally had a large number of ships. As we require less and less from abroad, and as we consume more and more of our home productions, our shipping interests, except for coast traffic, will naturally decline. As we more and more reach that condition foreign ships will trade less and less at our ports. I should state in this connection that there are 114,412 miles of railroad in the United States, with about $7,000,000,000 capital invested, earning about $770,256,762 and paying in working expenses about $500,000,000 annually, as against 18,514 miles in England and Ireland and 111,399 miles in all of Europe. These railroads give employment to 12,331 clerks and book-keepers, 236,058 employés, 2,069 officials, 4,708 car-makers, and thousands of machinists, manufacturing engines and machinery to supply them, who are not in the employ of the companies.

Sir, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures may exist in a country, and still the nation be weak and impotent. It is intelligent labor that gives permanent power to nations. There must be diversity of industries in order to bring into use the varied powers and capabilities of the people, but these can not exist where ignorance prevails. At one period Spain was ruler of land and sea; her possessions were the half of the known world and encircled the globe. Her navies robbed and despoiled the commerce of the world. Her rich mines were worked by slaves. The crushed and broken Moors were her only skilled artisans and agriculturists; her brave, adventurous, war-like people hesitated neither at rapine, robbery, nor murder, and they practiced all under the guise of extending the Holy Church and spreading the holy Christian faith. If a person read the Bible and believed other than as the Church said he should believe, they burned him if he did not recant and killed him in a less cruel way if he did. To have dared to think for himself brought him death, immediate death, in any event. No atonement he could make did aught but lessen the cruel tortures of its form.

The conquered Moors and their slaves tilled the soil and manufactured what they could. Spaniards robbed commerce and other lands for the balance. Finally they drove out the Moors, and as they were carried across the waters of the Mediterranean the Spanish crews rose on the exiled ones, murdered the men, violated the women, and threw the children overboard. The few who were landed were left to the murderous mercy of the barbarous Bedouins. These exiled ones were the tillers of her soil and her expert artificers, and these industries were killed at a blow. There were none to fill their places. Intellect was repressed. To obtain knowledge was a crime, to be ignorant a virtue. The decay of Spain followed. She had cast out her home industry, and the surrounding nations soon became able to repress her sea robberies. One by one her colonies rose in rebellion and threw off the yoke of oppression or were conquered or purchased by other countries. And yet the able and eloquent gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] holds her up as worthy of imitation. She is presented as a free-trade argument. Her commerce is said to have been the source of her prosperity; its destruction the cause of her ruin and decay.

Sir, the ignorance and degradation of her people, of her labor, the destruction of her industries, were the causes of her ruin, hastened by the debauchery of her nobility and the brutality of her priesthood. Spain never had an honest commerce. Sir, her whole history demonstrates that the perpetuity of a nation rests upon the basis of honest, intelligent, educated labor and the protection of home industry.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] in his zeal and eloquence said, and the free-trade Democracy of this House applauded to the echo, that he believed in the absolute right of every man to purchase goods wherever he can get them cheapest, whether it be in Mexico, Canada, France, or England, and that every man should have the same right to hire labor wherever he can get it cheapest, whether it be the Mexican, Italian, or Englishman. Sir, if there is any practice that the people of this country have repudiated it is the importation of cheap foreign labor.

When the monopolists of this country endeavor to crowd out intelligent American labor because it demands high wages, and to replace it with Italian, German, French, or any other imported labor because it can be hired cheaply, the act will be prevented by the ballot and the enactment of a protective law if possible. If this does not succeed, it may be that our streets will flow with blood and that all the horrors of the French revolution will be re-enacted in our land. The great masses of our industrious and intelligent people will never consent to the establishment of a moneyed aristocracy on this continent. They will ever contend against all measures that tend to concentrate political power, the ownership of property, or the control of labor in a few hands. [Applause.]

Sir, the development of the wheat-producing power of India is not the result in any sense of American protection. England will develop every industry she can in her own colonies. It is true that in the world's progress we find that we must compete with the world.

India's producing power demonstrates that home markets are the best and the most reliable, and it warns us to bend every energy to the development and enlargement of a home market for our every production.

This we can not do by letting in the cheap manufactures of English, German, French, and Belgian labor as a bid for their patronage in the agricultural market. Rapidly enough, too rapidly, are our public lands being taken up by the foreign immigrant. When we open our ports to foreign manufactures and raise the price of corn and wheat, if it should have that effect temporarily, it would swell the tide of immigration, depopulate our Eastern towns, destroy home markets, and increase the surplus of agricultural products. In a few years at the longest the farmer would be the meanest and poorest paid of the American citizens. The public lands, the heritage of the American, would be gone, and with their occupation by a foreign people will have disappeared our magnificent manufactures, and the grand enterprise and public spirit of America will have decayed.

And now, sir, in concluding these crude and imperfect remarks, allow me to say that it is with supreme confidence in the justice and necessity of a protective tariff that I submit this controversy to the judgment of this House, ready and anxious to appeal to an intelligent, sturdy, working people if occasion demand. We are a peculiar people, peculiarly situated. In addition to our native population we are made up of men from every clime, taught in every school of political science, and reared under every form of government. And yet with remarkable unanimity again and again have our citizens, resting from toil beneath the wide-spread branches of the tree of liberty, pronounced in favor of protection to American labor and home industries. With it they have builded themselves homes on their little plots of ground purchased with the savings of honest, well-paid toil. With it they have educated their children and watched them in a career of prosperity, usefulness, and honor. With it they have seen the plains spanned with iron bands, the caverns of the mountains explored, and their rich treasures of coal, iron, silver, and gold brought forth to enrich labor and add to the glory of the nation. With it they have seen the arts and sciences making rapid progress and the inventive skill and genius of man developed to a most high degree. With it they have seen this country rise in the scale of nations and take rank with the first powers of the earth. [Applause.] Without it they would tremble for her future and herald its abandonment as an indication of approaching decay. Under our present policy they enjoy prosperity and feel the inspiration of assured success. They will abandon it for no experiment, nor under bright skies, with fair breezes, an open sea, and an experienced crew will they be tempted to surrender the guidance of the ship of state to a free-trade pilot, whose avowed object is to guide her course among the rocks and shoals of an unknown sea. [Continued applause.]

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire a moment only in order to put on the records of this House some facts that may go down side by side with the fictions which have been uttered here this evening by the gentleman from New York. I desire to read from the work entitled "Wages and trade," by Mr. Schoenhof, of New York, one of the largest woolen manufacturers of this country, and the statistics which he gives are compiled from French and English sources, and also the official statistics of our consuls abroad furnished to this Government. On page 8 of his work he uses this language:

It will be seen from the table that England pays more than any of its two principal continental competitors, Germany and France. The industrial development of all other nations, excepting Belgium and Switzerland perhaps, is far behind either. I take Germany and France, therefore, as examples. English wages are fully 50 per cent. above those of Germany, and on the average at least 30 per cent. above those of France. Besides, the English working week is one of fifty-six hours, while that of Germany is from sixty-six to seveny-two (often seventy-eight) hours, and that of France of seventy-two hours. Yet they all guard themselves by protective tariffs, not against their weaker rivals, but against the very country which pays the highest wages and has the shortest hours.

Now, for the benefit of the distinguished gentleman from New York, let me put on the records of this House also the indelible fact that England's exports of cottons alone in 1881 amounted to the large sum of $380,000,000, while this great American nation of ours, with its 55,000,000 of free people and its protective tariff system, exported only $13,000,000 altogether, making $367,000,000 for England in excess of the United States. And in her woolen goods and yarns let me also give the statistics of her exports. England of these articles exported $103,000,000, while the United States exported four hundred thousand dollars' worth only. To the shame of our people be it said that we exported only that amount in comparison.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the figures that I have read will convince the gentleman that probably the moon may even be made of green cheese; and that the members of this side of the House who have read something about this question need to be answered in a different manner when they ask a financial, a practical, or historical question. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MATSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HALSELL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 9 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CANDLER: Petition of citizens of White County, Georgia, for national aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. CANNON: Memorial of the Grand Army of the Republic, Ridge Farm, Ill., for amendment to the pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COOK: Petition of members of the James P. Milligan Post, No. 257, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Iowa, in relation to pensions, bounty, &c.—to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

Also, petition of T. J. McNabb and 86 others, relative to the building of a double-track railway from New York to San Francisco, &c.—to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of Charles A. Bradish, A. Smalley Wilkinson, and 28 others, members of F. M. Lane Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Ransom, Ill., relative to pensions, &c.—to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. CURTIN: The petition of Elizabeth Latshaw, relative to pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DUNCAN: Petition of Post No. 99, Grand Army of the Republic, of Hanover, Pa., to grant pensions to all soldiers and sailors who served sixty days in the late war—to the same committee.

By Mr. ELLIS: Papers relating to the claim of Mrs. Daniel Fairex—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FIEDLER: Petition of Charles Heise, William J. Reeves, and about 500 others, wage-workers of Newark, N. J., relative to the Chinese restriction act—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FINERTY: Petition from officers of the United States Army, Fort Snelling, Minn., asking for the passage of H. R. 3117 and 3118—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GLASCOCK: Concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to the establishment of experimental stations in connection with the agricultural college—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HARMER: Memorial of officers stationed at Cantonment Uncompahgre, Colo., favoring the passage of H. R. 2613—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HART: Papers relating to the pension claim of Capt. H. S. Sayres—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUNT: Memorial of the Louisiana Educational Society—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. MORRILL: Petition of Kennedy Post, No. 292, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, asking for a pension for all soldiers of the late war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 1, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. ALLISON called the Senate to order, and the Secretary read the following letter:

VICE-PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER, Washington, May 1, 1884.

To the Senate:

Pursuant to the rules I hereby name and designate Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, a Senator from the State of Iowa, to perform the duties of the Chair in my absence this day.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

Thereupon Mr. ALLISON took the chair as Presiding Officer for to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following joint resolutions received yesterday from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 179) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint from the sergeants of the Signal Corps two second lieutenants; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 209) granting the use of cannon, tents, and muskets to ex-Union soldiers for reunion purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of Maj. Gen. Winfield S. Hancock concerning the estimate for extra-duty pay due the enlisted men at Headquarters, Division of the Atlantic; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DOCUMENTS FOR SENATE LIBRARY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Library:

UNITED STATES SENATE LIBRARY,
Washington, April 30, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to the fact that the Senate Library does not possess a single copy of either of the first four volumes of the Compilation of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, now publishing by order of Congress.

These volumes were distributed through the folding-room of the Senate, and for some cause no provision was made for a supply of them to this library. There is a sufficient number of the subsequent volumes for our purposes, but as the work is an important one the library should not be without some complete sets of it. Whether these can be procured I am not advised. I have endeavored without success, through the Secretary of the Senate, to procure them from the War Department, and not knowing where else to apply I refer the matter to yourself. Five copies of the volumes will supply our wants.

Respectfully yours,

A. W. CHURCH,
Assistant Librarian, Senate Library.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore, Senate of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented the petition of John W. Geary Post, No. 90, Department of Pennsylvania, Grand Army of the Republic, by William D. Nangle, commander, and J. M. George, adjutant, praying that a pension be granted to every Union soldier and sailor who served sixty days or more in the late war of the rebellion, and who, under existing laws, are not entitled to $8 or a greater sum; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of Maxwell Post, No. 14, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the passage of laws necessary to grant the sum of $8 a month to every Union soldier and sailor who served sixty days or more in the late war of the rebellion, and who, under the existing laws, are not entitled to that sum or a greater; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER presented resolutions adopted by Wilson Colwell Post, No. 38, Grand Army of the Republic, of La Crosse, Wis., in favor of increasing the pensions of volunteer soldiers, their widows and children, in accordance with the recommendations of the national committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of citizens of Saint Augustine, Fla., praying that the bill introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Public Lands giving to the First Presbyterian church of Saint Augustine, Fla., a portion of the "governor's house lot" in Saint Augustine for church purposes, in consideration for stone, valued at $400, taken and used by the Government during the late war, for repairs of Fort Marion, be made a law. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I also present, accompanying the petition, a letter of John E. Myers, trustee of the Presbyterian church at Saint Augustine, Fla., requesting the same action on the part of Congress. I move that the letter be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of J. M. McLellan and 53 other soldiers of the late war of the rebellion, praying that all honorably discharged soldiers be allowed a pension of $8 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of 80 members of Hambright Post, No. 270, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, remonstrating against the passage of the House bill known as the Warner bill, on the subject of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of a majority of the Committee on Commerce, I report a substitute for Senate bill 1202, and submit a report thereon.

The bill (S. 2135) to provide for and aid in the construction and to regulate the operation of a ship-canal between Lakes Union and Washington and Puget Sound, in Washington Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONGER. There is a majority report, and there are some reports from engineer officers which I should like to have printed with the majority report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It appears that there are no papers connected with this case except the report of the majority.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state that the papers referred to are attached to the majority report as an appendix, so that they may be printed together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers referred to will be printed with the report.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1202) to provide for and aid in the construction and to regulate the operation of a ship-canal between Lakes Union and Washington and Puget Sound, in Washington Territory, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 991) for the relief of J. Henry Rives, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2037) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of adulterated and spurious teas," approved March 2, 1883, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 2136) for the relief of Edward A. Weyman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2137) granting a pension to Andrew J. McDowell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2138) granting a pension to Nancy S. Daniels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COLQUITT introduced a bill (S. 2139) to remove the political disabilities of E. P. Alexander, of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POTOMAC FREE BRIDGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill it was agreed should be postponed until next Monday, and it will be passed over.

LOTTERY ADVERTISEMENTS.

The bill (S. 1017) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent it was agreed that this bill should be passed over until the return of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

ABBY P. ARNOLD.

The bill (S. 764) granting an increase of pension to Abby P. Arnold was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That has been adversely reported. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that by an understanding it was agreed that this bill should be passed over until the return of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1373) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. VEST. That bill was referred yesterday to the Committee on Territories on motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that no reference was made; but that the matter was discussed and the bill went over.

Mr. HARRISON. It was suggested yesterday that the bill should be passed over without losing its place until the Committee on Territories could consider the question at a meeting to-morrow as to the effect of the measure upon the National Park.

Mr. SAWYER. I hope it will be passed over without losing its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

TRUSTEES OF ISAAC R. TRIMBLE.

The bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think I shall have to object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin objects, and the bill goes over.

ACCOUNTS OF JOHN B. MONTEITH.

The bill (S. 516) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury in the settlement of the Indian accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, late Indian agent at the Lapwai Indian agency, in the Territory of Idaho, for the Nez Percé Indians, to allow him, or the administrator or executor of his estate, $875.75, which amount has been heretofore disallowed him in the settlement of his accounts in the Indian service.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BOWEN, March 4, 1884:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 516) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, have had the same under consideration, and report thereon as follows:

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in the adjustment of the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, late Indian agent at the Lapwai Indian agency, in Idaho, for the Nez Percé Indians, to allow the administrator of his estate the sum of $875.75, as follows, to wit:

To fees paid J. M. Howe, attorney for Government employés, as per itemized statement	$440 00
To rent paid W. G. Langford, in the names of the various employés, by Agent Monteith, as per itemized statement	152 00
To justices' fees paid, as per itemized statement	33 75
To amounts disallowed in the final settlement of late Indian Agent John B. Monteith's account before the Treasury Department	250 00
Total	875 75

This claim has been repeatedly recommended for payment by the Indian Office and Interior Department, to wit, on December 14, 1876; on March 1, 1877; on January 11, 1882; on March 18, 1882, as set forth in official papers from the Indian Department.

This bill, introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress, was submitted to the Department of the Interior for examination and report, and was reported favorably upon in a communication of March 18, 1882. Six hundred and twenty-five dollars and seventy-five cents of this account was for money paid by John B. Monteith in defending the United States Indian agency in actions in ejectment brought in the United States Territorial courts; and $250 of the amount was allowance made by the Indian Department for additional clerical service at said agency. The sum total aggregates $875.75.

The following is a report and recommendation of the Interior Department:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 18, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 7, 1882, transmitting for report and office views thereon House bill No. 4741, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, "to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased," with accompanying papers.

The payment of the claim of Mr. Monteith has been repeatedly urged upon Congress, and was the subject of a favorable report (copy herewith) to the Hon. Secretary of the Interior, under date of December 14, 1876, recommending that Congress be requested to appropriate the sum of $625.75 to reimburse Mr. Montieth for the money actually expended and paid out by him in the ejectment suit of W. G. Langford vs. Employés of the Nez Percé Indian reservation at Lapwai, Idaho.

It was further urged in a communication to Senator Windom (copy herewith), dated March 1, 1877, requesting the insertion in the sundry civil appropriation bill, then pending, an amendment making an appropriation covering said claim.

The justness and the merit of the amount ($250) disallowed in the final settlement of Agent Monteith's accounts by the accounting office of the Treasury Department for additional pay for services rendered on account of authorized increase of salary as agency clerk has never been questioned; but as there was no authority of law for its allowance or payment, relief can only be had through Congress.

Concurring in the views of my predecessors as to the justness of the whole claim of $875.75, I urgently recommend favorable and prompt action on the bill submitted, which is returned herewith with accompanying inclosures as requested.

Very respectfully,
E. L. STEVENS,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. M. C. GEORGE,
House of Representatives.

The following is a copy of a letter from the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 14, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the claim of John B. Monteith, United States Indian agent, for certain expenses of rent, costs, and fees unavoidably incurred by the employés in their defense at the trial of the ejectment suits of W. G. Langford vs. Employés of the Nez Percé Indian reservation at Lapwai, Idaho Territory. These expenses were necessarily incurred, owing to the distance from the agency of the proper United States district attorney, as well as the difficulty of prompt communication with him or the Department; and to the exigencies of the case, which have been duly and fully reported to this office.

From these facts and the circumstances of the parties who were mulcted with the costs, who are hardly able to bear the same, and in view of the fact that by this course of action they were enabled to hold the agency buildings and thereby avert their total destruction by the Indians, who would undoubtedly have burned them rather than allow them to pass into Mr. Langford's possession, I respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate the sum of $625.75 to fully reimburse Mr. Monteith for all moneys actually expended and paid out by him in said defense.

For your further information I submit herewith duplicate copies of an itemized statement of the expenses incurred, which were furnished by Mr. Monteith under office instructions of the 19th of July, 1875.

I also submit the draught of a bill for the purpose above indicated.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. Q. SMITH, Commissioner.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

From the papers on file in this case it appears that Mr. Langford made attempt by seven actions in ejectment in the justice, district, and supreme courts of Idaho to recover possession of the land upon which the Government agency buildings had been erected; that he was successful in the actions in the justice court and in the district court, but was finally defeated in the supreme court. These expenses were unavoidably incurred by Mr. Monteith to save the occupancy of the Government buildings after judgment rendered in the justice court, and until the Department could be heard from, and for the expenses of an appeal to the district court, and to the supreme court, where the cases were finally decided in favor of the Government. It is quite evident from the proofs on file that had Mr. Monteith not expended these sums the Government would have been the loser of much valuable property, both through the result of the trials establishing the right of Mr. Langford and the frenzy of the Indians, who would have doubtless burned the buildings rather than to have seen them come into the possession of Mr. Langford.

It will be remembered that this agency was then situated in an isolated section, more so probably than any other portion of the United States at that time, and communication with the Department was exceedingly difficult. Mr. Monteith's action in thus saving the Government property and looking after its interest in a time of emergency entitles him to the gratitude of his country; and the least it can do is to reimburse him for the sum of money which he necessarily expended during the emergency in the Government's behalf. Time has proven that it was a wise action on his part, and that he was faithful to the interest of the Indians and of the Government. In regard to the sum of $250, expended by Mr. Monteith for additional clerical assistance, as shown by vouchers Nos. 7, 11, 12, 16, and 30, on file now in the Second Auditor's Office, the following was the authority under which the expenditure was made:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., May 27, 1875.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 6th instant, in which you ask authority to increase the salary of your clerk from $1,000 to $1,200 per annum, you are informed that your request is granted; the amount involved to be paid from funds that are now or may hereafter be placed in your hands from the appropriation for "incidental expenses Indian service in Idaho."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDW. P. SMITH, Commissioner.

J. B. MONTEITH, Esq.,
United States Indian Agent, Lapwai, Idaho.

In view of the foregoing your committee believe this claim to be just and proper, and recommend that it be allowed and paid as set forth in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I have examined the report and am satisfied that it has the recommendations of the Department. I did not ask for a reading of the report for myself.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARATOGA MONUMENT.

The bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $40,000 to be expended by the Saratoga Monument Association in statuary and historical tablets within and upon the monument now erected at Schuylerville, N. Y., commemorative of Burgoyne's surrender.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER COURT-MARTIAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1670) to relieve the members and judge-advocate of the general court-martial for the trial of Fitz-John Porter from the operation of certain restrictions of the eighty-fourth article of war.

Mr. GARLAND. Is that a unanimous report of the committee? There does not seem to be any printed report accompanying it.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to say a few things about the measure.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that there is no particular interest in it now that I know of, more than that the bill was introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and it was thought that some members of the court would probably like to have this opportunity. I suppose I might anticipate what the Senator was going to say in reference to it if it is the legal question that he proposes to discuss. I ask him whether he proposes to speak to the bill on the ground that Congress can not relieve the members of the court from the obligation of their oath?

Mr. GARLAND. That is the point.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that perhaps as a legal question he is right. The bill was not discussed in committee; it was merely reported back to the Senate and the legal question was not raised. If the Senator proposes to raise that question, I will state that I myself would vote to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. So far as the particular case this figures in is concerned it is not a matter of any interest or moment to me, and it is not in reference to that I raise the point; but before I saw the bill my attention was called to that proposition. I do not see exactly how Congress can relieve these parties of an obligation that they have already taken. That is the point I make about it; not for anything good or bad in this case, but on account of the precedent we should set of relieving persons who have taken such oaths. I do not see that Congress can do it, and if Congress would do it I think it could be a very bad precedent. I shall not extend my remarks upon the question if the Senator from Illinois, who reported the bill, concedes that proposition.

Mr. LOGAN. I most certainly do. That was my view of it at the time the bill was introduced, and I was merely willing to have the question come up before the Senate and let it be understood. I will state to the Senate that I myself do not believe that Congress has the power to relieve the members of a court-martial from an obligation that they take under the statute not to disclose any vote or anything that passes in their proceedings. I do not see how Congress can do it; but, as I said before, the bill was reported back more to get the expression of the Senate upon it than for anything else. It was not discussed in committee as to the legal proposition, and believing, as I said, with the Senator from Arkansas that Congress has not the power to do it, I am willing that the bill shall be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois make that motion?

Mr. GARLAND. I will make the motion myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCES H. PLUMMER.

The bill (S. 1106) for the relief of Frances H. Plummer was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a mistake in the bill. It was not reported without amendment. The committee instructed me to report an amendment reducing the amount from $1,500 to $1,000. I move that amendment now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3, after "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "five hundred," so as to make the bill read:

That the sum of $1,000 be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Frances H. Plummer, widow of J. B. Plummer, deceased, in full satisfaction and discharge of any and all claims against the United States for the loss of property by said J. B. Plummer or his said widow at the evacuation of Fort Cobb, Indian Territory, in May, 1861.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRUSTEES OF ISAAC R. TRIMBLE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I objected to the consideration of the bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble. I now desire, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw that objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn, and the Senate will return to Order of Business 296. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Let that go over again, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan objects.

Mr. CONGER. The bill went over yesterday for the purpose of giving time to have an examination and perhaps to prepare some amendment to it. I have no objection to letting the bill be passed over until the next day the Calendar comes up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am so anxious to get an expression of opinion from the Senate upon the bill that I shall move to take it up by a vote of the Senate. The Senate is competent to take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. HARRIS (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 34, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Bayard,	Fair,	Harris,	Pugh,
Beck,	Farley,	Harrison,	Ransom,
Blair,	Frye,	Hawley,	Riddleberger,
Call,	Garland,	Kenna,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	George,	Logan,	Vance,
Coke,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Groome,	Maxey,	Voorhees.
Cullom,	Hale,	Pendleton,
Dolph,	Hampton,	Pike,

NAYS—13.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Allison,	Hoar,	Platt,
Cameron of Wis.,	McMillan.	Plumb,
Conger,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—29.

Anthony,	Hill,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Ingalls,	Manderson,	Slater,
Brown,	Jackson,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Jonas,	Mitchell,	Walker,
Camden,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,
Dawes,	Lamar,	Sabin,
Gibson,	Lapham,	Saulsbury,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It refers to the Court of Claims for hearing and adjudication the claim of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble against the United States for the construction and use by the War Department of Howe's patent truss in the bridge over the Potomac River.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

Mr. CONGER. Before the report is read I wish to call the attention of Senators not only to some facts stated in the report, but that they may be connected with other statements to be made hereafter, going to show that Mr. Trimble at the very time that the Government was using what he claims as his patent truss-bridge was an officer in the confederate army, and was engaged in destroying bridges on the highways and means of communication as near the lines of the Long Bridge as he dared approach with the confederate army; that he was a disloyal man at that time while the Government was using his pretended patent; that he himself made application in 1875, I think, for pay for the use of his patent upon the Long Bridge, which use was being made of that bridge for the very purpose of access across the river to prevent his attacks upon the people of Virginia and upon the Government of the United States; that in 1875 he himself, after the war closed, made application for payment to him for the use of this truss; that it was rejected on account of disloyalty; that subsequently his wife and another person made application for payment, claiming that they were loyal; the wife states she was loyal just as far as she could be and perform the sacred duties which she owed to her disabled and sick husband.

The whole transaction shows that subsequently, in order to pass this claim, there was found somewhere, made before the issue of the patent by the Government, a deed of the right and title to this property to one or two other persons, made in view of going to join the confederate army and leaving this and other property in the hands of women to avoid confiscation and the results arising from his own action. The reading of the report in my judgment will show a kind of persistency, not to characterize it as impudence, on the part of this man to ask payment of the Government for the use of a property which, if used at all, was used for the express purpose of reaching with the troops of the United States his forces, and to prevent the destruction which he was carrying on of the property of the State and of the United States, and against its citizens.

As this case is to come up in this way, by a vote of the Senate, I desire that all these facts shall be known to the Senate and that the transparency of the pretense under which Mr. Trimble or his wife now seeks to recover property used about the time that he was engaged in destroying property of the United States shall be made clear and go upon the record, and that the Senate shall determine by its vote whether this is the class of case which the Departments have decided could not be enforced against the Government of the United States in the name of Mr. Trimble, and where the proof of loyalty even of the wife and niece is disputed in the documents which are about to be read to the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. In reply to what has been said by the Senator from Michigan, I beg to say that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Railroad Company vs. Trimble, in a decision rendered at the December term of 1870, and reported in 10 Wallace, have settled the question conclusively and indisputably that the title of the Howe truss given long prior to that time had been taken out of Trimble and belonged to his trustees for the use and benefit of his creditors. In a contested case on all fours with the case here, for the unauthorized use by a company of the Howe truss, the title was settled to have been first in Trimble, and second to have been assigned by a valid deed of conveyance and transfer to the trustees of Trimble, that the title was in the trustees of Trimble, and a judgment was rendered in favor of the trustees of Trimble.

The question before the War Department and before the Treasury Department was not a question of loyalty on the part of Trimble, but it was a question as to whether the Treasury Department had jurisdiction to settle and adjudge this claim, for it was insisted, and with perfect propriety in my judgement, by the then Secretary of War, Mr. McCrary—unquestionably a very able lawyer—that if the Government used this truss without a special contract and without complaint on the part of the owner of the truss, there was an implied contract that it should pay a quantum meruit, whatever the amount of the use of that truss might be. The Comptroller of the Treasury thought while that might be true as a question of fact, it might be regarded as an unlawful use of the truss. That was the question, whether it was to be regarded as the unlawful use of this truss and therefore a trespass and the users responsible in damages, or whether it was to be regarded as an implied contract and a quantum meruit the measure of compensation. Mr. Justice Swayne says in the decision in 10 Wallace:

The deed of Isaac R. Trimble, of the 30th of May, 1861, conveyed all his rights under the patent, whatever they may have been, to the grantees in that instrument. If his title was sufficient theirs is so. This was not controverted by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and needs no further remark.

So that as early as the 30th of May, 1861, the title of the property had been transferred to the trustees of Trimble, and whatever title Trimble had passed to the trustees, and there is no question that Trimble had a title at the time he made this transfer.

The evidence was also conclusive that the trustees of Mr. Trimble were loyal, and a judgment was rendered against the railroad company for the use of this truss in favor of the trustees, the claimants who come forward here.

The Quartermaster-General's Department saw proper to make use of this Howe truss in the construction of the Long Bridge across the Potomac River. They had not a contract with the trustees, nor with Trimble. The use was made under the direction of the War Department, and there being a question as to where the title of the truss rested, the case was held open until after the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1870, from which I have read. Subsequently the claim was asserted and kept up, and the report will show—I call the careful attention of all to the report—that there was no question raised as to whether the Government had used the truss. It was admitted. It was admitted also that the Government had not paid for the use of it, and the only question was the question of jurisdiction, and on that question the Secretary of War took one view and the Comptroller took another view. If the view of the Secretary of War was good there would be no difficulty in regard to referring the case to the Court of Claims. If on the other hand the view of the Comptroller was good, it would have to come to Congress for authority. In this condition of things the bill was introduced; and if Senators will listen to the report made by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs they will find, in my judgment, that no clearer case can be made than the case which has been made in that report. Copies of the various papers are referred to and made part of the report.

I have only said this much because the bill was introduced at the last Congress, and the bill as originally worded authorized the court to render such judgment as justice and right to the claimant and the Government should require; but the committee changed that and caused it to read, "and to that end jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court to proceed as a court of equity, and to render judgment therein," which is the precise wording of the bill here, and that bill, No. 1210 of the Forty-seventh Congress, after hearing the report called for by the Senator from Minnesota, passed the Senate without a dissenting voice. The bill now pending is verbatim the bill which has heretofore received, after the reading of the report, the assent of the Senate.

That is all I care to say. I have only said that much from the fact that I prepared the original report, and the Committee on Military Affairs during the present session adopted the former report and came to the same conclusion at this session that they did at the last Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I move the following substitute for the bill:

Resolved, That the pending bill be referred to the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883.

Mr. President, I suppose that it is not necessary to remind every Senator that if this resolution is adopted under the new Senate rules this matter goes to the Court of Claims with authority simply to report the facts to the Senate, and in that event the Government will be represented by the Attorney-General, or some officer whom he shall appoint for the purpose, who will have an opportunity to adduce evidence and examine and cross-examine witnesses.

It is true that this bill has been once passed, but that was before the existence of this legal authority and when it was necessary under the then existing law that the merits of the case should be determined by the Senate on ex parte affidavits. There was no existing legal mechanism for any other arrangement.

This claim may be a very just one, but it contains among other things this very remarkable, I will not say suspicious, fact, that an eminent officer in the confederate army, who, I believe, was a resident of Baltimore, though that does not appear in the report, but I am so informed by some Senators around me, so zealous in the Southern cause as to enlist at this very time in the confederate service and to be raised to high military office, should have a wife and another near female relative for whose use he conveyed this property who were at the same time loyal persons. That is possible; there were such cases; but such an allegation is one which creates certainly the demand for further inquiry. All of the evidence in regard to the loyalty of these ladies is found in their own affidavits so far as set forth in this report. It seems to me, therefore, that the interests of the United States require that all these facts, including the question of value and the question of the original contract, should be sent into the Court of Claims.

There is another fact which would put any judge, or counsel, or trustee, or Senator upon inquiry, and that is that although this claim is now presented having for its foundation an alleged deed of trust by Major-General Trimble in favor of his wife, yet it was presented long after the war as a claim of his own, and having been rejected as a claim of his own, it now reappears as a claim for his wife and another cestui que trust, and with the hope that his original inadvertence in claiming it as his own property will not prejudice it.

I do not say these things as making the least imputation upon the character of this officer or these claimants, and I hope no Senator will understand that I am expressing any opinion adverse to the claim. I only say that those two facts to which I have referred make it eminently proper that before the Senate act they should be sifted by the ordinary legal process, where witnesses can be heard on both sides and where the witnesses can be cross-examined face to face by officers representing the Government, and final decision reserved to us after a full report.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, as I introduced this bill I desire to say only one or two words in reply to the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts.

I regret exceedingly that both these Senators should bring into this case the question of the loyalty of General Trimble. General Trimble, it was true, was a soldier in the late rebellion, enlisting in the cause of the Southern confederacy. An honorable man himself, he became embarrassed before the war and made an assignment of all his property to his wife and to Miss Presstman. That assignment included his interest in the Howe truss patent, and, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] reminds me, has been so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Maryland if the date of this deed of trust is correctly given as May 30, 1861?

Mr. GORMAN. It was made in May, 1861.

Mr. HOAR. Before the war?

Mr. GORMAN. Before General Trimble became connected with the Southern confederacy, when he was a citizen of Maryland, and so far as known within the law he was a loyal citizen of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. May I inquire how soon after the execution of the deed General Trimble did connect his fortunes with the Southern confederacy?

Mr. GORMAN. I think in a very short time afterward.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Then it would look as if it was made in contemplation of that step.

Mr. GORMAN. Whatever the motive may have been, the evidence before the Senate—and it comes from gentlemen who are as loyal to this Government as the Senator from Wisconsin, men who severed their social connections to remain true to the Union in Maryland—is that the deed of trust was made in good faith and made for the benefit of the creditors of a man who was insolvent before he became connected with the rebellion. It is therefore not a question whether you will punish General Trimble for his disloyalty twenty-three years ago, but whether you will follow it up and punish an innocent wife and a young lady who gets all that she has from the assignment made by General Trimble.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Then how does the Senator account for the fact that years subsequent to the execution of this alleged deed of trust General Trimble claimed this royalty in his own name and for his own benefit?

Mr. GORMAN. When General Trimble returned at the close of the war impoverished and his family impoverished, the assignment having been made to these two ladies years before, he undertook to collect this claim from the Government of the United States, and he, not being a lawyer, made the claim in his own name; but when it was presented for settlement Mr. J. Morrison Harris and other legal gentlemen in Maryland, who were as loyal as the Senator or myself to the Union, advised him that he had no right to present the claim in his own name, but that it was due to his wife and Miss Presstman and his creditors. Therefore the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan and my friend from Wisconsin would not be punishing a man who had gone into the rebellion, but would be punishing two innocent and high-toned ladies who reside in the State of Maryland, and who are certified here as having been loyal people during the entire war. I submit that it is too late to make war upon women and children. Make war upon men engaged in the rebellion, if you will, but do not follow it up on their wives and female members of their families.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The creditors seem to have dropped out in some way, and now, according to the statement of the Senator from Maryland, it is for the benefit of the wife and her sister.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me I will call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to a letter from the judge-advocate:

(Here follow names of creditors who swear to stated sums owing them by I. R. Trimble, and present affidavits of loyalty vouched for by citizens of Baltimore.)

I will read one other extract from that same letter from the judge-advocate:

In the case as thus presented there would seem to be no question involved except such as belonged more especially to the jurisdiction of the accounting officers of the Treasury, if the proofs of loyalty are accepted as sufficient, as they seem to me to be.

Mr. GORMAN. I only desire to add one word in relation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, whom I know to be entirely fair.

Mr. MAXEY. Let me remind the Senator from Maryland in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin that the Supreme Court of the United States declared that whatever title Isaac R. Trimble had to Howe's truss on the 30th of May, 1861, passed to and became vested in the trustees. Therefore it makes no difference what may have been the subsequent course of Isaac R. Trimble. The title being vested in the trustees on that day, nothing that can be brought up here on account of his subsequent conduct can affect their character.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me——

Mr. MAXEY. Nor did his wife have anything to do with it.

Mr. HOAR. Nobody makes that point that the subsequent conduct of Isaac R. Trimble affects this case. The loyalty of the claimants does, and the loyalty of the claimants is certified to by a Government officer of great respectability, his certificate however depending on ex parte affidavits. Now the suspicious circumstance. I do not use the word "suspicious" in any bad sense, but the circumstance putting us upon inquiry, putting any prudent man intrusted with the disposition of Government money on inquiry, is that this lady, who is said to have been loyal herself, was the wife of a zealous supporter of the confederacy who left a loyal State to go into rebellion, differing therefore from the people of his own State, and who was promptly raised to the high office of major-general. That is consistent with the loyalty of his wife undoubtedly, but the question is whether that being a fact for us to act on it is safer to refer it under this new process or to take the ex parte affidavit and certificate of a Government officer. That is the point.

I do not make war on this lady, as the Senator from Maryland says. I simply say that we should treat this bill just as if it were a case coming from any State anywhere of a person of unquestioned loyalty; that is, that if there is anything which puts us on further inquiry into the case, as there clearly is here, we should use this mechanism of the Court of Claims.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Wisconsin made the precise point that because Mr. Trimble had, subsequently to May, 1861, and soon thereafter, joined the rebellion, therefore there must have been a fraudulent intent in the transfer. He did not use the word "fraudulent," but that was the inference. The point which I made was that the Supreme Court had settled the whole of that question, because they said the title vested on the 30th of May, 1861, in the trustees, which being the case no subsequent conduct of Trimble could in law, and no lawyer will say, ever affect the title of those in whom the title vested.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will inquire of the Senator from Texas between what parties the title was settled. The United States was not one of the parties, and consequently the United States was not bound by that decision, whatever it was.

Mr. MAXEY. As a matter of course I am speaking of the title being vested in the trustees of Trimble, nor is it disputed now by the United States, nor was the point ever made by the United States, that the title was not vested in Trimble originally. The point, and the only point, which was made was as to whether the Comptroller was right that it was a matter of damages, or the Secretary of War was right that it was a question of paying compensation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What we want is that the United States shall have an opportunity of raising that question.

Mr. MAXEY. That is what we propose to send the case to the Court of Claims for, and let the whole case be investigated by it as a court.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would do very great injustice to these claimants. As has been well said by the Senator from Texas, the bill proposes to refer the case to the Court of Claims, where all the facts as to the loyalty of these parties will necessarily come before the court. Once before the authorities of the War Department they have proved their loyalty, and proved it by such gentlemen as Mr. J. Morrison Harris, the head and front of the Republican party in the State of Maryland, a man whose loyalty was not questioned in 1861 or since; a man who aided to raise the troops that were furnished by the State of Maryland to suppress the rebellion. He has been a consistent Republican ever since. These ladies have proved by such testimony their loyalty to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War and other subordinate officers of that Department. And now by this bill you can compel them to prove their loyalty again. All that the bill contemplates doing is that when they have again established this claim, and have proved their loyalty, judgment shall be given and the money paid over to them.

Now I ask the Senator from Massachusetts what injustice there is in that? They have proved their claim once before the War Department; the amount has been ascertained by the War Department by engineers who are competent to judge; and now the Senator, because of the disloyalty of the husband, would still punish an innocent wife. I trust he will withdraw his amendment. I say to him, knowing all the parties concerned in this case, that I would be the last among the Senators on this floor to present a claim for property forfeited under the law for the benefit of any general in the late war on the side of the confederacy; but this is as just a claim in my judgment as has ever been presented, and I know the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would do great injustice. I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that I do not see the distinction he makes between the bill as it is and the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Court of Claims can only report the matter back to Congress anyhow. They can only say that they find so much in behalf of the claimant and come to Congress for an appropriation, as all matters do from the Court of Claims. The resolution refers it there under the late law to ascertain the amount due, if any. The only difference is that Congress would be under obligation to make an appropriation for the amount of the judgment of the court under the bill; but under the resolution the court would find the amount and report it to Congress for Congress to act upon. The difference is that Congress is under obligation to appropriate in one case, and in the other it may or may not as justice demands in its judgment.

I think with the Senator from Massachusetts, although this bill came from the Military Committee, that all matters referred to the Court of Claims ought to be referred under the law passed at the last session. All matters referred by Congress to that court for its decision should be sent under the law that we have passed providing for the examination of claims before the court to be reported back to Congress. We passed a law for that purpose to prevent matters of this kind coming up before Congress, so that committees could have an opportunity of referring them to the Court of Claims. I think that is a good rule, and without giving any judgment of my own in reference to this matter, I believe that rule ought to be followed out; and for that reason I am in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I think it ought to apply to all cases of this character that come before Congress.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has modified the resolution, and it will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the bill for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, now pending before the Senate, be transmitted (in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883) to the Court of Claims of the United States, together with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents appertaining thereto.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland to state one fact. Is General Trimble now living?

Mr. GORMAN. General Trimble is living.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs contemplate two very distinct things. The act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act, was not intended to displace or repeal the prior act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine causes; and it was merely in the nature of a cumulative remedy for the relief of committees of Congress and Departments of the Government in investigating claims. The jurisdiction in the Court of Claims to hear and determine cases of contract with the Government remains unquestioned by the act, but by way of expediting business before committees of Congress it provides that they may have claims referred there for investigation by the court and a report from the court of all the facts and its opinion on the cases.

But what is the necessity of going to the trouble of referring this case to the Court of Claims, which pro tanto under this act is made merely a committee of the House of Congress referring a claim? That was the original organization of the Court of Claims; that was what it was under the act of 1855 creating the court; but afterward that was modified, and the court was given jurisdiction to hear and determine claims and send its judgments to Congress to be appropriated for. That jurisdiction stands. But to relieve Congress of a great deal of the burden of this kind of investigation, under the act of March 3, 1883, claims are sent there for investigation merely. But two several committees, as we have it here, have passed upon this claim, have examined all the facts. There is not an additional fact to be obtained, as I understand from the records of the Senate. In addition to these investigations the case has been twice adjudicated so far as the material points are concerned, once by the Supreme Court of the United States, in 10 Wallace, and once by the district court in Maryland—that is, as to the validity of the deed of trust of May 30, 1861, and the rights and standing of these parties under the deed of trust.

What more is there for the Court of Claims, in view of the facts, to investigate and report to Congress? This bill says they may go to the Court of Claims and adjudicate their rights. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts particularly to the language of the act of March 3, 1883, as it seems by his amendment and the remarks of himself and other Senators in support of it that they want the fact of loyalty tested before the Court of Claims in its investigation as a jurisdictional fact. Now, under the act of the 3d of March, 1883, this can not be tested; it can not be made a question of jurisdiction in that court. Why? Section 4 of that act says:

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact.

There loyalty would be a jurisdictional question. This is not an application for supplies furnished or stores taken. It does not bear the remotest analogy to such a case, any more than it would be for the occupation of a house by the Army of the United States. For a very good and very special reason this requirement was limited to supplies, but it has no application to a proceeding of this character to obtain payment under an implied contract, which is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, for the use of this particular property, but not in the form of a product, not for bacon or flour, not for meal or potatoes or onions or turnips furnished to the Army. Those would be supplies, but this is for a totally distinct and different thing; and with all the facts here, the case twice adjudicated in the district court of Maryland and the Supreme Court of the United States, it is not worth while to send it to the Court of Claims to investigate facts that we have already established, but we should send it there for them to adjudicate whether the claim exists in fact, and if it exists, what is the amount due, and then to return to Congress for an appropriation.

Mr. GORMAN. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, who inquired whether General Trimble was living, I stated that General Trimble is living; but I have been informed since I made that remark that within a very short time both Mrs. Trimble and Miss Presstman are deceased, so that whatever benefit will be derived from the passage of this bill will go to the creditors. I was not aware of that fact when I replied to the Senator before.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand the Senator's present statement, then, it is this: The husband made this assignment to trustees for the benefit of certain creditors. The wife and the other lady mentioned are the next of kin of one of the creditors, so that the creditors' share in this trust fund——

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken there.

Mr. HOAR. Let us see:

Mrs. Trimble and Miss Georgianna Presstman claim as heirs one-fifth each of the estate of Ann F. Presstman, to which Mr. Trimble is sworn to be indebted in the sum of $9,000.

The deed of trust was:

First, to pay all his debts; then to hold for the use and benefit of Mrs. Trimble; and thirdly, to convey to her appointees.

It does not appear whether these creditors signed the instrument of trust and discharged the debtor, but it is to be presumed they did, or if they did not, the debts, are now twenty-three years old at least, so that it is not likely that the creditors have any interest by reason of any claim of theirs against General Trimble. His wife is dead, and all his wife's interest, both as a cestui que trust under the original instrument, if there should be anything left after paying creditors, and as representing this nine-thousand-dollar creditor, whom she and Miss Presstman represent, claiming one-fifth each of the estate, has passed to her husband, I suppose, under the Maryland law as her next of kin, for I suppose the husband there, as almost everywhere else, is the next of kin of the wife in regard to personal property, and he inherits as husband.

Then, in point of fact, if the debts have been paid the whole of this fund will go to Major-General Trimble himself, his wife being dead and he being living. If the debts have not been paid his wife's share of this debt due to her ancestor will have come around to him free from any claims of creditors. So that it is very largely and perhaps wholly his case.

The Senator from Maryland seems to think—he uses the phrase—that the adoption of my amendment is trying to punish this lady; or he used another phrase, is making war on this lady. It is the mere saying that the case presents suggestions of doubt enough to make it our duty to have the facts thoroughly ascertained, which never could be done either by the Department or by the Senate before.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether under the bill as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs all those facts would not be ascertained by the Court of Claims, and if they are to be so ascertained I ask him whether he is not willing to trust the Court of Claims?

Mr. HOAR. But the Court of Claims has a larger jurisdiction given to it by the bill than it has in ordinary cases, equitable as well as legal, and in addition to that the effect is to waive the benefit of the statute of limitations on a claim twenty-three years old. The Senate always in such cases requires itself to be satisfied by some inquiry of the merits of the case before it sends it to the Court of Claims to administer the law.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it so happens that the person who made this assignment, General Trimble, was for many years a resident of the town where I live. He was the superintendent of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, and in that way I knew him. I knew his family, and I had some professional knowledge of his pecuniary condition, not only in the spring of 1861, but for some time previous to that, and I am prepared to say that it was the most necessary and natural thing for General Trimble, or Mr. Trimble, as he was then called, to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to avoid the sale of his property under execution.

After he made the assignment in the spring of 1861 he became involved in the military operations of the war, and left his home and went South. An attempt was made by some judgment creditor in Delaware to obtain some personal property there, I think shares of railroad stock, and my impression is that it was either that or by some process of confiscation; but this assignment was then brought into court and tested and sustained upon an examination of its bona fides and reality, and it was held to be a vesting of whatever right or interest Trimble had at the time he made the assignment for the benefit of his creditors. It has undergone the examination of the courts, and courts trying and proceeding at the instance and for the benefit of the Government of the United States. For that reason I apprehend there should be no question as to where the bona fide legal title to all this property lay. It no longer was in him. Whether he lived or died, whether he acted well or ill after the making of the assignment, it mattered not to the parties interested under it, those who had the beneficial interest.

What the Senator from Maryland now says I also know to be true, that Mrs. Trimble and her sister are both deceased, and I will say further she was his second wife; both his wife and himself married quite late in life and there was never any issue of that marriage. So the case stands entirely free from any supposed devolution in favor of his children or in favor of himself by the death of these two cestuis que trust or by the terms of the trust itself.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him who according to his understanding of the facts of this case would get the benefit of this money if paid?

Mr. BAYARD. The people to whom Trimble owed money prior to 1861.

Mr. HARRISON. But it is evidently contemplated that there was an excess of this sum over and above the amount of those debts, and that is also made to appear probable by the fact that the residuary cestuis que trust have been pressing this claim, and not the creditors. Therefore all beyond the debts for which this was pledged would go to Mr. Trimble himself.

Mr. BAYARD. As a matter of fact I may say to the Senator that I should be glad for Mr. Trimble's sake if I thought there was to be any residuum after the payment of his debts; and probably, as in any other case of assignment made for the benefit of creditors, even if the feature was not contained in the deed the law itself would put it so that if the debts were all paid the residuum, if any, should belong to the person making the assignment; but in this case I have some reason to know that Mr. Trimble's creditors were by no means paid in full or have the slightest chance of being so paid. It would amount to a very moderate dividend, I do not know how much, but I think I have enough personal knowledge of his affairs to know that I would not consider the debt a very collectible one to anything like its face value.

Mr. HARRISON. As a member of the Military Committee, from which this bill came, though I had at the time no recollection of its consideration in the committee at all, I voted with my colleague on the committee, the Senator from South Carolina, for the present consideration of the bill. I think in looking at the date of the report it was probably considered by the committee at one of those private meetings which have been held when I was not present.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment, as I do not wish him to act under any misapprehension at all, I will say that this bill received very full and exhaustive discussion in committee at the last Congress. It was then passed in the Senate unanimously; and it was brought up at a full meeting of the committee at this session—I can not say positively whether the Senator from Indiana was present, but I think we had a full meeting of the committee—and I read the report that was made at the last Congress and it was adopted without dissent. Those are the facts so far as the report goes.

Mr. HARRISON. I am obliged to the Senator from South Carolina. I have no recollection of the discussion of this bill in the committee at the last Congress, and I am sure, from the fact that it was reported by the Senator upon a Friday at the present Congress, that it was considered at one of those extra meetings when I was not present. It seems to me that there are two facts here that should be further inquired into. I do not believe it was in the mind of any member of the committee when this was being discussed; I do not know even that the Senator from South Carolina understood that the effect of this bill was to pay this claim to General Trimble himself. I suppose no member of the committee so understood it; and yet it appears that probably at the time this bill was being considered, and we were thinking of the wife and the sister as the cestuis que trust named in this deed of assignment as the beneficiaries, General Trimble himself was practically the beneficiary if there should be any residuum over and above the amount necessary to pay the debts.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator will allow me again to interrupt him, though I do not like to trespass on the courtesy——

Mr. HARRISON. It is no inconvenience at all, I assure the Senator.

Mr. HAMPTON. As I understand the bill, the beneficiaries now will be the creditors. I know the fact that General Trimble has very little property, and I know the additional fact that some of the property that was in his hands came to him from his wife; and to show that I acted with perfect candor when I heard the statement made by my friend from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], I went to him and told him that I thought it was due to the Senate and due to him that he should say that these ladies had recently died.

Mr. HARRISON. I was not at all imputing any lack of candor to the Senator from South Carolina either in dealing with the Senate or with the committee. I had no thought of that. I supposed the fact to which I alluded was unknown to him at the time of its consideration in committee, as it certainly was to other members of the committee.

Mr. MAXEY. Allow me to say that I heard for the first time this morning of the death of these ladies. I never knew that before. I looked upon the case as a question of law. I did know General Trimble and I did know the ladies who are parties to this bill, but I never heard of their being dead until this morning. I know the creditors are interested.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what weight that fact might have had with the committee, but certainly it would have been one that the committee would have considered, as to whether we should by reason of this assignment, made evidently in contemplation of going into the war of the rebellion, have allowed that to operate in such a way now that the benefit of this deed of trust should be given to the officer who thus left the State in which he dwelt to take part in the rebellion. I do not know what conclusion the committee might have come to if it had known these facts.

But, Mr. President, it seems that after the war was over and after General Trimble had returned to his home in Maryland he made a claim against the Government for the royalty on this patent. The Senator from Maryland says that he did not consult lawyers, that he did not take legal advice. Why, Mr. President, can it be supposed that a gentleman of General Trimble's intelligence needed the advice of a lawyer upon the question whether property which he had assigned for the benefit of creditors and others was still his in such a sense that he could make a claim for it? The very fact that after coming back from the war he himself deliberately claimed this as due him, and that up to that time we hear nothing at all of the assignment, raises some doubt, it seems to me, as to the quality and character of the assignment itself. If the distinguished Senator had executed a deed of conveyance to some one here of a piece of property or had transferred by delivery an article of personal property, and had done it in good faith, and had believed that he had dispossessed himself of all the property, he, if not a lawyer, would not need advice to know that that was no longer in him and that he could maintain no action about it.

So this is a matter which it is well enough to look into now when this relief is asked for the benefit of General Trimble himself, as to whether the assignment was delivered, and if it was delivered, when. Was there an actual delivery of this assignment? It does not seem to be consistent with the idea that there was, that General Trimble after the war was claiming the property himself in direct contravention of the assignment which he claims to have made before.

This claim may be right or wrong; but I thought it due to my colleague on the committee, the Senator from South Carolina, that I should state the facts as to what I knew of this matter, and also to express to the Senate as a member of the committee my belief that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts should prevail.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask him whether under the original bill if the very point he makes as to loyalty and question as to the assignment would not come before the court?

Mr. HARRISON. It may be that it would; and yet the bill extends the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; it calls upon the court to deal with and settle this question upon principles of equity. There can be no doubt in my mind, and I think there is none in the mind of the Senator from Maryland, that the provisions of the bill waive the statute of limitations. Then I am not clear that it does not also waive the defense as to the disloyalty of the person.

Mr. GORMAN. If there be any doubt upon that question under the bill, I ask the Senator as a lawyer whether under the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts it could come up?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator asks whether the question of loyalty would come up. Undoubtedly in the course of this investigation, in the taking of the testimony before the Court of Claims, we shall get at all the facts. Of course under this resolution the Court of Claims could pass no judgment, but they would bring to us an ample statement of all the facts in the case as to who is the present beneficiary, as to who are the creditors, the character and amount of their debts, and as to their loyalty. All of these facts would be brought out, and certainly it seems to me that no harm can be done to these parties if we get from the Court of Claims an ample and full and complete statement in relation to all these parties' claims, such facts as will tend to show whether the assignment was really delivered before the war or whether it was executed and left in escrow and in some incomplete form until after the war, and until after General Trimble had himself failed to collect the claim. I think, therefore, the substitute ought to be adopted.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, it appears from the report in this case that the deed of trust (and this bill is for the relief of the trustees) transfers all the property on the following terms:

First, to pay all his debts.

If there are debts outstanding, as suggested by some Senators, there is no benefit from this bill that could accrue to the ladies if they were living—

Then to hold for the use and benefit of Mrs. Trimble; and thirdly, to convey to her appointees.

With that deed standing as it does now, General Trimble came before the Department and claimed pay in his own name for this truss, and he put the claim at $3,535.96. Afterward he learned, as he supposed, that the Government had in some cases paid interest on such a claim. To my knowledge it never has been done unless by special act of Congress, and I do not even know such a case as that. He charges that a person who settled for the use of this patent paid interest on the amount of royalty he claimed. So he asked and in this report there is added $2,545.92 for the interest from 1861 to 1873, twelve years. By the terms of this report additional interest could be added up to 1884, or whenever the case shall be decided by the court.

This bill gives the Court of Claims equity jurisdiction. Does it have equity jurisdiction unless conferred by a bill like this? Not at all. It gives them the power to hear and adjudicate; it confers jurisdiction, authorizes them to "proceed as a court of equity and to render a judgment therein." That is a simple bill to pay to the trustees, both of whom I understand are dead, whatever sum may be found due. I venture to say that there never was a report accompanying a bill which left so much uncertain in one direction and bound a court so positively against all former rules of law and practice in another direction as this; and my surprise is that Senators who desire to have a fair claim for the benefit of anybody investigated, either by a court or Congress, should be unwilling that this, like thousands of other cases, should go to the Court of Claims for an inquiry into all the facts and circumstances, especially in view of the facts I mentioned in the beginning of this discussion, that this seems to provide for the payment of a major-general of the Confederate army for the use of materials in the construction by the Government of the United States of means to enable its citizens to go forth to prevent the destruction of Government property and prevent the destruction of railroads, of which that bridge was a part.

I have called attention to this case. If the Senate prefer to refer it to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, I have no objection, so that the case may be fairly considered, and if the court's report shows that this property, whatever it may be, will go to the benefit of innocent women, nobody will more cheerfully vote for it than I. This report raises an inquiry whether even the women who are to take, if they are living now under this trust, had any claim against the estate of Trimble at the time the trust was made. That appears on the second page of the report. It says:

It does not, however, appear whether or not this indebtedness existed at the date of the deed of trust.

This is claimed to be an indebtedness of $9,000, and these parties come in as a part of the creditors in one sense, and in another sense they seem to come in as the residuary owners of this property through Mr. Trimble. It is a very confused thing. I have studied it as carefully as I could, and I am so uncertain what the condition of it is, and I have heard no one attempting to explain it who agreed with another in regard to its present situation, that I hope it may be sent to the court for an inquiry and finding and report to Congress. Then, I can assure Senators if it shall be found to be a clean bill, and that the proper parties are to receive the money, I shall vote for it as cheerfully as any one.

Mr. HAMPTON. As the Senator from Michigan has attacked the report, and as I believe it has not been read, I ask for the reading of it. It covers the ground so completely, and the report itself is so unanswerable, that I ask that it be read.

Mr. CONGER. I had already asked that the report be read, and the reading was commenced, and this conversation or discussion intervened to prevent. Of course I desire that the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. HAMPTON, February 29, 1884, but before concluding,

Mr. HOAR (at 2 o'clock p. m.). I ask unanimous consent that the rest of this report, which consists merely of letters and certificates, be printed in the RECORD as if read.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope that will be done, and let the whole report go together into the RECORD as if read, and that the bill come up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will come up to-morrow of course. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks that the remainder of the report not read be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The report, which was submitted by Mr. HAMPTON on the 29th of February, is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, beg leave to report:

That they find all the facts of this case set forth in a report submitted by this committee to the Senate during the Forty-seventh Congress, and they adopt that report, hereto annexed, as expressing the views of the committee, and recommend the passage of the bill. The report is as follows:

"The facts are as follows, as shown by the papers accompanying this report:

"The trustees of Isaac R. Trimble claim that the United States are indebted to them for the use of Howe's patent truss in the construction of the 'Long Bridge' over the Potomac River, at this city, in the years 1860, 1861.

"Judge-Advocate Henry Goodfellow, under date July, 1876, in an official communication to the Secretary of War, reports the claim to have been theretofore at $6,081.88 for royalty on the Howe truss-bridge built on the Potomac River in 1861, 1862, and was first presented by Isaac R. Trimble himself. For a better understanding of the case as reported by Judge-Advocate Goodfellow, his letter is herein set forth, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, July, 1876.

In the matter of the claim of the creditors of Isaac R. Trimble for royalty in the use of Howe's patent truss in the "Long Bridge" over the Potomac River.

To the honorable the Secretary of War:

This is a claim heretofore stated at $6,081.88 for royalty on the Howe truss-bridge built over the Potomac River in 1861-'62, being a part of the "Long Bridge." The claim was first presented February 17, 1873, by Mr. Trimble himself, as owner of the patent, July 21, 1873. The Quartermaster-General reported the true amount of royalty at $3,500.45 (without interest), but cited an opinion of the Attorney-General, dated June 13, 1872, in the case of Smith & Woodruff, assignees of Hiram Sibley, for royalty on the "Sibley tent," to the effect that Smith & Woodruff should not be paid by the War Department, on account of Sibley's disloyalty.

Mr. Trimble having been a major-general in the rebel army, breaking up the railroad communications with Washington, and fighting against the Government of the United States at the very time the claim originated, it was rejected by the Secretary of War January 5, 1874.

January 23, 1874, the claim was again presented in the name of Mrs. Ann C. Trimble and Miss Georgianna Presstman, who claimed under and by virtue of a "deed of trust" from Mr. Trimble, made May 30, 1861, before his disloyal career.

This deed transferred all his property on the following trusts:

First, to pay all his debts; then to hold for the use and benefit of Mrs. Trimble; and thirdly, to convey to her appointees. Mr. S. T. Wallis, attorney for the Trimbles, begged that Mrs. Trimble should not suffer from any ill-advised action of her husband in presenting the claim in his own name, he having acted entirely upon his own motion without consulting the counsel of the trustees. Mr. Wallis further called attention to a recognition of the above-mentioned deed of trust by the Supreme Court of the United States in case of Railroad Company vs. Trimble (10 Wallace, 367) and by the United States district court for the Maryland district, and the case of the United States vs. The Real Estate of Isaac R. Trimble.

Upon this application the Quartermaster-General reported February 17, 1874, that the new presentation of the case left apparently no room to doubt that Mrs. Anne C. Trimble and Georgianna Presstman were entitled to receive the amount of the royalty which was stated in his former report, provided they could establish their loyalty to the satisfaction of the War Department. Thereupon Mr. Wallis was informed in a letter from Colonel Dunn, assistant judge-advocate-general, by direction of the Secretary of War, that it was then in order to present evidence of the loyalty of the new claimants.

Nothing further was heard of the claim until January 30, 1875, when Mr. H. Stockbridge, attorney for Mr. Trimble's creditors, addressed the War Department acknowledging that the decision arrived at in the claim as first presented was undoubtedly correct under the principle established in the case of the Sibley tent, and declaring his readiness at an early day to furnish full proof of the right and interest of the "cestuis que trust" under the above-mentioned deed, and also of their loyalty.

In this presentation Mrs. Trimble and Miss Georgianna Presstman claim as heirs one-fifth each of the estate of Ann F. Presstman, to which Mr. Trimble is sworn to be indebted in the sum of $9,000. It does not, however, appear whether or not this indebtedness existed at the date of the deed of trust. As to loyalty, Mrs. Trimble swears "that the said Anne C. Trimble was in favor of the Union of the States, opposed to the late civil war, and never supplied the rebel States with material aid or comfort, nor their armies, save alone in nursing my husband when sick and wounded, as enjoined in my marriage vow;" and Miss Georgianna Presstman swears "that she, the said Georgianna Presstman, has not at any time taken part with the enemies of the United States, was in favor of the Union, and opposed to the late civil war, and never supplied the rebel States or armies with aid or comfort, but lived quietly in the country from 1860 to 1865 in Baltimore County, Maryland."

These affidavits are supported by affidavits of J. Morrison Harris, of Baltimore County, to the effect "that he has been well acquainted with the parties in question both before and after the late civil war, and that their foregoing statements are entitled to full credit, to the best of his knowledge and belief."

* * * * * * *

(Here follow the names of creditors who swear to stated sums owing them by I. R. Trimble, and present affidavits of loyalty vouched for by citizens of Baltimore.)

In the case as thus presented there would seem to be no question involved except such as belonged more especially to the jurisdiction of the accounting officers of the Treasury, if the proofs of loyalty are accepted as sufficient, as they seem to me to be. It may be remarked, however, that the Quartermaster-General is not entirely satisfied with his own statement of the account in his report of July 21, 1873, the "spans" having been measured from the center of pier instead of in the clear. He is of the opinion, however, that the true extent of the words, "1 cent per foot for each span," should be left to the decision of the accounting officer.

On the other hand, Mr. Trimble presented statement of the account June 23, 1876, which is rather larger than the original statement of the Quartermaster-General. Mr. Trimble's statement is $3,932. He further states that in similar cases those who use the patent without leave have been charged with royalty and interest. He therefore adds $2,830 interest to February 7, 1873; total, $6,762.

It is respectfully recommended that the claim be now referred to the accounting officers of the Treasury for such action as they may deem just and proper in the premises.

HENRY GOODFELLOW,
Judge-Advocate.

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 23, 1882.

Extract copy of paper on file with claim No. 50683.

A. M. GANGEWER,
Deputy Third Auditor.

The claim, $6,081.88, being	$3,535 96
With interest from 1861 to February, 1873, twelve years	2,545 92
	6,081 88

was referred to War Department April 22, 1873, for report, and the following was made:

BARRACK AND QUARTERS BRANCH,
Quartermaster-General's Office, April 25, 1873.

Case of I. R. Trimble, for patent fees on Howe truss spans in Long Bridge over Potomac River, erected under the supervision of General McCallum, 1861, as per items enumerated	$3,535 96
Interest to February, 1873 (twelve years)	2,545 92
Total	6,081 88

Referred by War Department, April 22, 1873, for report.

February 17, 1873, claimant addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, indorsing the above claim, with statement that the facts alleged can be substantiated by General McCallum, under whose supervision the rebuilding of the bridge was executed. The reason for not presenting the claim before was owing to the rightful ownership of the patent being in dispute since 1860, and only decided in claimant's favor by the court of final appeal in 1870 (Report, 10 Wallace, United States Supreme Court) (copy with papers). Since that decision no one has disputed claimant's rights, and he enumerates a list of railroad companies, &c., who paid the patent fees on presentation, at the same rates which he has charged the Department. In support of this he incloses letters of Theo. Cuyler, esq., counsel of Pennsylvania Railroad, and Strickland Kneass, esq., of city of Philadelphia, and John L. Piper, manager of the Keystone Bridge Company, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The letter was referred February 21, 1873, to the Chief of Engineers for report.

That office, February 25, 1873, referred to Major Babcock, inviting "attention to the copy of letter from the Keystone Bridge Co. (herewith), in which it is stated that the first payment was made by B. B. French, Commissioner of Public Buildings.

"Please report any information that may be on the files of your office in relation to the construction of this bridge, contract for same, and payments."

Colonel Babcock, U. S. A., in charge of public buildings and grounds, returned April 9, 1873, as follows:

"I find that $20,000 was appropriated for the repair of Long Bridge August 6th, 1861 (volume 12, page 327), and the money was expended by B. B. French, then Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds.

"Upon an examination of his vouchers for the expenditure I find that no part of it was paid for the use of Howe's patent for truss bridges. The records of this office fail to give any further information on the subject.

"Under date of February 5, 1866, Theo. B. Samo, esq., engineer in charge of Washington Aqueduct, reported on the condition of Long Bridge, and a copy of the report is herewith transmitted. Attention is respectfully invited to Engineer Samo's report, with the papers."

* * * * * * *

General Humphreys, Chief Engineer, returned papers April 11, 1873, inviting attention to Colonel Babcock's report. Referred, as before stated, to this office for report.

Respectfully submitted to the Quartermaster-General for instructions.

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster, U. S. A.

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 21, 1882.

A true copy (extract) of paper on file with claim No. 50683.

A. M. GANGEWER,
Deputy Third Auditor.

"The claimants state that the claim was laid before the Secretary of War as early as 1865, but was not urged, owing to litigation springing up as to ownership of the patent, until the termination thereof by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States at its December term, 1870 (10 Wall., The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company vs. Isaac R. Trimble and Anne C. Trimble, his wife, and Georgiana Presstman, p. 367). This suit was decided that the rights under the assignment of the patent vested in the trustees of I. R. Trimble.

"An official copy of claimant's petition, and action thereon, is here appended:

Petition and claim of the trustees of I. R. Trimble for the use of "Howe's Patent Truss" in the "construction of the Long Bridge" over the Potomac River at Washington City, D. C., in 1860-'61.

This claim was laid before the Secretary of War as early as 1865, but soon after, in consequence of litigation involving the rights under the original patent, it was not urged until after 1870. In that year, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, at the December term, it was decided that the rights under the assignment of Howe were vested in the trustees of I. R. Trimble. (See 10 Wallace.)

By 1876 the evidence substantiating the justice of the claim was complete, as required by the War Department, when Mr. Henry Goodfellow, judge-advocate, made a report, July, 1876, in which he sums up the evidence, inclusive of testimony establishing the loyalty of the trustees and of the creditors of I. R. Trimble, concluding his report in these words: "It is respectfully recommended that the claim be now referred to the accounting officers of the Treasury for such action as they may deem just and proper in the premises." No action was taken on this report until 1878, when Senator Whyte, of Maryland, procured an order from the Secretary of War referring the claim to the Third Auditor of the Treasury for adjudication. The Third Auditor considered the claim and disallowed it for "want of jurisdiction." On application this decision was reconsidered by an order of the Secretary of War, February 15, 1881.

The Comptroller, W. W. Upton, on reconsidering the claim, thus concludes his decision: "The claimants must look to the courts or to Congress, as there is no evidence of any agreement to pay for the use of the patent."

Thus there is no resort for the claimants except through an act of Congress referring the subject to the Court of Claims with authority to adjudicate the case on principles of equity; and your petitioners will ever pray.

ANNE C. TRIMBLE.
GEORGIANA PRESSTMAN.

"Decision by Third Auditor upon a claim made by trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, for royalty (with interest thereon) for the use of Howe's patent truss in building Long Bridge over the Potomac River at Washington, D. C., in 1861-'62:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
December 19, 1878.

It is not contended that any contract, arrangement, or understanding was entered into on the part of the United States to secure the right to use the patent. The claim is therefore a claim for damages for alleged invasion of a patent right. Of such claims the accounting officers of the Treasury have no jurisdiction.

For want of jurisdiction the claim is disallowed.

The papers with this decision are respectfully transmitted to the Second Comptroller for consideration by him.

A. M. GANGEWER, Acting Auditor.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
February 24, 1879.

The within opinion of the honorable Third Auditor is concurred in.

W. W. UPTON, Comptroller.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 9, 1879.

The papers in the claim of the trustees of I. R. Trimble, of Baltimore, Md., for the use by the United States of a patented improvement described as "Howe's patent truss" for bridges, are, at the solicitation of claimant's counsel, respectfully returned to the accounting officers of the Treasury with a recommendation for reconsideration.

The claimant's counsel contend that it could not have been the intention of this Government to use the patent right in question without an implied engagement to pay for such use. This view entirely commends it to my judgment, but I must leave to the accounting officers the question of law whether the executive branch of the Government can now adjust this claim.

GEO. W. McCRARY, Secretary of War.

The SECOND COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
February 15, 1881.

Respectfully returned to the honorable Third Auditor.

As recommended by the honorable the Secretary of War, I have carefully reconsidered this claim, and admitting fully that the Government could not intend to use a patent right without compensation, still I can not find evidence of any agreement to pay either a certain amount or the reasonable value.

If the facts show the use by the Government of the claimant's patent right, the amount to be paid therefor must be ascertained by the courts or by Congress. The decision of the accounting officers is therefore reaffirmed.

W. W. UPTON, Comptroller.

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 3, 1882.

A true copy of papers on file with claim No. 50683.

A. M. GANGEWER,
Deputy Third Auditor.

"It will be observed that the acting Auditor disallows the claim 'for want of jurisdiction,' and transmits to the Second Comptroller, who concurs.

"It will be further observed that claimants' counsel asked a reconsideration, insisting 'that it could not have been the intent of the Government to use the patent right in question without an implied engagement to pay for the same,' and that this view is concurred in by the Hon. George W. McCrary, then Secretary of War, who, however, leaves to the accounting officers the question of law whether the executive branch of the Government can now adjust this claim.

"The Comptroller, upon review, adheres to his former opinion with the following in addition: 'If the facts show the use by the Government of the claimants' patent right, the amount to be paid therefor must be ascertained by the courts or by Congress.' This last decision is February 15, 1881.

"In the paper is the following copy of a letter from Hon. George W. McCrary, then Secretary of War, to the Hon. William Pinkney Whyte:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, November 21, 1878.

SIR: In answer to your postal inquiry respecting the claim of Isaac R. Trimble, of Maryland, for the use of the Howe truss by the Government, I have to advise you the last action, as shown by the records under date of November 24, 1877, was a letter to Hon. J. Morrison Harris, of Baltimore, informing him of my willingness to transmit the case to the Court of Claims, if the claimant should so desire. It does not appear that any answer to this letter was received.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. W. McCRARY, Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY WHYTE,
United States Senate.

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 21, 1882.

A true copy of paper on file with claim No. 50683.
A. M. GANGEWER,
Deputy Third Auditor.

"From the papers presented to the committee, it appears that the right to the use of the truss passed from Isaac R. Trimble, assignee of Howe, to claimants; that the delay in prosecuting from 1865 to 1870 is accounted for by the litigation as to ownership of the patent; that since then the claimants appear to have been exerting themselves to have their claim allowed; that it was not allowed "for want of jurisdiction," as stated by the Second Comptroller. In the opinion of the committee, the claimants have a right to establish the use by the Government of their patent; that they have not been paid therefor, and the reasonable value of use, and to introduce evidence of ownership and loyalty. In short, the examination made by the committee shows a state of case which, in the judgment of the committee, entitles the claimants to a hearing in the Court of Claims.

"Wherefore the committee report back Senate bill 1210, amended as therein shown, and recommend that the bill do, as amended, pass."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill 1448.

JOHN B. MONTEITH.

Mr. SLATER. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Maine while I call up a bill which was passed this morning and have it reconsidered in order to prevent a miscarriage of action between the two Houses. I refer to Senate bill 516. I move that it be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (S. 516) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased, for the purpose of taking up a House bill in the same words. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. Now I move to discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from the further consideration of the House bill which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks the indefinite postponement of Senate bill 516, which will be done, there being no objection. Now the Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take up House bill 1319.

Mr. SLATER. No; I move to discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from the further consideration of the House bill, it being before the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves to discharge the Committee on Indian Affairs from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon now moves that the Senate proceed to consider the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire if that bill has been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. SLATER. It has been considered and a Senate bill in the same words has been passed which I have had reconsidered in order that the House bill may take its place so that there shall not be a miscarriage of action between the two Houses.

Mr. DAWES. Are they the same?

Mr. SLATER. The same in words precisely.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the claimant in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

The bill in regard to that matter has been passed, and the claimant needs his papers for settlement in the Treasury Department.

The order was agreed to.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, when the Senate went into executive session yesterday, I was undertaking to argue that the logical and inevitable result of the adoption of the amendment for "free ships" would be an entering-wedge to our coastwise trade, would ultimately control it and destroy it, as England has controlled and destroyed our foreign merchant marine; and, Mr. President, it seems to me there is no escape from the proposition, that no man can be found so unwise and foolish as to purchase a foreign ship, well built, of good material, and place her under American registry with a limitation upon her rights imposed upon no other American ship carrying the American flag. And, sir, I am borne out in that proposition by Capt. John Codman. Who is Capt. John Codman? He is the drum-major of the whole "free-ship" band, and the magic of his wand sets the tune which shall be played. Capt. John Codman is the only man I know of who for ten years has besieged Congress in behalf of free ships. Capt. John Codman is the man of whom the Capital of last Sunday said:

The association of foreign steamship-owners and agents in New York, known as the "North Atlantic conference," has broken up and the companies are now engaged in a rather hot competition, which promises to destroy their profits during whatever period it may last. This association of foreign steamship-owners was an organization of which little was known by the general public. It disbursed large amounts of money in the interest of the foreign companies and some of it found its way to Washington. In fact, lobbying in the interest of the foreign ship-owners was one of the special purposes of the association. I am told that Capt. John Codman, the free-trade writer and agitator, was maintained for years by this organization. A gentleman closely identified with steamship interests told me that the funds of the "conference" were used freely to influence the New York press, and, whenever necessary, to influence official action in Washington.

Capt. John Codman, then, must be authority as to this point which I raise, and in his examination before the special committee of the last Congress in relation to this very thing he said:

I have suggested a limited tonnage—

I think his suggestion was 3,000 tons, was it not? The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] says it was—

I have suggested a limited tonnage, which will not materially interfere with the coasting trade, rather than the admission of ships to be used in the foreign trade exclusively.

"Materially interfere with the coasting trade!" All the best vessels nearly in our coasting trade to-day come very near the 3,000 tons. He says further:

The reason is, that no Americans would wish to own ships whose voyages they could not control.

That is perfectly sound. The folly of an American speculator who would go into the buying of a ship when he could not control her after she was bought would be supreme.

If they could not use them when they desired to do so in the coasting trade, they would prefer to own them as they own them now, under the British flag, because it is more economical, and they are protected by a more efficient navy than ours.

Says Mr. Codman, on the next page, in answer to a question by Mr. DINGLEY:

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it necessary for a foreign-built vessel to participate in the coasting trade?

Mr. CODMAN. Yes, sir.

After that the deluge. Admit to American registry foreign-built ships, then, logically, as you must be compelled to do, admit them to your coasting trade, and then the old hulks in England, the sailor-coffins lying there idle now, will be purchased for half what decent ships can be built for here or elsewhere and put into our coasting trade. There is a shipyard in Hull that never has built a ship fit to sail on the ocean, that does nothing under the sun except build the poorest, cheapest ships, fit only to be sold to the insurance companies, which is generally their destiny. Ships from that yard, ships pronounced unseaworthy by the engineers, ships discarded from service by the Chamberlain bill when it becomes a law, the old iron ships of England, would come in here and with their cheaper crews would take absolute possession of our coasting trade, and the pride of America would once more be humbled.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in bringing forward this amendment is a skillful physician for a very sick patient. He dares not offer the bitter pill of free ships. No, the patient would not take it, and therefore he sugar-coats it with the provision of his amendment for free material, giving one the sugar and the other the bitter dose. Who asked the Senator from Missouri for free materials? I say there is not a ship-builder in the United States who has asked for such free-ship materials as these. I say there is not an iron-ship builder in the United States who desires that free-material clause. I say there is not an iron-ship builder in the United States who can build ships in competition with "free ships," even with the help of that free-material clause. It admits iron anchors, cables, iron plates, castings, forgings, angle-iron, beams, masts, yards, rivets, bolts, nuts, screws, engines, boiler-plates, tubes, machinery, and in fact all the materials that go into the building of an iron steamer free of duty. The remedy would be useless: first, because it would require a much larger capital and a more extended credit on the part of the American ship-builder; second, because the necessary delay in filling an order for a 4,000-ton ship would consume at least four months' time; and third, the American ship-builder purchasing the materials for such an iron ship would be subjected to freight bills and other expenses to enable him to lay them down in his yard ready for use of about $40,000, while the Senator from Missouri under the free-ship clause could purchase the same materials fitted into a completed ship, freight her, sail her to New York, and it may be clear twenty or thirty thousand dollars by the voyage. Again, the "free materials" in cost would be about one-third of the completed ship. The other two-thirds, entirely labor, would be furnished by our mechanics at daily wages nearly double those prevailing in England.

How about these wages? I have here, very fortunately published recently, taken from an English paper, the wages which were adopted in English ship-yards only a few months ago:

Since the year came in the ship-yards have not worked half or even quarter the forces of last year. Whole yards are lying idle and in others the work hours have been cut down and wages reduced. On the 1st of March the following scale of time-wages went into effect: Carpenters, $1.32 per day; joiners, $1.28; spar-makers, $1.25; riveters and calkers, $1.20; smiths and riggers, $1.14; painters, $1.10; fitters, $1.08; sailmakers, $1.04; strikers, 80 cents. Piece-work was to be reduced 20 per cent. under the change. The workmen are intelligent enough to comprehend the situation and cheerfully accept the reduced wages.

In my State, in our ship-yards, where the other two-thirds of that ship must be built, the wages are to-day twice those named in that scale. The average of wages in the ship-yard in this country is $2 a day, while the average of this scale is about $1.08, so that you get your one-third in free materials under that clause. You have an extra charge upon them of $40,000 to bring them here. Then you have a double rate of wages under which to build and to fit for sea the other two-thirds of that ship, and the Senator from Missouri with his free-bought ship escapes the whole. I ask, in the name of a decent common sense, how does that free-material clause help us, indissolubly connected as it is with the clause admitting foreign-built ships free of duty to an American registry?

The House bill also comes to us sugar-coated with the limitation of 4,000 tons. Some Senators entertain the idea that there is comparative safety in such a limitation. The freight ships of to-day and of the future are to be 4,000 tons and upward. And no Senator need flatter himself with the idea that this restriction affords any protection.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine is a member of the Committee on Commerce; will he allow me to ask him whether the House bill has been reported to the Senate?

Mr. FRYE. It has been brought here.

Mr. MORGAN. It is in the Senate now?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir; it is on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I would ask whether that bill will be taken up and acted on as a substitute for this?

Mr. FRYE. I can not tell.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator favor that proceeding?

Mr. FRYE. That depends, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. That depends?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed we were engaged in some real act of legislation here, and not merely in a debating society proceeding over the question of free ships. I felt anxious that there should be something that there was a prospect of putting in the shape of law, and I hoped the Senator from Maine would bring up the House bill and let it be acted on in lieu of this bill, as this is a Senate bill and would have to go to the House and be put upon the Speaker's table, which is so heavily encumbered now, I believe, with more than two hundred Senate bills, the House never would get to it.

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand why the Senator should suggest that passing the Senate bill it may not become a law. Why is it a waste of time to pass the Senate bill?

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose that the two hundred orders or more which are on the Speaker's table would of course take precedence of this, and it would be perfectly understood that, the House having acted upon a bill and sent it to us, the Senate would act upon the House bill and not put them to the trouble of considering a bill of ours. Their bill came to us before we debated this question.

Mr. FRYE. It would be better for the Senate at once to adjourn and do no more business if that is the assumption upon which we are to proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, it would be better that we should adjourn than not to try to do a thing, or to debate something which is a mere pretense of doing business, when in fact it has no sort of direction.

Mr. FRYE. I decline to be interrupted further. I hardly see what that has to do with this question. I thought the Senator wished to ask a question.

Mr. MORGAN. I asked it and got an answer.

Mr. FRYE. I say the House bill came to the Senate with the limitation of 4,000 tons intended to satisfy Senators that that proposition was a safe one; but I ask any Senator here within hearing of my voice what his reply is to me, if that becomes a law, and I ask the right to import a 3,000-ton ship, or a 2,000-ton ship, or any ship? Why should a man worth a million dollars be permitted to go abroad and buy a 4,000-ton ship for two or three hundred thousand dollars less than he can buy it here, and the man of smaller means, wishing to buy a 3,000-ton ship, be compelled to pay the higher price for the American ship? What is the logic of that? There is none. As a matter of course, if you to-day put the limitation of 4,000 tons on the ship that may be imported, to-morrow that limitation will be removed; it must be removed logically, and you must admit any ship that any man wishes to buy to an American register or none at all.

Then, again, the House proposition is utterly absurd in this, more absurd than the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, because the House bill leaves the duty from 30 to 45 per cent. upon all materials entering into a ship and admits a 4,000-ton ship free from all duty.

Mr. BAYARD. In the debate, if I may refer to it, there was a clear admission that the free-material clause should accompany the free-ship clause.

Mr. FRYE. I have undertaken to show that the free-material clause is not worth a cent to a ship-builder with free ships coupled with it, and that no ship-builder asks for it, nor could it be taken advantage of.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine is interrupted now, and if he will allow me, he to-day announced that no ship-builder in this country was willing for free ships even if free materal was allowed. Am I correct in that?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. A dispatch was sent to me a little while ago from a friend in the House which reads thus:

DETROIT, MICH., April 30, 1884.

FRANK H. HURD:

If you will give us free materials we are willing to have free ships and fear no competition.

FRANK E. KIRBY.

Mr. Kirby represents the largest iron-ship building industry on the great lakes.

FRANK H. HURD.

I called on the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] a few moments ago and asked him who Mr. Kirby was, and he corroborated what Mr. HURD said, that he was connected with the largest ship-building industry there, a highly respectable and a very intelligent man. That is all I know about it.

Mr. FRYE. I am not surprised that one should be found in the whole country, nor would it amaze me if Mr. Kirby failed to understand the amendments.

Again, sir, there is another interest to be looked out for here in this matter of free ships. There are iron-ship yards in this country doing to-day an immense business, and prepared to do very much more. Take the ship-yard of William Cramp & Sons, of Philadelphia, and there is no ship-yard that stands higher. Their names are known all over this country and all over Europe. They have built some of the best vessels that ever have been built in the world. They built a few months ago a vessel called the San Pueblo. It carried 4,500 tons dead weight; an iron steamship. It cost $350,000. It was built for the Pacific Improvement Company. Its first voyage was from New York to Port Said, and it made it quicker than any ship anywhere ever did before. It went through the Suez Canal, the first large American steamer that ever went through the canal. It sailed from there to Singapore. It made the quickest time from New York to Singapore that ever was made by any steamship. The voyage was successful. William Cramp & Sons have been two generations in establishing their reputation as ship-builders. They have a plant of at least $1,200,000. They have all the machinery necessary for building iron ships. Mr. Cramp told me that in eight months' time he could float six 4,000-ton ships from his yard. He has to-day three iron ships on the stocks, and one just launched, averaging over 3,000 tons each. He has immense machinery, everything required for building ships of three, four, five, or six thousand tons. That business built up with an experience of two generations is worth something to the owners, but more to the United States.

Take John Roach. He has a plant of over $2,000,000 invested in the Morgan Iron Works in New York city and in his yards at Chester. He is prepared to build ships of any size, and has built several over 5,000 tons burden. He employs 3,000 men, has all of the appliances, all of the tools, everything necessary in his own ownership to commence from the very bottom and build every part of his ship and float her on the ocean. That ship-yard is worth something to the United States of America.

Take the Harlan and Hollingsworth Company, names as familiar as household words in this country as ship-builders, names above reproach anywhere, experienced, skilled men, with experienced and skilled laborers, and a million dollars for a plant. Their ship-yard is of value to this Republic. Take Pusey & Jones, also experienced ship-builders; a million-dollar plant. Take Gorringe's new company on the Delaware; I presume a million-dollar plant, too. Take Neaffie & Levy at Philadelphia; another million dollars. Take the Dialogue Works in New Jersey; another million dollars.

By the last census there were 2,188 ship-building establishments, with a capital invested of $20,979,874. In those establishments there were 21,845 workmen, who received in wages annually $12,713,813. Besides these employers and employés directly affected by the passage of a free-ship bill there are the iron and steel manufacturers, their workmen, iron-ore and coal miners, lumbermen and raftsmen, sail and boiler makers, boiler and steam-engine works outside the ship-building establishments, associated together, employing more than 1,000,000 men.

It was a slight thing in olden days to own a ship-yard. Three thousand dollars would be plant enough for the building of the wooden ship. But when it comes to building iron ships it will take a million dollars at least, especially to build a ship of 4,000 tons and upward. Mr. Goss, the leading wooden-ship builder in the United States, living in my own State, at Bath, Me., building more wooden ships to-day than all the rest of the ship-builders together, has already entered into an agreement with Boston parties to go down here to Alexandria and invest $1,000,000 in an iron-ship yard there, the iron and the coal being nearer than in his own State and the saving of freight being great. They are simply awaiting the result of this bill in Congress.

I submit that free ships would ruin every yard that I have named in this country and would stop absolutely every project for new yards. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who interrupted me a moment ago, has in his State the best opportunity for iron-ship building that is to be found in the United States—coal, iron, water lying right side by side, and the land to-day not worth more than $15 an acre. Pass this free-ship clause and it never will be worth more. Pass the rest of this bill and leave the free-ship clause off, and in less than ten years there will be millions of dollars invested in the State of Alabama in building iron ships, for the experience of men shows that you must go where the iron and the coal and the water are; you can not afford to bring the coal and the iron where you are.

Who has asked for free ships? Has any ship-owner? Has any ship-builder? Has any ship-carpenter asked for free ships? Has any mechanic working in those ship-yards asked for free ships? Have any of the million of men who to-day are interested in ship-building in this country, directly or indirectly, as laborers, ever asked for free ships? No one asks for them except importers, who ask for free trade in everything. France and England and Germany would like free ships. Of course they would, and then in the event of a war they would know where to go with their merchant ships. They would go under the American flag, and each one of those nations with a free-ship clause could save 25 per cent. at least in the expense of maintaining a navy to take care of their great commercial interests. It is for this England so persistently seeks it at our hands, not for the sake of selling ships.

Once more I wish to appeal to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. Here is a bill every section of which is admitted to be healthy, wise, just, every section of which and every amendment that the committee proposes to make to it, relieving American shipping from serious burdens it has borne now for a century, every section of it calculated to help to the revival of the merchant marine, the committee of the House unanimously agreeing that that is so, the Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate unanimously agreeing that it is so. Why, I ask him, should he, then, where there is absolute agreement upon every other clause, bring in here a proposition which at least one-half would believe would be absolute destruction to the interests involved, which every ship-builder believes would destroy his ship-yard, which every ship-owner knows would depreciate the ships in his hands?

Mr. President, I was asked by several Senators to explain generally this bill, and as briefly as I can I will. Section 1 provides that officers of American ships other than the captain may under certain circumstances be foreigners. The law requiring American ships to be officered entirely by Americans was passed many years ago, was well at the time because our sailors were American, and in case a mate or second mate was disabled there was no difficulty in supplying his place in a foreign port. To-day it is changed; the most of our seamen are foreigners, and frequently now an American ship in a foreign port with a disabled mate can not supply his place with an American officer. To that section there is no objection, unanimously reported by the House committee, unanimously reported by the Senate committee, passed the House of Representatives twice, passed the United States Senate without division.

Sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 relate entirely to what is known as extra wages. The statutes to-day provide that in almost every contingency if an American master discharges his sailors in a foreign port, with or without their consent, he shall pay three months' extra wages, besides all the wages that are due—two months to go to the sailor and one month to the United States Treasury. That was well when it became a law and our sailors had homes, were American, and did not wish to be left in foreign ports; but to-day our sailors are at home in one port as in another, and are as willing to be discharged in one port as in another. Yet if you undertake even with the consent of your crew to discharge them in a foreign port you are compelled to pay three months' extra wages. Twice since I have been in Congress I have recovered, in one case $1,500 and in another twelve hundred and odd dollars, for fees exacted under that law. I have a dozen cases lying in my desk where those wages have been exacted, on one ship twice within three months, amounting to over $3,000. The proposed amendments of our law correspond almost entirely with the English law. England has repealed the extra-wage clause. It now, only in unusual circumstances, allows one month's wages to be exacted, and that one month's wages in England is only a little over half the one month we provide for in this bill for American ships and American sailors. These three clauses have passed unanimously three committees, twice through the House, once through the Senate without a division, again unanimously from the Senate Committee on Commerce, and I believe there is no objection to them.

The ninth section provides for the return of sailors home left in foreign ports sick or destitute. The law as it stands to-day compels every American vessel to take two for each one hundred tons burden and carry them home and receive as pay $10. The average voyage from Melbourne to New York is one hundred to one hundred and ten days, and under that law an American master in Melbourne is compelled to take two destitute or sick sailors for each one hundred tons and carry them, supporting them in every way for one hundred and ten days, for $10. This section repeals that law, and provides that it shall be $10 where the voyage does not exceed thirty days and where it exceeds thirty days it may be $20.

Section 10 is a provision about advance wages. It is purely philanthropic. It is tentative entirely. I have little or no faith in it; but the friends of the sailors, the humanitarians, were exceedingly anxious to have some section here to prevent the advanced wages. To-day the sailors are in the hands of boarding-house keepers. The boarding-house keeper makes the demand upon the captain of the ship; the captain of the ship advances two months' wages; the boarding-house keeper gets the whole of it; the sailors taken on board the ship are compelled to work two months for nothing, and no one has received a dollar of payment except the boarding-house keeper and the groggeries in the cities. This is an attempt to rectify that. I do not believe it can be done. I never yet have seen any power on earth equal to the power of a sailor boarding-house keeper; anything can be evaded. England has tried for fifteen years to stop that and has not succeeded. This is our first attempt by legislation. I suppose no one will object to the trial.

Section 11 requires the ship to carry a complement of clothing, tobacco, &c., and slop-chest. That is necessary, so that the sailor may supply himself when he gets on board, and nobody objects to it.

Section 12 repeals all consular fees now charged to vessels. It may amount to $100,000 a year. Our consular system is self-supporting. Last year the United States made $50,000 or $60,000 out of its consular system, and I see now one branch of the Government in its economic frenzy is cutting down the wages of the consuls still more. Why, when the United States vessels and vessels from other countries support them and pay into the Treasury of the United States $50,000 or $60,000 of excess every year? The bill repeals those consular fees, the whole of them. That also has passed Congress, both branches; it has passed the committees unanimously, and no one objects to it.

Section 14 relates to the tonnage tax. We collect now, from what is known as a war tax, the tonnage tax, $1,400,000 a year, from vessels. That is all covered into the United States Treasury and is clear profit. About $300,000 of it comes from our vessels and the balance from foreign ships. If it all came from ours we would repeal it as a war tax as unfit to stand. Foreign governments charge us, not tonnage tax, but light dues and other taxes more than the equivalent of this tax. Therefore it is deemed wise to retain this. But under existing law a 2,000-ton ship which makes only one voyage in a year pays a tax of $600 for that year. An English steamship of 2,000 tons making ten round voyages in the year pays $600 and no more, the steamer paying no more than the sailing vessel.

We have undertaken to provide in the bill against that discrimination against the sailing vessel, and we provide that the tonnage tax shall be 3 cents a ton on certain vessels certain voyages, not exceeding 15 cents in any year, and collected at every entry. We provide further that on other ships and on other voyages it shall be 6 cents at each entry, not to exceed 30 cents, the present amount, for any one year. I presume there would be no objection to that. That would leave in the Treasury of the United States above $1,000,000 a year.

Section 15 relates to the hospital tax. We collect under our law to-day 40 cents every month from every sailor on an American ship for the support of hospitals. It amounts to $400,000 a year, and it just about supports the hospitals. I think (the Senator from Missouri will remember) it came within a few thousand dollars last year, did it not?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. It just about supports the hospitals. Every civilized nation has hospitals for its sailors, and no civilized nation charges the sailors for it. This is a charge against the sailors, but the vessels are compelled to pay it, of course, because in shipping our crews every sailor knows the fact he is to be taxed 40 cents a month, and that amount is added to his wages, so that the vessels here pay $400,000 a year, and the vessels of no other country pay a cent for like service. We have provided for its absolute repeal.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me to inquire—I looked at it, but I am not prepared myself to state—is the committee entirely satisfied that we can give no relief in regard to the tonnage tax to American ships without the law also affecting foreigners the same way?

Mr. FRYE. That was the conclusion they arrived at after an examination. I had supposed formerly that it could be done, but I examined it with a good deal of care and came to the conclusion it could not be.

Mr. BECK. I was aware that the Senator from Maine at one time thought it possible, so I asked him the question, though I was not sure myself.

Mr. FRYE. I remember that about the same time, and in about the same discussion, I stated another thing which I thought I knew absolutely, and that was that it was in the power of the United States to relieve those ships from taxation. I think a good many and very much abler lawyers than I am had the same opinion, and yet on consulting the Senator from Missouri once he informed me that he thought I had better look over the law. I did so, and in about two hours' time

I came to the conclusion that the United States was utterly powerless in the premises, that it was a matter within the States and for the States, and that the United States could not do it. I am happy to be able to say that I learn something every day, and the more I associate with distinguished gentlemen like the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky the more I am learning; but I never shall learn to like free ships from either of them.

The House bill provides in one section that the cost of supporting the hospitals shall be charged to the collection from the tonnage tax. This bill contains no such provision.

Section 16 provides that all articles of foreign production, supplies for vessels engaged in the foreign trade, shall be taken from bonded warehouses free of duty. That section created some commotion. The men who are engaged in the manufacture of rigging, sails, and cordage appeared before the committee and protested against it, because it admitted free of duty all which would go into the equipment of a ship. I hardly believed it. I understood the words "supplies" and "stores" to be technical and not to apply to equipment; but rather than make any mistake I addressed a note to Mr. James, chief of the customs division of the Treasury Department, in Washington, asking him, and I received the following reply. In order to quiet those gentlemen I will have it read and made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 18, 1884.

DEAR SIR: In answer to the inquiries contained in your note of yesterday, I have to state that the words "ship-stores" and "ship supplies" are understood in the practice of this office as equivalent to each other and to the corresponding words "sea-stores" and "sea supplies," and appears to have been generally applied to such articles as are consumed on board, by being eaten, drunk, or burnt; that rigging, sails, anchors, chronometers, &c., are designated as equipment, and that the question what quantity of sea stores or supplies should be dutiable as sufficient is wholly within the judgment of the collector of customs to whom the list of such supplies is presented by the master of an arriving vessel.

Very respectfully,

H. B. JAMES,
Chief of Customs Division.

Hon. W. P. FRYE, United States Senate.

Mr. FRYE. This simply puts us on an equality with the English ship-owner as to supplies. He has always had them free of duty and the right to withdraw them from bonded warehouses.

Section 17 is a provision in which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will feel some interest. There is a statute somewhere (I tried to find it this morning and could not) which provides that articles of American manufacture for foreign markets made wholly from foreign materials shall be entitled to a drawback of 90 per cent. when exported. We manufactured a great many different agricultural implements, and very early the Treasury Department put a construction upon that law which forbade the manufacturer from putting into the article anything of American product, holding that even if a piece of wood of American growth was used he could not get his 90 per cent. drawback; and by several statutes we have provided against that construction for agricultural implements.

We have been building ships for the South American markets principally under that statute, and the Treasury Department has held the same construction, that if a plank of American growth was put into the ship no drawback could be received. That is distinguishing against us, our products and our people, and it is compelling the builder in order to get the drawback to send abroad for every dollar's worth of the material. This section provides, as has been provided about agricultural implements, that if the ship is manufactured wholly or in part of foreign material the builder shall be entitled to the drawback on the articles imported. That will have a very beneficial effect, and will enable the ship-builder on the Delaware River to build all the vessels required for the South American waters.

Section 18 touches the individual liability of ship-owners. To-day, except as otherwise provided by statute, in case of collisions, torts, embezzlements, &c., the American ship-owners are simply copartners. A dozen in the ownership, each a twelfth, or more or less, as ships are owned in our country, are copartners in the law, and in any contracts that are made, no matter what they may be, each one is held for the whole. This deters many men of wealth from undertaking to build ships. It will be remembered that we are not copartners in the ordinary association of such. It will be remembered that my share of the ship can be disposed of without the consent of the others. At any day, at any moment, I can register the bill of sale, and I am no longer a member of the copartnership, and so every share of the ship may be disposed of without the consent of the other owners. It must be understood, too, that we have no more control of our ships as ship-owners than the stockholders in a great factory have; not so much, because our ship is out of our sight three-fourths of the time. We relieve stockholders in these corporations from any liability beyond their stock simply because they are conducted by agents and superintendents; but your ship is controlled by agents and superintendents, and those agents are out of your sight and out of your reach for months at a time. I believe that that liability should be limited, and it will be a great inducement and encouragement to men of wealth to invest in ships.

Mr. BROWN. To what is the liability limited?

Mr. FRYE. To the extent of the amount owned, the same as in a corporation.

The committee have authorized me to offer certain amendments to the bill, which I will address myself to at this moment. The first two amendments are suggested by the able speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] made on free ships when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration. One serious objection urged by the Senator was that if we shipped a crew in Liverpool for a round voyage to New York and back we were compelled to discharge them in New York and reship them. If we shipped them for three months and we entered a home port twice in the three months we were compelled to discharge them each time and reship them. The Senator from Missouri complained that it increased the wages and thus made a discrimination against American ships. I complained not that it did that, but that it placed an additional expense upon the American ship which was without reason. It costs the Philadelphia line $6,000 every year to reship when they hire their hands by the year at so much a month. These two provisions commend themselves to the Senator from Missouri for the one reason, to me for the other, and to the committee unanimously for both. I have no doubt they will be productive of great good. In fact, I have received letters and telegrams already indicating the importance in which they are held elsewhere.

The next amendment I am authorized to offer is a section in reference to the painting of the name of the ship on the stern. Not very important that must appear to Senators. Many of our ship-owners in the State of Maine think more of that than they do of the rest of this bill. The man who owns a ship looks upon her as his wife or his children; he loves his ship; and under the law as it stands to-day he is required to paint on the stern the name, it may be that of his wife or of his daughter and the port to which she belongs. For seventy-five years the port to which she belonged was construed to be the place where she was owned, and if a man built a ship in Surry and she was owned there, he painted on the stern the "Mary Ann, from Surry, Me." In 1875 a sharp Treasury official discovered that it was a violation of the law. He reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary issued an order that all those ships must bear the name of the port of entry regardless of where they were built or owned. They are building vessels, home vessels, owned at home, owned in families, in many instances by the blacksmith, the carpenter, the captain, and the mate. Their vessels they wish to name after one of the family and the home, the place where she is owned and built, and yet under the construction of the Treasury Department she may be the "Julia Ann" from Machias, her port of entry, but actually built and owned a hundred miles from there. Take Bath and Richmond, on the Kennebec River—Bath, the greatest ship-building city in the United States to-day of wooden ships; her rival, Richmond, is fifteen miles above. The men who build their ships in Richmond regard it as about as serious a wrong as can be imposed upon them by law to compel them to put a ship built there and owned there under the name of Bath, her port of entry, and Bath would fully reciprocate under like circumstances. I take it that no Senator will object to that provision.

Mr. HALE. Just there let me ask my colleague, was not the reason for the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury that the technical view was taken of the word "port," and it was concluded there could be nothing but the port of entry, thereby taking away this privilege from the men who built the ship?

Mr. FRYE. I so understand it.

The next provision I was authorized to offer was:

That until the provisions of section 1, chapter 376, of the laws of 1882 shall be made applicable to passengers coming into the United States by land carriage, said provision shall not apply to passengers coming by vessels employed exclusively in the trade between the ports of the United States and the ports of the Dominion of Canada or the ports of Mexico.

A law was passed in 1882 imposing a head-tax upon emigrants of 50 cents a head. It was for the benefit principally of New York city. It intended to apply as a matter of course to emigrants crossing the ocean. Nobody dreamed it would apply to those coming across a river or a bridge or a ferry-boat, or anything of that kind, from Canada. Under that law to-day every steamer sailing from Portland or Eastport or Machias, Me., across one hundred miles to Saint John or up the Saint John River or down to Halifax is compelled to pay 50 cents a head for every Canadian returning in her to the United States. There is a railroad running right down by the coast going straight across the Saint John River into Saint John city, and that can bring all the emigrants it pleases without being subject to any tax. You may take it up the Saint Lawrence River, it is the same. If you ride over the railroad bridge you pay no tax; if you come across the ferry-boat you pay 50 cents a head; and so all the way along the borders of the Canadian coast down the lakes and the rivers. It is working a great hardship and injustice, and it ought not to apply except as this provision directs it shall. I trust that amendment will be adopted.

Now, I come to what I regard as the most important provision of the whole bill, and that is sections 19 and 20. Under the law to-day the United States seizes an American vessel, detains her at the wharf until the mail-bag is ready, puts the mail-bag on board, compels her to deliver it at the port of destination, and pays her about 1 cent a letter. In one-third of the cases to South American ports it does not pay the ship the actual cost of delivering the letters at the port of destination.

To all the Mexican and South American ports last year the whole amount paid for carrying the United States mails was $10,351.57 under that infamous law. I say that $10,351.57 did not pay $5,000 over and above the actual cost of handling and delivering those mails. Let me present a table showing the sums paid last year for ocean mail service:

Statement showing the sums paid for ocean conveyance of mails exchanged between the United States and Mexico and South America during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, and the lines of vessels employed in the conveyance of said mails.

Last year we paid the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for carrying the United States mails $21,559.34, 7 cents a mile. We paid the American line from Philadelphia to Queenstown $3,006.37, 3 cents a mile; and two years ago we paid from Galveston to Brashear, for one year, $50,000, or a dollar a mile. That was a coastwise vessel, while the former was an American vessel sailing to foreign ports.

Great Britain carried last year 46,051,500 letters on the ocean; the United States carried 23,958,691. The United States made $1,300,000 and covered it into the Treasury; and Great Britain paid $1,600,000 more than she received for twice the number of letters. The United States, under that infamous statute which authorizes the Postmaster-General to seize a vessel and compel her to take the mails, covers into the Treasury every year over a million dollars taken out of the merchant marine, and then Senators wonder what is the trouble with this service, and every time any attempt has been make to repeal that section the cry of "subsidy" has been raised and the repeal has never been made.

The United States paid last year for its whole foreign mail service about $279,000; $40,000 of it went to American ships; the balance of it, about $239,000, to foreign ships. The largest price paid by the United States to an American vessel was 7 cents a mile. What is it in the steamboat service on our rivers, lakes, and coast? San Francisco, Cal., to Eureka, Cal., $6,500 a year—58 cents a mile; Portland, Oreg., to The Dalles, Oreg., $7,487—21 cents a mile; Seattle, Wash., to Sehome, Wash., $8,439.83—32 cents a mile; Port Townsend, Wash., to Sitka, Alaska, $16,000—$1.23 a mile; San Francisco, Cal., to Portland, Oreg., $22,000—69 cents a mile; New Tacoma, Wash., to Port Townsend, Wash., $29,700—97 cents a mile. How does that contrast with the 7 cents a mile to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and 3 cents a mile to the expiring Philadelphia and Queenstown line? How can Senators justify the continuance on the statute-book of a statute which does that gross injustice? What is the difference between sailing and carrying your mails across the ocean to a foreign port and carrying them from Galveston to Brashear, or from Boston to Portland, or from New York to Baltimore? Why do you apply one rule in the one case and another rule in the other? Why is it a subsidy for you to pay a reasonable price for carrying the mail to Liverpool and not a subsidy when you pay an unreasonable price for carrying it to Sitka?

Take your star-routes. I have half a dozen of them here, which I will present, where the pay per mile to one is 20 cents, to another 27 cents, to another 25 cents, to another 45 cents, and to another 29 cents.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 7th instant (No. 64025 Stat.) I have the honor to inform you that this office can not give you the weight of mails on steamboat and star mail-routes, but the following table will show you the length of travel, the frequency, and cost of six of the largest of the steamboat routes, and also six of the largest star-routes:

Very respectfully,
Hon. JAMES S. CRAWFORD, Superintendent Foreign Mails.

H. D. LYMAN, Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Why, Mr. President, the average paid on star-routes and steamboat service coastwise is 57½ cents a mile, and the average paid on the ocean for your foreign mail service, when you are trying to recover and restore your merchant marine, is not 5 cents a mile. Why? Because the Postmaster-General has absolute power and dominion over your vessels under that statute.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky shied when he struck these two sections. He said that he had a little fear that there might be a subsidy here. What is a subsidy? The Senator from Missouri in his speech the other day said that England never paid a subsidy; she paid for carrying the mail. Is this a subsidy, paying for carrying the United States mail at a fair and reasonable price? Is the Senator from Kentucky unwilling to pay a fair and reasonable price for this service? Does the Senator from Kentucky believe that it is not only right but it is the duty of the United States to pay a fair price for carrying the mail anywhere? It never will until this section of the statutes is repealed.

This bill simply provides that the United States may pay as much as it receives—no more; that is to say, the foreign mails shall be self-supporting. Is that subsidy? Suppose it was required of Kentucky, let me see how she would come out. We paid last year for mail service and mail facilities in Kentucky $135,816.93 more than Kentucky paid us; we paid for Missouri $305,429.17 last year more than we got from the mail service there; we paid for Texas $749,238.64 last year more than we received; we paid for Arkansas $540,309.56 more than we received. We even paid for the great State of Ohio nearly $600,000 last year for her mail facilities over and beyond what the State of Ohio actually paid into the United States Treasury for the Post-Office establishment. Suppose we take Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, and the rest of those States, and say that that is a subsidy, and refuse to give them any more than this section gives for the foreign mails, why should we not? I will submit this table as a matter of information:

The profit column shows the amount that the receipts are greater than the expenditures for the year.

The loss column shows the amount that the expenditures are greater than the receipts.

Very respectfully,

W. B. THOMPSON,
General Superintendent.

Mr. President, I have here a statement of the Postmaster-General showing our foreign mail service for 1883. I have already stated the amount, but it is necessary for information as to the other sections of this bill that this should be printed:

Statement showing approximately the net revenues of the Post-Office Department of the United States on mail matter sent to and received from foreign countries during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, based upon the tabulated estimate of mail matter exchanged during that period, given on page 697 of the Postmaster-General's Report for 1883:

RECEIPTS.

Amount of postage prepaid on letters sent abroad	$1,450,078 90
Amount of postage prepaid on postal cards sent abroad	32,328 26
Amount of postage prepaid on printed matter sent abroad	451,357 92
Amount collected on unpaid mail matter received	145,148 46
40 per cent. on $52,507.80 of registration fees on 525,078 registered articles sent abroad, this being estimated as net profit on registration	21,003 02
Total receipts	2,099,916 56

EXPENDITURES.

Amount paid for sea conveyance, other than intermediary or transit, namely:
1. To foreign vessels, including French packets		$284,076 41
2. American vessels		32,445 72
Amount paid foreign administrations for intermediary, territorial, and sea transit of United States mails	$86,745 91

Mr. President, England of course is a model in these matters of shipping. I admit that she is, and that we should do well to follow her. Has she ever pursued any policy like this to her ships in ocean service? Let me look for a few moments. In 1837 England made her first mail contract. In 1840 she made one with Samuel Cunard to build a line of mail steamships for the North Atlantic. In 1840 he had four 1,200-ton wooden side-wheel steamers; speed, nine knots under favorable circumstances. It did not cost over $200,000 each to build them, making a total cost of $800,000 for those vessels. Mr. Cunard received from England $413,000 the first year for carrying the mail on those ships, and the second year $550,000, or nearly 70 per cent. on his whole investment. We pay 3 cents a mile.

She contracted with the Oriental Steamship Company in 1840 for a monthly service to Japan and China, and paid $1,121,500; increased it the next year to $2,243,000. She also made contracts with the Royal Mail Steamship Company to the West Indies and Brazil, with the Pacific Steam Navigation Company to the west coast of South America. In 1850 she was paying annually $4,523,666 for carrying the mails, 30 per cent. on the capital invested that year in her ships. She made a contract with the Peninsula and Oriental Company for $2,500,000 in 1853, and renewed it in 1867. She made a new contract in 1870 with the same company, and in the articles of agreement provided that the vessels should be of a certain kind and fitted for war purposes. Besides this, other governments pay the same English ships.

Take the Royal Mail Steamship Company and the Pacific Steamship Company: Brazil and other countries pay them $1,000,000 more a year, besides what England pays them. The official reports of the English post-office department show that England paid in 1880 $3,708,618, the other countries paid these lines enough to make it $5,000,000 for carrying the mail, and the same year we paid for carrying the United States mail $279,000, and the English lines were getting $5,000,000. Brazil paid them $950,000. The same year the United States and South American States paid them nearly $800,000 more.

France paid last year $5,000,000 for carrying her mail, and not content with that, she has a law now, which I believe is the best one ever enacted, by which she pays bounties to the builders of her ships and bounties for the sailing of them. I will present a statement of the French law, as reported by Mr. Frazier:

To illustrate this new French bounty law, apply it to a 3,000-ton iron ship. The bounty would be—

On building:

Weight of iron in hull, 1,800 tons, at $12	$21,600
Weight of machinery, 500 tons, at $24.43	12,615

Then there is allowed 30 cents per ton for every 1,000 miles run, after being put in service, for first year, diminishing 1 cent per mile each year thereafter.

Presuming the above 3,000-ton steamer makes ten trips from Havre to New York per annum, or 60,000 miles, this gives for first year's service as follows: Three thousand tons at 30 cents = $900×60 = $54.000; and second year's service, $52,000. This bounty expires entirely at the end of thirty years. Adding the bounty and allowance per mile, the law would grant the 3,000-ton ship the first year $89,015. The French Government for this requires in return the carrying of its official mails, and the right to use the ships in case of war, taking them at a fair valuation.

Bismarck, the distinguished German statesman, in speaking of this French law, with the keen criticism of premier, said: "The merchant marine is the handmaid of all other industries, of agriculture and of commerce, and this act will create for France a powerful navy, which may prove of effective service in time of war."

Mr. President, that is the condition of things. There are France and England and Germany paying not only fair prices, but munificent prices for carrying their mails, establishing their lines all over the world, keeping them running, in one instance England, when she saw the line in trouble, guaranteeing 8 per cent.—that comes pretty near a subsidy; and here we are paying to-day about $250,000 a year under this compulsory process. Mr. President, we have provided for the repeal of that law, and we have provided in that section that the Postmaster-General shall make contracts for the carrying of foreign mails in American vessels, as he makes contracts for carrying the coastwise mails in steamers. He shall advertise, receive proposals, let to the lowest bidder, and the sum paid shall not exceed $1 a mile. That is the provision of these sections. There is no injustice in it, no subsidy, nothing from which the purest statesman on earth may shrink from enacting into law.

What do I expect that this bill will do? Do I expect that it will lead to the establishing of lines from the United States to Europe? I certainly do not. I do not believe that we can maintain them under the provisions of this bill if each provision becomes a law. But there is one thing I do think can be accomplished. I believe that if the provisions of this bill become a law in less than five years we shall have regular lines of steamers to every South American port of any importance; and it is to Mexico, the isthmian and the South American States that the United States must look for its exports; not to France, not to England, not to Germany. They can manufacture cheaper than we can, and each country manufactures for sale more than can be consumed at home.

South America and Mexico manufacture nothing, will not in the next century, and they open up to us a place where we may deposit the surplus of our products which can not be consumed by our own people, and in my judgment we must look to them alone; and can we have hope in that direction without regular lines? A manufacturing company in my city a few years ago undertook to sell cotton goods in Rio de Janeiro, to send a half-year's productions. They forwarded them to New York, then they were shipped on an English steamer, carried to Liverpool, reshipped on another English steamer, and carried in her to Rio de Janeiro; and the mails went the same way. Those goods were handicapped from the very minute they left the wharf in New York city until the minute they were stored in Rio de Janeiro.

Without lines of direct communication, regular communication with these ports, we never can hope to establish trade there. I read a while ago an exceedingly interesting article from the New Orleans Times-Democrat touching these countries. I wish to put in here for the benefit of those who may happen to read my speech a few items showing the importance of this trade.

Take Mexico, lying right by us, with whom we have recently made a treaty. Her inhabitants are, I believe, in the neighborhood of thirteen or fourteen millions. Her exports last year were $29,526,000; her imports, $28,000,000.

Take British Honduras. Her imports last year of breadstuffs from the United States were $93,892; cotton goods, $77,790; provisions, $107,589; miscellaneous, $10,729.

Take Guatemala. Her imports reach $3,200,000 annually; her exports amount to $4,000,000.

Honduras: Exports, $1,500,000 a year; imports about the same.

San Salvador, in 1881: Exports, $4,992,000; imports, $2,706,000.

Nicaragua: Imports, $1,200,000; exports, $2,000,000.

Costa Rica, in 1881: Imports, $5,000,000; exports, $6,500,000.

The Antilles: Imports, $30,143,000; exports, $78,532,000.

Colombia: Imports, $20,000,000; exports, $18,000,000.

Venezuela: Imports, $14,000,000; exports, $16,000,000.

The Guianas: Import and export trade, $29,550,000.

Brazil: Imports, $95,955,000; exports, $119,106,000.

Paraguay: Exports and imports, $8,000,000.

Uruguay: Imports, $19,400,000; exports, $22,600,000.

Argentine Confederation, in 1881: Imports, $44,067,000; exports, $56,497,000.

Ecuador: Imports, $9,500,000; exports, $11,000,000.

Bolivia: Imports, $1,602,000; exports, $411,000.

Peru: Imports, $28,000,000; exports, 44,600,000.

Chili: Imports, $27,100,000; exports, $46,482,000.

And notwithstanding these countries lie right by us, notwithstanding they are on the same hemisphere with us, notwithstanding every dollar of their trade legitimately belongs to the United States, yet we enjoy but little over one-fourth of the whole, and England, Germany, and France have the rest. Why do those countries have three-quarters of all that immense trade in supplying these people and in taking supplies from them for their home market? For no assignable reason other than the fact that those countries have regularly established lines of steamers to the Mexican and South American ports—speedy, prompt, and reliable—while we have, comparatively speaking, none.

Why did they have lines running there? Because England pays over $4,000,000 a year for carrying her ocean mail; because England pays $1,500,000 a year for carrying her mail to Brazil; and we paid $10,000 last year for carrying the United States mails to every one of the countries I have named. Why did we pay $10,000 and she $1,500,000? Because of that law full of injustice to American ships. Brazil paid England $900,000 more for carrying the mails. Brazil offered to pay for carrying the mails to the United States, and the offer was refused because forsooth it was a subsidy.

But, Mr. President, it is no subsidy to pay a fair and reasonable price for service rendered. If the United States makes $1,500,000 a year out of carrying the foreign mails of the United States, it is no subsidy to say that she may pay the whole $1,500,000 for this service; then it is the cheapest mail-service there is in the United States.

Mr. President, I regard those sections as more important than any others in this bill. I trust that Senators will examine them, and that they will not be frightened by any talk about subsidies, but that they will, in justice to American ships, be willing to pay a fair and reasonable price for carrying the ocean mails.

Mr. President, I admit that I feel a very deep and a very profound interest in the fate of this bill. I have been in Congress, I believe, fifteen years, and during the whole time I have tried to have something done for American ships. I have seen them as you have seen them going down and down and down and no successful attempt made on the part of Congress to stop the downward progress. Attempt after attempt has been made to have some legislation. There is not any legislation in this bill proposed that every Senator will not admit is right in itself, and there is no legislation proposed here that does not remove an existing burden. There is no section here which does injustice to anybody or to the United States. Take all the sections together and enact them into a law; pay every dollar for carrying the United States mails that the bill allows you to pay, and then the United States makes every year out of the merchant marine $1,000,000. England on her consular service alone loses $1,500,000 a year; on her mail service $1,600,000, loses it cheerfully, and has the finest merchant marine on this earth, doing 65 per cent. of the carrying trade of the world, comes to our own borders and does the carrying trade and three-quarters of the selling trade for us. England has been willing to deal justly. I say she pays millions every year. We do not ask you to pay one single dollar; we do not ask you to pay by this bill so much as our ships pay you.

Take the consular fees which are removed by this bill, the custom-house fees, the tonnage tax that is reduced, the hospital tax that is taken off the fair amount paid for postage, and add them all together; then take the credit side, the amount received from postage, the amount received from tonnage tax, the amount received from customs fees paid by ships, and you will find the balance in favor of the United States Treasury over $1,000,000 every year.

Now, am I asking a great thing for American shipping, appealing to the Senate to pass such a bill? I have no doubt the Senate will support it, and yet it can destroy every word of it, take out all of its vitality, render it worse than useless, give us a stone when we ask for bread, give us a serpent when we ask for a fish, by putting the "free-material" and "free-ship" clauses on it. I appeal to the Senate to approve here what is fair and just, what commends itself to all, and do not poison the whole, so that when we take the cup we die.

Mr. President, I am greatly obliged to the Senate for patiently listening to me this length of time. I shall take but little part further in the discussion of this bill, leaving it to Senators on the committee who understand it better than I do, who have been acquainted with its investigation longer than I have. I should not have spoken and did not intend to speak if the bill had been read, as I asked, section by section for amendment. I thank the Senators for their patience and their courtesy.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have no disposition "to commend the poisoned chalice" spoken of by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the lips of the merchant marine of the United States. If I were its worst enemy instead of being, as I profess to be, one of its best friends, I should simply be content to let the present system alone, because it can not, even under the most rapid and successful poison, come to its death any sooner than it promises to do upon the road which it is now traveling.

I take no issue with the Senator from Maine in what he has said with regard to the postal system of the United States now on the statute-book. I had the honor at the last session of Congress to report from the Commerce Committee substantially the provisions contained in the present bill in regard to payments for ocean mail service. The present system is niggardly, unworthy of a great people, unjust to those who carry the mail, and in every respect fails to commend itself to my judgment, and I was glad to hear the honorable Senator say that he accepted England as the model in regard to naval matters, and especially as to her merchant marine, and that he was willing to take her as such; and yet that Senator in his cooler moments and upon reflection will not accept the proposition I now make to him.

I will meet him more than half way, although I belong to the opposite school upon this question. I want the English system, I have pleaded for the English system, I am to-day willing to take it; but the Senator will not take it, notwithstanding his public declaration to that effect. Mr. John Roach will not take it, for I put the question to him in New York, before our special committee, specifically, and he answered in the negative. Mr. John Roach, the distinguished Senator says, is an Irishman by birth, but keeps no corner grocery saloon in the city of New York, nor votes the Democratic ticket. He has a better corner than a corner saloon in New York—he has a corner on the Navy Department, and he votes the straight Republican ticket; and while Mr. John Roach is becoming each year more plethoric with wealth, fatter, and more unctuous in his declarations against free ships, the American merchant marine has been declining, until it is to-day in articulo mortis.

The Senator says he will take the English system. What is the English system of postal subsidy? I say here that subsidy in the English system does not have the meaning which is attached to it in the United States. Subsidy according to our construction of the word is a payment by the Government to individuals to induce them to do that which they would not otherwise find profit in doing; it is bounty; but under the English system all pay for Government service is called subsidy, and England ever since she has adopted the system of postal subsidy upon the ocean has invariably put up the contract to the lowest bidder, and that lowest bidder need not be a citizen of Great Britain at all. To-day some of the mails of Great Britain are carried in steamships belonging to citizens of other countries. Never in any contract made by the English Government has there been a provision that the ships should have been built in Great Britain. Is the Senator willing to say that here? Is he willing to-day to say, like the English, that contracts for carrying the mails upon the ocean shall be put out by the United States to the lowest bidder and all the world can compete for carrying the mails if it sees proper to come in and bid? Oh, no! my honorable friend says they must be carried in American ships. In other words, while American owners of ships may bid upon these contracts, they must come in under the navigation laws and pay Mr. Roach 30 per cent. more for the vessels in which to carry those mails on the ocean. I will take the English system. I never saw the time when I did not want to take it, and the Senator never saw the time when he would take it.

I grant tha England has paid large postal subsidies, as they are termed there. England to-day is a vast workshop, with 200,000,000 of people in her colonies. It is absolutely necessary under her system that she should secure communication both for mail purposes and commercial purposes with the most distant and remote portions of the earth where her flag floats above her people and in her colonies, and in order to do this she has paid postal subsidies in the English meaning of the term. But I undertake to say that in the very years when the United States successfully competed with Great Britian upon the ocean, and when our clipper ships carried our flag to every sea and to every port; when, according to the British historian, Mr. Lindsay, the American merchant marine not only successfully competed with that of Great Britian but had outstripped it upon the ocean, at that very time England was paying enormous subsidies for postal service and the United States none. If subsidy be the remedy, subsidy then should have brought England to the front and ahead of us in this race for maritime supremacy, but it did not. Subsidy was not the remedy then. It is not the remedy now.

While I say this, I go as far as the Senator from Maine in paying just compensation to the ships that carry the mails of the United States upon the ocean, as I believe in paying the same just compensation to the railroads that carry our mails inland. But it is not subsidy, it is not bounty; it is simply a fair compensation to the citizen for performing for the Government what is an absolutely necessary function of the Government itself.

The bill before the Senate, as I had the honor to say some weeks ago, is a palliative, but it does not treat the disease that is to-day destroying the life of our merchant marine. The statesman who thinks that by the application of the provisions of this bill as it stands before the Senate he can bring back the merchant marine of the United States to its ancient and pristine splendor is like the empiric who, when he finds the patient sinking and dying under an organic disease, attempts to relieve the malady by cuticura and moderate doses of sulphur. This is no disease upon the surface; there is something more than the hospital tax, something more than consular fees, something more than advance wages.

Why, sir, in the years prior to 1855, when the United States competed successfully with her clipper ships on the ocean with Great Britain, when the fears of English statesmen were excited in regard to that race for the supremacy, we had the same system. We have had it since 1790, substantially the same laws which are upon our statute-book to-day. And did they prevent the United States then from competing successfully with our great rival? The mere statement of the fact shows that the seat of the disease is not in this system as it stands to-day. It is not in that; it is somewhere else; it is a deeper and a more deadly malady under which the merchant marine of this country is suffering.

The Senator says he is willing to take the English system. I will put another proposition, and I undertake to say he will not take the English system, neither he nor any one of the exponents and advocates of the school to which he belongs. For five hundred years England had the navigation laws which we have to-day upon our statute-book. In the reign of Richard II they were adopted, and it is curious as a mere matter of antiquarian research to go back to the old English statutes five hundred years ago, enacted in 1300, and find the British statutes declaring that all goods shall be brought into Great Britain in the ships of His Majesty; no goods shall be carried to any British colony except in ships built in England, and all the different enactments of the navigation laws we adopted in 1790, as the friends of this system say, were in retaliation for the navigation laws that then existed on the statute-books of Great Britain.

From 1837 to 1850 the struggle between the United States and Great Britain was a hand-to-hand fight for supremacy upon the ocean, and our enterprise, our skill, our energy enabled us to compete with Great Britain not only successfully, but to outstrip her in this great maritime struggle. Will the Senator go with me now and adopt the English system as adopted when England was in exactly the same condition that we are found to-day? When Great Britain discovered that her former colonies of America, which had successfully separated from her as the result of a war, were about to snatch from her the scepter of the ocean, what did she do? Did she do what the honorable Senator from Maine wants us to do to-day?

Great Britain discovered that in the manufacture of wooden ships the United States could excel her. She found that the wooden clipper-built ships of the United States were the fastest upon the ocean, that the trade of the world was fast passing out of her grasp, and what did she do? Did she sit still and rely on her navigation laws and say to an English subject, "you shall not buy a ship from the United States?" If you should go back to the debates in the British Parliament in 1849, when the proposition was made to repeal the navigation laws which we have to-day upon our statute-book, and which Great Britain had then, and if you would shut your eyes and listen to the Senator from Maine you would think that you heard the words of Disraeli or Lord Brougham and Lord George Bentinck as they declared that if the navigation laws were repealed utter destruction and ruin would come upon the merchant marine of Great Britain. Great Britain was then almost exactly in the very condition the United States finds itself in to-day. She could not compete with us upon the ocean in the construction of wooden vessels, and so soon as her statesmen found that to be the case they threw down the barriers and said to the people of England, "Buy where you can buy the cheapest; obtain the instrumentalities of trade; ships are the children of commerce, and not its parents."

Mr. President, what would be thought of this rule in the business affairs or private affairs between man and man? Suppose two men were rival mechanics and one of them should buy the most improved implements and should have his materials free of duty, and just across the way his rival was told by statute, "You shall not buy at the place where are sold the best implements and your materials shall not be free to you." What would be the result? Is there any doubt about it? And yet to-day that is the position which the honorable Senator assumes and upon which he stands before the American people.

I can not refrain from calling attention to a speech made in the Parliament of Great Britain, and which we have heard here in different words but of the same substance for the last few hours, Disraeli protesting against the repeal of the navigation laws in these passionate and eloquent words:

Will you, by the recollections of your past prosperity, by the memory of your still existing power, for the sake of the most magnificent colonial empire in the world, now drifting away amid the breakers, for the sake of the starving mechanics of Birmingham and Sheffield, by all the wrongs of a betrayed agriculture, by all the hopes of Ireland, will you not rather, by the vote we are now coming to, arrive at a decision which may to-morrow smooth the careworn countenance of British toil, give growth and energy to national labor, and at least afford hope to the tortured industry of a suffering people.

And he closed by saying sarcastically:

I will not sing "Rule Britannia," for fear of distressing Mr. Cobden, but he did not think the house would encore "Yankee Doodle."

Lord George Bentinck followed in the same strain, and Lord Brougham concluded the debate in words almost identical with some we have heard to-day from the Senator from Maine. It was prophesied then that if the navigation laws of Great Britain were repealed the grass would grow upon her wharves, and the ships would rot by the side of her piers; and yet the navigation laws were repealed, and what was the result? The result is seen to-day in the unparalleled and magnificent progress of the merchant marine of Great Britain that carries now more than one-half the commerce of the world. Last year they built in Great Britain 845 vessels of more than 600,000 tons burden. No such thing has been known in the annals of maritime nations, and yet this is one of the results of the repeal of this barbarous code, repealed everywhere to-day except in these United States of America.

In 1856, six years afterward—because these laws were repealed on the 1st of January, 1850, by the British Parliament—in 1856 the same Parliament repealed the navigation laws as to the coastwise trade, and again were the same prophesies made. "Repeal the laws which protect our domestic coastwise trade," they said, "and you strike down all the energies, all the wealth of the people of Great Britain," and yet the repealing act was passed, and what has been the result? The coastwise trade of Great Britain has doubled since that time; it has excelled the foreign trade, and to-day there is not a case of maritime success known to all history like that of the Kingdom of Great Britain.

The Senator says that in 1854 England reorganized her maritime system and that was the cause of her unparalleled prosperity. In 1850 Great Britain repealed her navigation laws. As soon as the statesmen of Great Britain saw that they could not compete with us in building ships they threw down the barriers and told their people to buy where they could buy cheapest, and they did buy our ships, according to Mr. Roach, to the amount of $20,000,000 in one year, and took those ships and put the British flag over them in order to compete with their rivals. But we are told to-day that we must respect these navigation laws, although there has been continued decline of our shipping from 1855 down to the present time.

The Senator from Maine predicts that we shall have a large increase in the construction of iron ships. Oh, Mr. President, how long are we to hear this song? How long is this "word of promise to the ear" to be "broken to the hope?" Why, sir, there has not been a session of Congress nor a committee for the last fifteen years that John Roach has not been here with his dulcet song to tell us that next year would see ships turned out of his yard rivaling those of Great Britain upon every sea and in every port. Now let me call the attention of the Senate to facts; not to prophecies, but real results. I have here what is worth all the prophecies in the world. I have here the official report of the Register of the Treasury of the tonnage of iron sailing and steam vessels in the United States from 1868 to 1883, inclusive. In 1868 it was 2,801 tons, in 1869, 4,000 tons, and so on up to 1882, when it was 40,140 tons sailing and steam iron vessels, both for the coastwise trade and the foreign trade; and in 1883 it fell off from 40,140 to 39,646, both of iron sailing and steam vessels in the coastwise and foreign trade. Who ever heard of such a decline as that with free trade? And yet the Senator from Maine stands in the Senate and tells us that in a few years the ship-yards of the United States will turn out an iron merchant marine that will compete with any nation on earth. I put this table before Mr. Roach a year ago without the decline for 1883, and asked him to explain it. I said, "You have said here"—any Senator who is interested in this question will find it in the report of the testimony—"you have said here, Mr. Roach, that the manufacture of iron vessels in the United States is on the increase. I show you this table. Will you be kind enough to read it and explain the figures?" He looked at it, read it, and said, "I can not understand it; there is some mistake about it." I came back to Washington, went to the Register of the Treasury, and obtained this table which I incorporated in my remarks made here the other day. In the presence of these facts the talk and the denunciation indulged in by the honorable Senator from Maine and his compeers on this question is mere "leather and prunella," sound and fury. The merchant marine of the United States is going down day by day and hour by hour.

What is the remedy? Does the Senator from Maine give us any? Will he point it out? What is it? He has spoken for four solid hours and not one particle of medicine has he given this dying patient, nothing but declamation, nothing but denunciation. The whole of his speech is syllogistically this: a high protective tariff is the greatest of all blessings and must not be disturbed. A high protective system makes high wages. High wages are the cause of the decline of American shipping because it prevents us from competing with other nations. Our protective system must not be disturbed and these wages must be continued, and therefore the merchant marine can not be revived. Is that not it? If the Senator from Maine has done one single thing effectually in this debate he has proved that under his system there is no remedy at all. We have tried it for thirty years. We are to-day upon the very verge of dissolution. The Senator comes to us and says, "I stand by the high protective tariff system, although our flag disappears from every ship upon the ocean."

I had the honor to make a statement on this subject some days ago. Had I made it in the West, the farmers that heard me would have believed that I had manufactured the story for campaign purposes. I stated here before the American Senate that in 1873 the Congress of the United States enacted a law that every American vessel which hired a crew in any port of the world, whether by written contract or for any length of time, when it came back and touched the shores of the United States, should discharge that crew and rehire them or others, and pay the fees to the shipping commissioners.

What did they do it for? Can any Senator tell me? Will the Senator from Maine tell me? He says now he does not know what it was done for. It was done to give money to the shipping commissioners, and for no other purpose under heaven. It was done to put money in the pockets of a few men. Did it help the merchant marine? It was as fatal to it as if you would strike down a bullock in the shambles with a butcher's ax. The president of the Red Star line said in a letter which I read some weeks since, that it doubled the wages of his crews and caused him to put all his vessels under a foreign flag. And yet that law has stood here without any attention being paid to it, without any attempt to repeal it, when the whole result, as every intelligent man knows, was to double the wages, and for whose benefit? The Senator from Maine says he will not attack wages, he is for American labor. Is this American labor? Ninety-five per cent of the sailors on American vessels to-day are foreigners. The American sailor to-day is a curiosity. He would bring more in a museum than some of the curiosities that will be here next week under the charge of that distinguished gentleman, Mr. Barnum. The American sailor has almost passed away from even the memory of living men. Ninety-five per cent. of all the sailors that we have upon our vessels, coastwise and foreign——

Mr. FRYE. No, no.

Mr. VEST. I have heard it stated this was so in the coastwise trade.

Mr. FRYE. That is true of the foreign service, but not of the coastwise trade.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I rose because I had made a statement myself that 95 per cent. of the sailors engaged in foreign service on our vessels were not Americans. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] quoted it. I do not wish to be misunderstood. In our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade it is true; but in the coastwise trade we have American sailors.

Mr. VEST. I have it from very good authority in regard to that branch. I do not question that the proportion is larger than the Senator from Maine thinks it is, but for the purposes of the argument let the coastwise trade stand aside. I do not propose to attack the laws in regard to it. That system is doing well enough. It would do much better in my opinion if we would throw it open to ships built anywhere; but the amendment I propose to-day does not affect that trade at all. The fact remains that when the Senator avows his zeal for good wages to the American laborer he is paying no wages to the American sailor, he is paying them to the extent of 95 per cent. to foreigners upon American vessels, and that is all I desired to say.

But the Senator says, as all his school in the discussion of this question say, that the sacred protective system must not be attacked in any particular. He seems to forget, as all his compeers do, that the merchant marine of the United States is as much a branch of industry as the manufacture of cotton goods or of Bessemer steel or of iron or of jute, or any other domestic manufacture, and yet the Senator is willing—for his speech amounts to nothing else—to keep down the merchant marine rather than break through this Chinese wall of protection which to-day surrounds all the industries of the people of the United States.

The Senator says the high protective system has fostered the coastwise trade until it has assumed its present colossal proportions. Why, Mr. President, look at it, think of it for a moment. The coastwise trade of the United States is a domestic trade protected from competition with the whole world. It is a struggle between American and American with the same wages, the same ports, the same advantage, the same sky above them, and the same air. The Congress of the United States can protect that trade by any system it sees proper to adopt, but can you touch the foreign trade of the world? The waves of the ocean are not confined to your coast, the maritime nations of the world laugh at your statutes. Your ships in the domestic trade are protected, and the natural increase of the country causes an increase of our coastwise trade. We have 10,000 miles of seaboard; we have twenty large cities upon the salt bays of the ocean; we have 50,000,000 people, and a continent to give them food and raiment and wealth, and all this pours itself into the coastwise trade of the United States naturally, and it is a fight between our own citizens, and to-day the competition is such that the minimum has almost been reached in prices for transportation in that trade. But when you come to the foreign trade it is different; there you strike free trade upon the ocean; and while our vessels are handicapped by a protective system which causes them to go out loaded and come back empty, the Senator from Maine stands here and draws a parallel which can not hold good between the foreign and coastwise trade of the United States.

In order to make profitable shipping there must be mutuality between the countries of the world. Suppose you had two lines of railroad running into the city of Washington to-day, and one of them came in loaded and went out loaded and the other came in loaded and went out empty, do you think there would be any difference in the dividends? Do you think there would be any difference in the results at the end of the year? To-day you have exactly that state of things with the merchant marine of the United States. Under the protective system they go out loaded because we have overproduction from year to year. To-day your tariff produces through overproduction strikes and disorder, and labor meetings and socialistic harangues. One of the largest manufacturers in Saint Louis, on my recent visit to my home, said to me, "I have been for a protective tariff, but overproduction is the curse to-day resting upon the manufacturers of the United States, of whom I am the largest in this city." All this overproduction goes to the seaports and loads vessels for foreign ports; but when they attempt to bring back a cargo to our ports they find a protective tariff meeting them which says, "You can not enter unless you pay enormous sums," so great as to amount to an exclusion of all competition with domestic manufactures.

I want to give to the Senator from Maine an illustration. Chili produces seventeen million five hundred thousand dollars' worth of copper and copper products. The cotton goods brought to Chili amount to an average value of $53,000,000 per annum; that is, goods imported for sale to those people in the tropics. England has control of that trade under the wise system that established mail steamship lines, and the British ships go there loaded with their cheap cotton fabrics to sell to the people of Chili and take in exchange copper and copper products and wool and carry them back to Great Britain, sell the copper to the manufacturers at Swansea, in the southern part of England, who make it into yellow metal, into different sorts of copper utensils. They use British coal, British railroads, British labor, British capital, and then they supply the whole world with this valuable and useful article.

In 1876 an enterprising American merchant of Boston concluded for patriotism and for gain that he would attempt a competition with Great Britain, for he had been to Chili in quest of health and he concluded he could build up a fortune by commercial adventure. He bought vessels in England; put them under the British flag; came over to his own country and loaded them with American goods, the calicoes of Massachusetts and Connecticut and Rhode Island. He went down to Chili and sold his goods at a fair price. He loaded with copper and copper products, and came back to the United States and found a protective tariff absolutely prohibiting him from bringing in copper; and the result was that he was forced to put his copper in bond in Boston, have it shipped to Great Britain, and have it sold there. He abandoned the venture, and I have a letter here in which he says that he found it absolutely impossible to compete under the present tariff system with the free-trade system of Great Britain. So it is that to-day England monopolizes that entire trade. I have before me, received this morning, a pamphlet in regard to yellow metal and it is signed by "Revere Copper Company, by S. T. Snow, treasurer; Taunton Copper Manufacturing Company, by Timothy Gordon, treasurer; New Bedford Copper Company, by William H. Mathews, treasurer; Bridgewater Iron Company, by Isaac Pratt, jr., president."

The Senator has asked me the question, who wants the tariff taken off materials, who wants materials free? These gentlemen sent me this pamphlet with an elaborate argument and begging the enactment of the following laws:

Be it enacted, &c., That all unwrought materials of foreign production to be manufactured in this country into articles needed for and used in the construction, equipment, repairs, or supplies of American vessels, employed, or to be employed, exclusively in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, may be withdrawn from bonded warehouses free of duty; and if the duty shall have been already paid on such material so used, the same shall be refunded and repaid to the owner or owners of such vessels so using them, or to their legal representatives, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Be it enacted, &c., That all unwrought materials of foreign production to be manufactured in this country into articles needed for the repair of American vessels engaged exclusively in foreign trade may be withdrawn from bonded warehouses free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

I call the attention of my friend from Maine to the fact that in this pamphlet is contained a report made by him in the House of Representatives in favor of a bill which took off the duty on copper ore and gave it the American manufacturer free of duty. The Senator seems to have lost sight, I will not say of his political antecedents, but of his former convictions on this great question. To-day under the law of the United States we have this outrageous anomaly——

Mr. FRYE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I never have seen the time that I was not in favor, for the interest of our manufacturers and our ship-builders, of admitting free of duty unwrought materials, and the difference between unwrought materials and the Senator's amendment is as broad as the earth itself. The Senator's amendment is to admit free of duty all wrought materials ready to go into a ship where the ship-builder would have nothing to do but to send his specifications to the Clyde and have those specifications complied with and every single article going into the ship delivered at his ship-yard and then with nothing to do but simply to put them together—one-third of all the labor in the ship. The difference between "unwrought" and "wrought," is the difference between bread and stone.

I know these copper-men perfectly well. I remember their call. I remember my report. I hold to the same views to-day that I did then. It was unwrought material and not material made up, as the Senator's amendment has it, and brought in in entire readiness for the ship itself.

Mr. VEST. In the first place there is no such word in this amendment as "wrought material:"

All or any part of the materials, whether wood, steel, iron, copper, yellow metal, bolts, spikes, sheathing, treenails; canvas for sails, whether flax or cotton; rigging and cordage, whether hemp, manila hemp, or iron wire; anchors and cables; iron plates, castings, and forgings; angle irons, beams, masts, yards, rivets, bolts, nuts, screws, engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery, and all other materials and appliances—

Where does the Senator get the word "wrought?"

Mr. FRYE. Go on.

Mr. VEST. Very well, I will—which may be necessary for the construction and equipment, in whole or in part, of vessels, whether steam or sail vessels, to be built and furnished in the United States after the 1st day of January, 1885, may be imported in bond under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator is reading from the statute that has been on the books ever since the special committee of which Mr. John Lynch, of Maine, was chairman, reported a bill which was then enacted into law; and those copper-men simply asked that the copper might be admitted under the same terms to be manufactured in this country into yellow metal ready to go on the ship's bottom.

Mr. VEST. The Senator is again at fault, and as much as he has studied this question he is a little negligent at times. In the first place, this law has never been on the statute-book. There never was any such law as provided for the introduction of iron plates. Iron plates are provided for in this section, and are put in now for the first time.

All or any part of the materials, whether wood, steel, iron, copper, &c.

This is a new section, and not section 2513 of the Revised Statutes. A great deal of it is in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. FRYE. Nearly all of it is in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. VEST. A great deal of it is, I admit. The Senator may take the Revised Statutes and compare them with this provision and he will see the difference.

Mr. FRYE. But I ask the Senator if my report was not at the instance of the copper-men and did not relate to copper and nothing else.

Mr. VEST. Of course it was, because under the law as it stands to-day, and as it stood then, this yellow metal could be brought into the United States and used for building a vessel in the foreign trade free of duty, but the copper ore itself could not be brought in; it was excluded; and as a matter of course the Senator wanted free raw materials, as he called them, and yet he asked me to-day the question who is for free materials.

Mr. FRYE. But where labor entered into it and made it into copper sheathing, in the interest of our laborers and our manufacturers I wanted that protection.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course you can not get any of these materials without labor. They do not grow on the trees; they do not grow up like Topsy. There is nothing of that sort in manufactures. They all come from some sort of labor.

I say the Senator's report goes to the extent of free material so far as copper is concerned, and here it is in black and white, if he has any doubt about it.

The purpose of this bill is to correct an incongruity in the existing tariff laws whereby a manufactured article, yellow-metal sheathing, is admitted free of duty, while the raw materials composing it, copper and spelter, are required to pay a duty.

Mr. FRYE. I stand by that.

Mr. VEST. Of course you do. Then you stand with me.

Mr. FRYE. No.

Mr. VEST. I am for free material. I am for the copper coming in free when it is to be used in the building of a ship and letting anything else come in free for that purpose, and I am in favor of letting the American citizen buy his ship where he can buy it cheapest, as the Frenchman does, as the German does, as the Englishman does, as the Chinaman does. To-day even China has stricken down the navigation laws, and she has a better merchant marine, so far as iron steamers in the foreign trade are concerned, than that of the United States. Germany has struck down the navigation laws and built an iron steamer two years ago at a cost of $375,000 for those barbarous Celestials. Every country that has any pretense to civilization has struck down this system except the United States, and the Senator from Maine stands here and says, although your marine is disappearing from the ocean, although year after year your flag is becoming scarcer and can not be found now in the ports of the world except by accident, we must adhere to the system. What would you think of the business man who had lost money for forty years by following an old-fashioned system, instead of changing it, and saying all the time, "I will cherish the system that my father had;" like a man I knew, living in sight of a railroad, who instead of having a patent pump to bring water up used the same old forked stick and bucket that his father did, and with the scream of the locomotive in his ears would not drop it, because he said the old man used it during his time, and anything good enough for his father was good enough for him.

These navigation laws were made in 1790, when this country was in its infancy, when we had all to gain and nothing to lose, when England was attempting to force her merchant shipping upon us and we retaliated. England was then a friend of this system, but to-day she has struck it from her statutes, like France, Spain, Germany, and every other civilized country but the United States.

I am not astonished at my friend from Maine. He is consistent. I heard him once on this floor in the tariff discussion declare that he would be for a high protective tariff if the Government did not need a dollar of revenue. He holds that in spite of the Constitution, which says we shall have the right to lay import duties in order to sustain the Government for revenue purposes, if we did not need one dollar and if the Treasury was bloated and plethoric with money, still for protection's sake he would impose a high protective tariff on the American people. There is no question about his consistency. I have never doubted that. The trouble with the Senator is that he belongs to the school of Henry C. Carey, of Philadelphia, who was to the high protective system what Brigham Young has been to Mormonism and Mahomet to Islamism. Henry C. Carey said that he would to God that the Atlantic Ocean was an ocean of fire between Europe and the United States. My friend from Maine belongs to the school which at the University of Pennsylvania teaches Thompson's Social Science and National Economy, a book which says that foreign commerce is no criterion of a nation's prosperity, and the demoralization caused by it to sailors should be enough to strike it down.

He belongs to the school one of whose leaders some years ago said—and I am prepared now to admit that I voted for him once for President, Horace Greeley—who declared that the smoke of the locomotive was the black flag of destruction to the farmers of the West. I voted for him because I thought of two evils he was the lesser. Between the Republican party and Greeley I swallowed Greeley with a wry face and sour stomach, but I took him. [Laughter]

Mr. FRYE. I suppose that the distinguished gentleman of Pennsylvania, the high priest of the tariff system, as the Senator says, desired an ocean of fire between here and all foreign countries for some similar political reason; that is, that if the ocean was one of fire there would be no Democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. There would be no ships.

Mr. FRYE. No Democratic party.

Mr. VEST. I do not know about that. I think the Democratic party will succeed in the near future. If fire could have burned us out our party would long since have been ashes. No, Mr. President, he meant that upon an ocean of fire there would be no ships. He did not want any foreign commerce. He wanted the high protective system, which put a wall of fire around this country, to build up a home market to shut out the whole world, and to-day your ships are going out loaded and coming back empty, and yet you talk about competing with free trade upon the ocean. Your statutes can not reach the ocean. They can not reach the maritime nations of the world. There is no similarity between your coastwise trade and your foreign trade. The statutes of the United States, so far as the coastwise trade is concerned, are good enough; let them alone; but with changed conditions it is a mere mockery of statesmanship to talk about preserving the laws of 1790 to rebuild our merchant marine.

But the Senator says if we have free ships the inevitable result will be that the rotten ships of Great Britain will be sold to the American people.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. One point the Senator has made which I do not understand—I have followed his argument carefully—and I should like to ask him to repeat it and make it clear. I understand him to say that the American ship-owner takes out a full cargo but comes back with an empty one because of the high protective tariff and the heavy duties he would have to pay on his return cargo if he brought it back. Now, how does that affect the American ship-owner in his rivalry with the ship-owner of any other country? Does not the British ship-owner who trades to this country have to pay the same duties on the cargo he brings this way? Perhaps I have failed to follow the Senator fully, but I should like to understand the point.

Mr. VEST. I have been under the impression that the profit of a business and the amount of business that was done went to sustain it, and the lack of business and lack of profit kept it back. If a man has an intelligent idea of his business, the more he does the more money he makes, and the less business he does the less money he makes.

A ship goes to Chili, for instance, sells her cotton goods, and loads with copper. She can go to England and sell that copper at a profit. She is making money both ways. She makes profit off the Chilians; she makes it in the home market off the cargo she brings in. If an American vessel lying alongside of her sells her cotton goods in the Chilian market and loads with copper and comes back to the United States she can not sell it on account of the high protective tariff, because it excludes copper, and the result is that she comes back to our country with a commodity from which she can make no money. That is the reason.

Mr. HOAR. But does the Senator mean, then, to say simply, as the whole point of his argument, that any ship trading to an American port and returning is forced to be a loser because of our tariff? I understood him to be arguing that the American ship-owner engaged in the carrying trade, no matter where he went, was at a disadvantage with the English ship-owner. He said just before that that the English did the American carrying trade between America and foreign ports—95 per cent. of it.

Mr. VEST. No; I said the sailors were 95 per cent. foreigners.

Mr. HOAR. I am mistaken about the Senator's percentage, but he said the English did the American carrying trade.

Mr. VEST. A large portion of it.

Mr. HOAR. Now, is there any earthly disadvantage whatever which a man that owns an American ship is under in competing with an Englishman who owns an English ship trading to and from the same places by reason of our protective tariff; and if so, what is it? I do not see the point of the Senator's argument.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator means to say that a vessel which goes out from the country loaded and comes back empty is upon the same basis so far as profit is concerned with one that is loaded both ways, I despair of convincing him of anything.

Mr. HOAR. No; but if the English ship-owner, living in Liverpool, having a Liverpool-built ship, trades from Boston and New York, as the great English lines do, the Cunarders and the others, the protective tariff has precisely the same effect upon him so far as the duties paid upon the cargo are concerned as it does upon his American rival. Whatever may be the cause of the advantage of the Englishman in competition, trading from Europe to any American port and returning, certainly the Senator, I think, will admit on reflection that the argument which he has made and repeated so many times, that it is due to the fact that the American pays duty on the cargo by reason of the protective tariff, is not good, for the Englishman pays the same duty on his cargo. If the American sails his ship from New York to Liverpool and comes back empty, does not the Englishman who sails his ship from Liverpool to New York and back come over empty? Is there any difference by reason of our tariff?

Mr. VEST. I misunderstand the Senator or he misunderstands me. When the American goes to Chili and sells his goods he makes a profit.

Mr. HOAR. We are not talking about Chili.

Mr. VEST. Any other foreign country.

Mr. HOAR. We are talking about American ports and European, or put it any other country. Put it from Liverpool to New York; is there any advantage which a line of steamers owned in Liverpool or Glasgow, plying between Liverpool and New York, has over a line of steamers owned in New York, plying between Liverpool and New York, by reason of our protective tariff? That is the point of the question.

Mr. VEST. The question that I stated and the proposition that I advanced was in regard to the ship-owner who invested in a vessel and undertook to establish a trade between America and a foreign country, not between England and some other foreign country, and when he comes back to his own country he must come back empty; and we are talking about building up the merchant marine of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. No matter what the trade is, if the Senator will pardon me, whether it is Liverpool and New York, or anywhere else, what earthly difference does our tariff make between two vessels engaged in the same trade running to and from the same ports and carrying the same goods, because we have a tariff on the goods brought to American ports? The Englishman or the Brazilian, if they have a Brazilian line, or the Frenchman, or the Scotchman plies over the seas wherever business is good, and the American does the same; and is there any earthly difference that our tariff makes? I am not talking about the othe point of the Senator's arguments. Is there any earthly difference that our tariff makes? It is of course true that, whoever does the carrying, there will not be so many goods carried into New York or Boston if those goods pay a heavy duty there; but it bears on all mankind alike, does it not, on the Englishman and on the American alike?

Mr. VEST. But the Senator overlooks the fact that when an English vessel comes here it comes with English goods and pays the tariff duty, knowing what it is, deliberately, and undertakes to compete with the domestic manufacture in the United States, and the tariff does not affect it, as it goes back loaded with American goods and the freight is put into the pocket of the foreign ship-owner. I say that when the American ship-owner goes out with American products and sells them in a foreign market, if he buys goods in that foreign market and undertakes to bring them in he is handicapped with the tariff.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the Engishman equally handicapped if he buys English goods and brings them here?

Mr. VEST. He is not compelled to come here with any goods unless the sales will pay him, notwithstanding the tariff. There may be, as is the case in Chili, a market in which there is such a production as copper, upon which our tariff is exclusive. What is the American to do? He has either got to abandon the Chilian market altogether or else he has got to go out loaded and come back empty. They have but two exports of any size. Chili exports wool and copper. The difference between the English ship-owner and the American ship-owner is that the Englishman goes there, sells his cotton goods, takes his copper and carries it in free of duty, and is enabled to sell it at a large profit to the copper manufacturers of Great Britain. Therefore he makes two profits; and he has either got to take copper or take nothing.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me try my hand at arguing?

Mr. VEST. Oh, certainly.

Mr. HALE. What difference does it make in the voyage from England to Chili and from Chili back whether it is a British or an American ship? The Senator says that the English ship takes the English manufactured product to Chili, exchanges it for copper and makes a profit, and that he takes the copper back to England, where there is no duty upon it, and makes a profit upon his cargo there. The English ship does not do anything of the kind. The shipper in England makes a profit, it may be, out of his shipment, the shipper in Valparaiso makes a profit out of his shipment, but the owner of the English ship does not make a dollar of the profit. It makes no difference what are the products carried back and forth, as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated; protection does not touch that question at all. If the English shipper bought as in the primitive days—I fancy as was done in the days of Venice when Shakespeare's play is located there—took his risk in the market of the world and then bought a cargo and returned, there might be force in the Senator's argument; but the ship has nothing to do with it—the ship gets no profit out of it. It gets its trade, and the American ship would be in the same position if it could afford to run as cheaply.

Mr. VEST. I will answer the Senator briefly. In the first place your American ships do buy their cargo in the foreign markets and bring them on trading speculations back to this country; and in the second place, the English merchant buys the copper from the ship that is brought from Chili, and the British ship-owner knows that he has got a market there. The difference between that and a high-protective tariff is that the American ship-owner knows when he gets to his home port that he has no market because the tariff excludes him. That is the difference. He can not bring the products of that country here; he can not compete at all with the production of copper in the United States under the tariff system. If that is not plain enough I am utterly unable to make it so. It is exactly parallel to the case of two railroads. One of them is loaded both ways and the other is loaded only one way. It is precisely the same, and there is no escape from it. There can be no other conclusion in regard to it.

But the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] made the remarkable point that if we had free ships all the rotten ships of England would find a market in the United States. Mr. President, I have assumed all my life long that if there was one thing impossible on the face of the earth, one thing entirely out of the ken of mortal men or the range of the most active imagination, it was that any living human being could cheat a Yankee. If anybody ever found one, even if he was considered intellectually a very inferior man in a New England town, who could not get the best of any other human being outside of New England in any trade, from a jack-knife up to a $350,000 ship, I should like to hire him and loan him out to Barnum for the rest of his natural life. Who believes that the people of New England would go over to Old England, take the old rotten hulks, take the old decayed and condemned cruisers, pay out their good money for them and bring them back to be sunk here by the mere force of the water itself? Who believes that a people of ship-builders, a people of sailors, a people for whom the navigation laws were made, a people who have been "rocked to sleep upon the ocean wave," could be cheated and hoodwinked and beaten out of their money in any such fashion, or that they would be? That cause is indeed a bad one that could thus depreciate the native shrewdness and intellect of one's own people.

Sir, I would risk my constituency of the prairies of the West, when self-interest was at stake, against any foreigner that God has ever created, whether Englishman, Italian, Frenchman or German. Trust the people of the United States, in every section of the United States, to protect themselves in any bargain or any traffic whatever. The Senator is driven to his last resort when he says that to protect the imbecile and half-idiotic traders of New England we must not permit them to buy their ships wherever they can.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think under the circumstances it is time for us to adjourn. I move therefore that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Until Monday.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 1, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WOOD for ten days.

SARATOGA MONUMENT.

Mr. WEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3327) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument, and that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. COBB. Let it be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. WEMPLE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection to hear a brief statement with reference to this subject.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I demand the regular order.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw that demand for a moment I would like to have some evidence submitted in order to have it printed.

Mr. COOK. I renew the objection if it is withdrawn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the pending bill be closed at 4 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon next.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that, but I hope I will have the assistance of the gentleman from Illinois to enable me to have one hour of the remaining time.

Mr. MORRISON. As far as I can control the matter, of course.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand, of course, that the House has control of the time.

Mr. MORRISON. As far as I can.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to give notice in this connection that whenever the motion is in order a motion will be submitted to strike out the enacting clause of this bill.

Mr. EATON. I hope my friend from Illinois will not press that motion this morning. There are several gentlemen who desire to be heard on this subject. I know I do for one. I would rather not be shut down upon by making an order for closing the debate on Tuesday. I do not want to do anything to antagonize any motion my friend desires to make, but it seems to me that it is not necessary to say at this time when the debate shall close.

Mr. MORRISON. I make this motion by way of giving notice to gentlemen, as I deemed it probable that the motion which was indicated by the gentleman from Ohio would be made and I thought it would be proper that they ought to know the fact as to when a vote would probably be taken.

In reply to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] I want to say it is very evident that all of the gentlemen who desire to be heard upon this subject can not by any possibility have that opportunity. I thought after the debate we have had that the House would now be able to come to a distinct understanding on the matter, and that the time I have indicated is as much as can be given to the consideration of this subject in view of the pressing character of other public business. I will say to him, however, that so far as I am able to do so I will facilitate his desire to be heard on this question.

Mr. FINDLAY. I hope that debate is not going to be choked off on this bill.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no occasion for talking about choking.

Mr. FINDLAY. I will modify the expression. I will say I hope the debate on this bill will not be suspended or brought to a sudden close until those who have convictions upon it in opposition have a chance to be heard. I for one am against the bill in toto from beginning to end and would like to express my opinion upon it if I can have an opportunity.

Mr. DEUSTER. I desire to address a question to the Chair. I should like to be informed how many of the gentlemen who have desired to speak on this question have had an opportunity? I for one desire to be heard on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin will say he is advised that forty-three gentlemen have thus far addressed the committee on this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope we are not to take up the whole of this session with the discussion of the tariff.

Mr. MORRISON. In connection with the motion I have made I will ask unanimous consent that to-morrow may be devoted to debate on this question to the exclusion of the consideration of private bills.

Mr. BEACH. Not to interfere with the evening session for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. McMILLIN. In view of the importance of this bill and the kindness the House has exhibited in connection with the consideration of the Private Calendar, as the mover generally this session of the motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Private Calendar, I think for my part it would be proper to agree to the request of the gentleman from Illinois in regard to to-morrow's business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the Private Calendar be dispensed with to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. Does that include to-morrow evening?

Mr. MORRISON. I do not wish to interfere with the order for the evening.

The SPEAKER. It is a special order which assigns the consideration of pension bills for to-morrow evening. The Chair thinks unless that were expressly included in the request it would not be affected. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that general debate on the tariff bill be closed next Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

Mr. YORK. I would suggest Wednesday or Thursday instead of Tuesday.

Mr. MORRISON. I insist on my motion. Gentlemen may vote it down if they see fit.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, there are two ways of dealing with a redundant revenue; one is to reduce it, the other is to spend it; one way is to lessen taxation, the other way is to increase the appropriations. The latter is the easier path. There are many temptations which invite to it. Impulses of generosity, motives of policy, the interests of locality, pride of country, all tempt us to enter a road where progress is delightful, the pavements smooth, and the prospect alluring. Other and more sinister guides are also at hand. The public contractor, those who hold places of profit, those who collect the taxes and those who distribute them, those whose business thrives upon taxation, and who find in the weight of the public burdens a means of crushing rivalry—all these are eager and most persuasive in their efforts to convince us that the way to deal with a redundant revenue is to spend it. So there are some statesmen who always like to have an excessive income. One such has lately told us that the surplus should be generously distributed to the States, so that the States would be spared the necessity of levying taxes for any purpose of local administration.

However great the income there are always methods of using it. Thus it happens that among the conspicuous and picturesque characters in history we find none who had any trouble in dealing with a surplus revenue. I can not find that either Louis XIV or Charles of Spain or Charles of England or either of the Napoleons was ever in any perplexity with too great an income. A splendid court, largesses to their servants, pompous public works, and frequent wars gave full employment to all the revenues of the state.

The other way, that of reduction in taxation, is a hard road. It leads over a rough country and is beset with foes. Those who follow it find no treasure with which to reward friends or bribe enemies, to control a convention, to win a nomination, to corrupt an election. Those who now take this way do not find it easy. We are told even by some of our friends that our course is not the right one, that great interests will be disturbed, that the present is not the time, that our political enemies will discover our intentions, and thus the fall elections will be affected and the regular current of party politics turned awry.

Our political opponents resist on many grounds, some of which are curious enough. The gentleman from Massachusetts who represents that State upon the Committee of Ways and Means proposes, indeed, that revenue shall be decreased, but he proposes to lower it by the novel method of increasing taxation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] indulged himself in a generalization so striking that I must refer to it. He says that the trouble now is, not that prices are too high, but that commodities are too plentiful. The harvests have been too bountiful and the artisans too industrious. After having made this startling statement he drew a dismal picture of the condition of the poor in Europe. He seems to think that the poor there are starving because there is too much food and go naked because there are too many clothes. To doubtful friends, and also to our opponents, we answer that the taxes yield too much, and that our first and imperative duty is to leave the surplus in the pockets of the people. It has been suggested that the needed reduction should be made by abolishing the internal taxation. I do not think such a measure would be approved.

The internal revenue is now chiefly obtained from taxes upon spirits, malt liquor, and tobacco. All of these are luxuries. The taxes upon them have the great advantage that they are in the nature of voluntary taxes. Any one who feels burdened by them may avoid the tax by ceasing to use the articles. So far as alcohol enters into the arts it should be relieved from taxation, and I hope that some means may be found of giving that relief. But if it is impossible to relieve alcohol without impairing the tax on spirits I would prefer that the tax should remain and that the arts should rest to that extent under the public burden.

It seems to me beyond controversy that the reduction of tariff taxes is the true course. They rest upon clothing, food, and fuel, upon houses and ships, upon manufactures and arts, upon the implements of trade and agriculture, upon the vehicles of commerce, upon all the things by which industry is pursued and civilization advanced; nay, upon many things without which life can not be maintained. It is a monstrous suggestion that these burdens should be continued, and that whisky, beer, and tobacco should be made free. Fortunately there is no popular demand for such a measure. There never was a clearer expression of public opinion made in this country than that which comes from every quarter in favor of the retention of these taxes.

It being determined that the first step in the direction of reduction should be the lowering of tariff taxation, the question for us to consider is whether the measure proposed is a wise one and whether it effects the purpose. As to the character of this measure there has been, I think, much unnecessary concession. I think the chairman of the committee himself has gone quite too far in his admissions that the measure is not as good a one as he would wish. Doubtless a statesman familiar with modern teachings and experiences and free to arrange a system of tariff taxation suited to the country would have framed a very different bill. But considered with reference to our situation, to the condition of the protected industries, which should not be subjected to too sudden a change, and above all considered with reference to the state of public opinion, until lately most indifferent to these important subjects, I think the committee have acted wisely and have adopted the most available method of reduction. I say this with the distinct admission that I have changed my opinion upon this subject.

I came here with a strong conviction that the true course was to enlarge the free-list and not to make a general or horizontal reduction. I have come to think otherwise, and I have been somewhat influenced by an argument common with our adversaries and which greatly troubles some of our friends. It is said that the bill will increase the revenue and not diminish it. Is this true? Can you take off one-fifth of the taxes and still increase the revenue? If you can, you certainly ought to do it. And you ought to do it first of all. If you can take off one-fifth of the taxes and still increase the revenue, then it is clear that taxation has been carried far beyond the revenue point, and that a reduction will leave a great sum in the pockets of the tax-payers, a sum which now does not go into the Treasury, but which is taken from the tax-payers and given to certain favored persons. There has never been a declaration of Democratic policy which did not declare that revenue was the only purpose of taxation.

It has never been our doctrine that taxes should be levied for the purpose of taking money from one citizen and giving it to another. The much-talked-of Ohio declaration is for "a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government, economically administered." If there is a Democrat here who believes that this bill will increase the revenue and who is still disposed to regard the declarations of his party, I say to him, "We are entitled to your vote, because the existing tariff is by your admission far above the revenue standard." Let us take off one-fifth now. If that does not reduce the revenue we can take off more. Some time we will cut to the quick and draw the blood. If 20 per cent. will not reduce the revenue, perhaps 50 per cent. will.

This argument is also strong against the suggestion that the free-list should be greatly increased. For if taxation is above the revenue standard, then placing raw materials on the free-list may make manufacturing cheaper without making the product cheaper. It will help the manufacturer and not the consumer, and still further increase the inequalities of the tariff. Nay, it would invigorate the vicious process by which money is taken from one class and given to another. It is said that domestic competition will bring prices down. But the manufacturers can easily combine, as the coal and oil men have combined. Let the whole tariff be first brought near to a revenue standard, and we can then with propriety increase the free-list. Partly by reason of the assertion that this bill will not diminish the revenue, but still more by a careful consideration of it, I have come to the conclusion that the committee have taken the proper method.

But it is said that the bill only proposes a horizontal reduction, and that a horizontal reduction is not a skillful, not a scientific method. To those who are troubled by the lack of skill and science in the bill I have nothing to say. I shall be content with their absence if it relieves the public burdens. But I wish to say that to speak of it as a horizontal reduction merely is incorrect, and those who do so leave out of consideration three most important provisions. I refer to the clauses which provide that hereafter no article in the wool schedule shall pay a higher duty than 60 per cent., that none in the metal schedule shall pay a higher duty than 50 per cent., and that none in the cotton schedule shall pay a higher duty than 40 per cent. These provisions have an important effect, and, so to speak, cut off the tops of all the excessive and anomalous duties which are the disgrace of the present tariff. I find on examination that the provisions will operate upon ten articles in the cotton schedule, upon ten in the woolen, and upon nineteen in the metal, and that at present the duties upon these articles range from 50 to 104 per cent. The effect of the provision that no duty shall be lower than the one prescribed by the act of 1861 operates upon twenty-eight articles, and prevents the inequalities which would be caused by a 20 per cent. reduction upon the low taxes as well as the high ones, and avoids the evils of which the gentleman from Ohio spoke when he said that a reduction of 20 per cent. would destroy some of our manufacturers. All American manufacturers grew fat under the Morrill tariff..

The gentleman from Ohio said the bill was complicated and impossible of execution. I listened to his remarks with care, but they did not produce the impression upon me that they did upon him. It is easy by a specification of details to make a simple process seem protracted and complicated. Suppose I apply the gentleman's method to the operation of eating one's dinner. You take a seat at a table, you open your napkin, you take a fork in one hand and a knife in the other, you cut with the knife, you lift the food with the fork, you chew with your teeth, you swallow with the muscles of your throat. All this would doubtless to a Congo negro seem to be a very complicated transaction, but to the gentleman from Ohio it is an easy one and not unattended with pleasure.

It will be necessary for the appraiser to estimate the duties upon an invoice under two tariffs, the existing one and the act of 1861. That act was in operation several years, and duties were levied under it upon all imports. If they were collected then they can be collected now. As to the limitations of 40, 50, and 60 per cent., in most cases a man of ordinary ability can apply them by looking at the figures without doing the sum. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that if the present custom-house officers are unable to do the work we will soon be in a situation to supply to the public service men who will make this calculation without any difficulty whatever.

I further say that the whole measure shows a wise conservatism in dealing with the protected industries. I much mistake the opinion of those with whom I act if there is any disposition on this side of the House to deal harshly with the protected industries. Since 1866 there has been collected through the custom-house the sum of $3,181,000,000. This vast and unexampled taxation has been constantly adjusted so as to foster certain industries. Those who were engaged in them have had the benefit of this colossal protection, if indeed it was beneficial to them. The taxation can no longer be maintained. There is no use to which the money can be put. The protected industries must accommodate themselves to the necessity for reduced taxation. It is not the desire of those who are interested in revenue reform to make the change suddenly or too rapidly. There is only one way in which a sudden change may be brought about. If the manufacturing interests shall stubbornly resist, if they refuse to accept moderate measures like the present one, an appeal will be made to the public, and the people, once awakened to the monstrous character of the present system, will deal with it in the peremptory manner in which matters are dealt with when condemned by the tribunal of public opinion.

Our opponents will do well to listen to the advice of their leading journals, like the New York Times, the Buffalo Express, the Boston Herald, and the Springfield Republican. Accept this measure, receive it in the spirit in which it has been framed, and you will do much to keep the tariff out of politics and you will have time and opportunity for the inevitable change. But reject it, remit it to party conventions, to the stump, and to the ballot-box, and you will presently receive a blow from which there will be no time to recover. Need I recall to your minds another system, like this the relic of the ignorance and cruelty of the past, and like this supported by a false philosophy and defended on the ground that it was for the good of the toilers who were its victims? Need I recall its fate? Five and twenty years ago the South refused to accept the offers which the North was ready and eager to make. Such changes might then have been made in our Constitution as would have caused the emancipation of the slaves by purchase and by slow and graduated measures. Those who rejected that proffer saw their treasured system go down amid the violence of war and with every circumstance of mortification. Its defenders lost it and all besides; except, indeed, that they preserved the proud memory of the sacrifices they had made and the splendid fame with which the world has crowned their valor.

I can only refer to a few of the arguments used by our opponents. They justify their refusal to reduce the tariff taxes on the ground that their maintenance is necessary to certain of our industries. It is noticeable that the protectionists have changed their position. The system was first commended to the people on the ground that it was needed for the encouragement of infant industries, for the education of workingmen in arts unknown to them, and to persuade capital to enter enterprises which were important to the general welfare, which would make us independent of the foreigner and contribute to our defense in war. Mr. Clay asked that the American system should be encouraged for a few years; even as late an advocate of protection as Mr. Greeley used to say that he would be content with ten years of protection.

All this has been changed. After twenty years of protection the favored industries need it more than they ever did. Their infancy has passed, but they have not grown to manhood. They are still mendicants asking for alms. The protectionists now openly avow that the system must be permanent. The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Pennsylvania both declare that it must be permanent. We must face the distinct proposal that we must continue to maintain a part of our people in unprofitable employments. Why are we asked to do this? The gentleman from Massachusetts says that by so doing we will make a home market for our agriculture and that American agriculture can no longer depend upon the foreign market. He tells us that East Indian competition will destroy the European markets for our breadstuffs. It is a little curious that whenever the protective policy is urged upon Congress the specter of East Indian competition is invoked. It was so when the tariff of 1842 was under discussion. It was then said that India would outdo the South in the production of cotton.

Gentlemen will find this matter dealt with at great length by Mr. Calhoun in the speech which he delivered in the Senate on the 16th of March, 1842. Mr. Calhoun had no fear that India would drive American cotton out of European markets. It may interest gentlemen to refer to his speech and see the reasons he had for his confidence and also learn how truly he foretold what would happen. I have no fear that India will be a serious competitor in the grain markets of Europe. India is a thickly settled country, with a population of 229 to the square mile—more thickly settled than France, which has a population of 183 to the square mile; more thickly settled than any part of the United States except Rhode Island and Massachusetts. I do not find that densely peopled countries are great exporters of grain. I think no country can export much food unless it be thinly settled and have a congenial soil and climate and sufficient means of transportation. The increase of wheat production in India will probably lead to a greater use of wheat by the people of that country. In 1881 the East Indians were visited by a famine without parallel in modern history, and England bought vast quantities of our grain to keep from starvation those who live in what our friends fear will soon be the granary of the world. It is interesting to know that the cotton exports of India have greatly increased; in 1882 they amounted in value to about $90,000,000, and yet our cotton has not been driven from the markets of Europe. Last year India sent to Great Britain about twenty million dollars' worth of grain. I do not think this rivulet will soon grow into a flood.

But how is it proposed to meet this danger? If we are to have competition from India one would say the way to meet it would be to make wheat-growing cheaper here; to lighten the taxes of the farmer and to lessen the cost of his supplies. But that way is not proposed. It is said we will make a home market; we will create a class who will eat all the wheat and use all the cotton. Mr. Calhoun was told the same thing. He was offered a home market for Southern cotton, but the home market was not nor has it ever been large enough to take in the cotton crop. Indeed, when compared with the size of the crop, the market is ridiculously small. In 1882 only about a third of our cotton was used at home. In the same year we sent about 40 per cent. of our wheat abroad. Who is there here to wear our cotton? Who to eat our wheat? Our wheat and cotton growers are profitably employed. Some of our artisans—those engaged in protected industries—are not. It is proposed, in order to make a home market, to take men out of profitable employment and put them into unprofitable employments. If we do, they certainly must be maintained by those who remain in the profitable employments. Will the farmer be made able to overcome competition by an increase of his burdens?

When I hear gentlemen talk about making a home market for the consumption of food and merchandise, I sometimes wonder they do not cite European examples. In Europe great standing armies are maintained. Whatever objection there may be to standing armies, and I certainly do not favor them, they make an excellent home market. Germany, in time of peace, maintains an army of about 445,000 men. We employ about 400,000 persons in the highly protected cotton, iron, silk, and woolen industries. The German army costs about $80,000,000. We could maintain it quite within our surplus revenue. How much better a home market the soldiers would make than the artisans do. You could spend any amount on them. There never would be any surplus. There would then be that permanency to our taxation which seems so desired by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Ohio and all the gentlemen on the other side of the House. They would stimulate many industries. They would wear more and eat more than the artisans. They would need horses and barracks and guns and tinsel and musical instruments. Indeed, the making of instruments for the bands would be a most valuable industry, and would make up perhaps for the loss of that quinine manufacture, the emigration of which caused such sorrow the other day to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, one can not answer the arguments about a home market without falling into triviality, but it is because the arguments are trivial.

Our opponents use an argument of a more serious character and entitled to serious consideration. They say that the tariff is necessary in order to give our working people adequate wages. It is observable that the ground of the wages argument has been changed. At first it was said high duties are needed because labor is dear in this country. Now it is said that the tariff is necessary to keep labor dear. But without dwelling upon this inconsistency I say in all seriousness that if the effect of protective duties was to equalize property, to distribute it more widely, to give to the workman an easier life, to give to his children better opportunities, and to fill his home with comforts, I would gladly yield and join my opponents. But as I see it, this device of protection is the cruelest wrong which society does the poor and makes heavier the burden of poverty.

Let us consider a moment; if we find that prices of labor vary as much here under the protection of these laws as they do between Europe and America, the statement that the tariff adds to wages will I think be somewhat shaken. The difference in the cost of labor in California and in New York is as great as it is between New York and England. Nay, labor costs more in New York than in Boston, or even in Philadelphia. You may go to a mining camp in Colorado, and if it is on a railway the miners work for $2.50 a day. If you go forty miles away, over a range of mountains, the miners get $5 a day. In the South the negro works at from $8 to $12 a month, while on the Hudson we pay the farm laborer from $25 to $35 a month. It is plain, then, that something else besides the tariff has to do with the differences in the cost of labor. Where labor is plentiful, it is cheap; where it is scarce, it is dear. Where the workingman can be cheaply supported he works for less than where the cost of his support is great. Besides, the wages of the workingman are affected by the value of what he does, by his skill and intelligence. The Englishman is better paid than the Frenchman, the Frenchman better than the Italian, the Italian better than the Arab, the American better than any. You can hire a negro in Africa for a few beads, but he can not do anything except carry a pack. An American able to till a garden will in a day earn money enough to buy beads enough to hire a whole tribe of negroes.

In a word, Mr. Chairman, the price of labor is controlled by the great law of supply and demand. It is the one thing which the tariff can not affect except in this: that it may do the vast injustice of taking from profitable labor a part of its earnings and of giving it to the support of those whose labor does not support them.

I will, however, not leave this branch of the subject without saying that I do not believe there is any gentleman on this floor more desirous of finding some relief for the workingman or more solicitous as to the peril which threatens him than I am. No one can think of the experiences of this country during the last twenty years without dread for the future. We had supposed that we would escape the more serious evils of European society. But they are coming to us with daily increasing rapidity. The property of the country is falling into the hands of the few. The number of land-owners in proportion to the amount of land under cultivation has greatly diminished during the last decade. There are many counties in New York where there are not as many farmers as there were fifty years ago, and yet the population of the State is 5,000,000 and fifty years ago it was 2,000,000.

What is true of land is also true of other forms of property. No one can contemplate the rapid concentration of railway properties into the hands of a few men without admitting that it is the special scandal of our times. Mr. Chairman, I here aver that I regard a continuance of this concentration of property as a great danger to the country, and that unless it is arrested the peace of society can not long be maintained. What the measures of relief are to be I can not predict. But it is clear enough that relief can not come from taxing one class of our laborers and distributing the proceeds of the taxes in part to some of our laborers and in part to some of our capitalists, giving to the capitalists by far the larger share. This is shown by the fact that manufacturing property has been concentrated during the last ten years more rapidly than any other. We find that the tariff instead of being a defense against this danger is itself a prolific cause of it.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania drew in the darkest colors at his command an impressive picture of poverty in Europe. But it was not necessary to go there to find the extremes of human misery. I think he can find them in his own State. I think he can find them in his own district. But if he can not, let him come with me. I will show him on one of these bright days the Fifth avenue filled with a glittering stream of wealth and youth and beauty, and then we will go a little way and look at the dwellings of the poor. He will find whole families crowded into a single room, without a window from which the tender sky of the spring-time can be seen. He will see strong and skillful hands that can find no work. He will see gaunt faces and wasted figures; men without manhood; women without womanhood; age without solace and infancy without a hope. And when he has seen this spectacle—I will not charge it upon the tariff alone, nor yet upon the drink which he would make free; its causes lie far deeper; but I will tell him that, despite more than twenty years of the protection he has so carefully given, scenes like these are common in our land. He describes the degradation of the English poor; but in England there has been worked out during the last forty years an amelioration of social evils without parallel in history. The policy which Cobden and his associates persuaded England to adopt has resulted in pauperism diminished, crime diminished, and the welfare of the workingman greatly advanced. The policy which England abandoned has been transferred to our shores, and has brought with it and planted in our soil the foul weeds which had grown up in Europe during centuries of ignorance, superstition, and misrule. Simple measures have been potent to accomplish great results. But a little while ago Europe was given over to sectarian wars. The stake and the faggot, the thumb-screw and the rack were the instruments by which the Church herself sought to spread the gospel of peace and good-will. At last the spirit of charity came into the weary hearts of men, and suddenly religious hatreds fled, taking with them all these bloody instruments of wrong.

A few years ago we were told that the negro would not work except under the lash. He was made free, and behold the products of his voluntary labor now crowd the seas. You tell us that the workingman can not be protected unless you make his food, his clothing, and his shelter dear, unless you take away a part of his earnings and send him each day into servitude. We answer, make labor free. These are the triumphant monuments of human progress. First conscience free, then manhood free, and now labor free.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that we differ from other nations and should "isolate" ourselves from them. That would be a strange result of our boasted experiment in self-government. China alone has isolated herself, and after long centuries of isolation she has fallen into such moral degradation that we exclude her people from our shores.

Should we isolate ourselves, and other countries follow our example, the world would again be inhabited by nations ignorant of each other and regardless of each other's rights; frequent wars would create the necessity of great armies and strong governments. Those who now are free would soon lose their freedom in the grasp of successful soldiers, and not unlikely literature and civilization would be lost as they once were lost, and mankind again be compelled to begin the long and toilsome journey which our ancestors made from darkness into light.

I commend to my country a different policy; I advise her to continue in the path in which she began. Let the union of States be her purpose. That policy has brought under one government first thirteen and now thirty-eight separate communities; it has lately made a commercial treaty with Mexico; it advises us to a similar arrangement with Canada; thus bringing the whole of North America under the shelter of one commercial system. But we will go further still, and advise union, commerce, and peace with all nations. I see with other eyes than those of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I see in a future, not too remote I hope, all the nations bound together by swift fleets, by railway and cable lines, by the exchange of products and of manufactures, of letters and of the arts, and in this family of the world my country holding a commanding place, her voice heard, her counsels heeded, her example followed, and her power always used for the welfare of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] now permit me to say a word to him when it will not interrupt the thread of his argument?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to correct an error into which the gentleman fell touching myself personally. I was told on coming upon the floor that the gentleman had referred to me and had reported me as saying, "The difficulty is that the world has too much at present; the harvests have been too bountiful and the artisans too industrious." The gentleman did not do me the honor to hear me, and he evidently has not read my remarks. But I desire to say to him that whoever may have reported me as so saying has played upon him most egregiously. My complaint was that the distribution of the joint products of labor and capital was so inequitable, so at variance with the laws of national economy, that the laboring people were forced into idleness a great part of each year, and were sufferers from want and not from superabundance.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I heard his speech and I have read it with great care, and now I formally repeat the observation which I made in the course of my remarks.

Mr. KELLEY. I regret the gentleman's course, for it lessens my estimate of his character.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BAGLEY). The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I shall reserve that time for the purpose of yielding it hereafter.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DINGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 820) to authorize the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company to construct one or more bridges across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon, and to establish them as post-roads; and

A bill (S. 1706) to accept and ratify an agreement with the confederate tribes of the Flat Head, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Indians for a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana, required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same.

THE TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the remarks I had intended making I shall at this point endeavor to answer at least one of the erroneous propositions made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER]. His arguments are fair samples, Mr. Chairman, of the arguments of free-traders on every proposition that they make. The gentleman tells us that Germany has an army in round numbers of half a million men; therefore this army furnishes Germany with a home market. Why, sir, he might have said that Germany and Italy and Spain have an army of millions of paupers, sick, weak, lunatics, aged and infant, and they too furnish a market for home consumption. He might as well say that America has had army upon army of Indians upon these reservations under the support of the Government, and they too furnish a home market; that every State and county has its almshouses, its jails, and other institutions, and they too furnish a market for home consumption. But the gentleman forgets that all of these home consumers are not producers. Throw the army of Germany upon the producing army of Germany, glut the labor market of that country, and you will find a state of affairs that has never yet been paralleled in either protective or free-trade countries. The question is more a question of distribution of products than of surplus productions, as I shall show further on.

No function, duty, or attribute of government is more important and none more difficult than the proper adjustment of economic laws. As the human family is as diverse in race, nationality, government, wants, conditions, and circumstances as the human face, and as variable and shifting as the winds, this problem can not be solved by any inexorable law, nor can any principle or rule of action be evolved that will adjust itself to all men at the same time, or to any man or set of men at different times or in different places. Therefore every government must regulate and adjust these matters according to its own peculiar systems, necessities, and circumstances, having for its paramount object the greatest good to the greatest number.

The man who talks about universal free trade or universal adjustment of tariffs talks about universal impossibilities. It never was done and never will be done until the millennium makes angels of all mortals. And as the establishment of any general rule is impossible with the world at large, your horizontal humbug is just as impossible and as impractical with the individual government.

I can not understand for the life of me how such an intelligent gentleman as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] could ever attempt to adjust this matter upon a horizontal scale, unless from the fact that his party has been laid out so long that he has become horizontal on the brain.

Sir, the solution of this problem would be very much simplified if gentlemen would take a broader and more patriotic view of this question; if they could rise above the mean horizontal level of their party, and beyond mere locality and individual industry. The trouble with the average Democratic statesman is that he is national in nothing. He has never yet learned that the whole is equal to all its parts. He has never yet been able to comprehend the grandeur of a republic based on the equal rights, equal duties, and equal burdens of all its citizens. He has never yet discovered that our greatness and glory depend upon our willingness and determination to stand together and protect each other as one nation and one united family against all our foreign enemies, not only in military and naval warfare but also in political, social, and commercial warfare.

The Democrat of the period is a thing of opposite extremes, a kind of a jumborian midget, a great big nothing, an incomprehensible tattooed "what-is-it," that stopped growing before it had half matured, that does nothing but ape all the evils and mischief abandoned by others, without the ability to originate, adopt, or comprehend anything good or decent, an extremely selfish "dog-in-the-manger" economist, who can not utilize the gifts of God himself and will not permit his neighbor to enjoy them. This creature seldom has a commercial thought above a single commodity or a political idea beyond a local habitation. Some think the solution of the whole question is in sugar alone; others wrap their gigantic intellects in wool and are happy; with many more cotton is king; while nearly all agree with their Kentucky leaders that the summum bonum of all earthly glory may be found in the spiritual product of sour-mash bourbon. Few of them have ever been able to see farther than their own barn-yard; none have ever dared to venture beyond their State lines; while every one of them can always be found within the pale of his party. They are always orthodox in their paradoxical shibboleth "Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democracy," disregarding the fact that Jackson wanted to hang the only practical Jeffersonian exponent higher than Haman. And so they keep up this Kilkenny-cat fight between the straight-out free-trader, the "tariff-for-revenue-only" man, horizontal reductionist, incidental straddler, and last, but not least, the "raw-material" sophist, under the pretext of stopping the surplus revenue, or vice versa, and of lowering prices.

The burden of the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] was against surplus revenue. The gentleman from Kentucky reversed this by saying and proving that we had not a dollar of surplus revenue in the Treasury. You pay your money and you take your choice.

The second proposition is under the pretext of lowering the price of all except their specific pet commodities. As to the surplus-revenue cry, that is only a sham and a fraud, for the revenue can be decreased more surely and positively by a horizontal or a discriminating increase of tariff than by a decrease. The nearer you approach a prohibitory tariff the more you reduce the receipts from impost duties. Moreover, if the so-called surplus troubles you so much, why do not you abolish the internal revenue and protect the home producer against foreign competition, instead of crushing out the home producer and protecting the foreign monopolist?

A better system of protecting your farmer is to so reduce the tax on all alcoholic spirits and all that goes into the making of liquors, and even on your tobacco. If I had time I should like to discuss this question from a temperance standpoint and to show that even as temperance men, in order to be consistent with the temperance doctrine, we ought to advocate the taking off the tax from liquors and tobacco.

But your second and main object is to so lower prices that you may be able to undersell all competitors in any market of the world—i. e., the producer must have the lowest possible return for his product, no matter how it may affect his comfort or his social, political, or moral status. Our object is to so adjust prices as to give the producer the greatest possible return for his product and to elevate the American citizen to that high plane so essential to the maintenance and stability of republican institutions. For this purpose we must consider the three prime factors of political economy, which I contend are supply, demand, and stability.

And right here let me call attention to the fact that in that one word "stability" there is more virtue than in all the arguments that you have produced on your side of this question. We are suffering more by reason of fluctuations caused by foreign intervention and speculation than from any other reason under the sun. We must shelter ourselves against the baneful influences of pauper labor, cheap foreign capital, barbarous nations, and despotic governments.

Cheap capital is a more potent factor in the question of political economy than labor itself. I may disagree with some of my friends on this side of the House, but I repeat it, capital, by reason of our modern inventions, by reason of our utilization of the elements of nature, electricity, wind, water, and steam, is becoming every day a more potential factor and labor is relatively becoming a less powerful one.

I contend that with our financial system to-day, even if labor were as low here as in Europe, we could not compete successfully with the European producer. I showed last session that the European producer could sell his goods in the American market for much less than cost and yet make money. This may seem paradoxical to you gentlemen. Oh, you may smile, but it is a stubborn fact. Foreign producers can sell in this country for less than the article cost them and make great profits. And how will they do it? They do it because they sell on credit. Selling for cash, they could not do it of course. It is a notorious fact that the great silk dealers of New York can buy silk in Paris cheaper on credit than they can for cash. It is a fact that the English capitalist invests his surplus wealth in our railroad stocks, in all our corporations, not in dollars and cents, but in iron, in steel, in products that are to be used by these corporations. Money with them on permanent loans is worth only 2 per cent. Here, as my Democratic friends, Mr. HEWITT and others, showed conclusively, money in Iowa and other States is worth 7 and 8 per cent. on permanent loans, on the best security, without any loss or risk at all.

The Englishman can sell his rails at much less than cost by borrowing money at 2 per cent. in England, sending it here, and taking stock or first-mortgage bonds on our roads, then drawing 7 and 8 per cent. interest, and pocketing every year from 5 to 6 per cent. profit. Why, sir, in many instances it would pay him to sell his surplus dump in this country for almost nothing. In a short time he would make up the loss in the difference of interest, on the same principle that long-time bonds sell at a greater premium than short-time bonds.

But it is not only the difference in the rate of money that we must be sheltered against. What is the governmental policy of England? And I have not a word to say against the English people. I respect and honor them. They show their wisdom, their enterprise, their energy when they succeed in getting the advantage they have over us. It is our folly, not theirs. But it is their government which even above the great power of cheap money enables them to drive us out of the markets of the world. England is peculiarly a despotic commercial government; a government which has no object above and beyond commerce and the "almighty dollar;" a government every fiber of whose power is used to assist its citizens to drive every other nationality out of the commercial world; a government that has declared its war against Egypt, has subdued India, has pauperized Ireland; a government that has its colonial possessions at its feet, serfs and slaves, to pay tribute to their commercial gods. It is in this way that England has succeeded in driving all other countries out of the commercial world.

It has never been disputed that supply and demand are great factors in political economy. Supply and demand, so adjusted as to produce stability, are the greatest, and I may say the only, factors in this question. The price of your grain, as already shown, is not fixed by your foreign market. It is fixed by the surplus which is not consumed in this country. The prices in Liverpool and Chicago are raised or lowered just as the dealer finds that the crops are successful or unsuccessful and as the demand of the home market may affect that crop. This may well be illustrated. In the States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland the peach-growers, when their crop is so great as to affect unfavorably the price of peaches, dump their surplus into the Delaware River or Bay. Time and again have these farmers dumped their peaches. Why? Because there was a surplus, and they were not going to allow even a small surplus to ramify through the whole peach market and thus reduce the price of the entire peach crop. It is not a great surplus either that makes it necessary to do this. A very small surplus will glut the market. The moment there is a surplus, if it be as one to a thousand, it affects the price of the entire crop. The surplus dumped from foreign pauper markets is the great bane of our industries. It is this dump that we want to stop; it is protection against this dump that the protective system seeks to accomplish, and by avoiding the spasmodic glut assure stability and prevent the periodical crisis and stagnation that destroy the plant, and after the plant is destroyed the world's supply is lessened, but the demand goes on, prices again rise to an abnormal degree, and then it is that the consumer is truly robbed by the foreign monopolist.

Protection, it has been said, raises the prices of commodities. I deny the proposition. Under a protective system, assuring stability, the average prices of all commodities will be cheaper in a long period than they will be if subject to the spasmodic fluctuations incident to the baneful influence of foreign monopolistic despotism.

Let me give you some examples. Such industries as we have in this country—and I hope you free-trade Democrats will be kind enough to pay attention—such industries in this country as can not in the nature of things be interfered with by foreign competition furnish their products more cheaply than anywhere else in the world. Why, sir, can you ride as cheaply per mile in an English railroad-car as you can in an American? Can you have as cheap fare at your English or even your German hotel as you can in America? Why, sir, the kind of meal that they set in our hotels in this country would in Germany, France, or England cost you ten times the price you pay for it here. You gentlemen who have been abroad know this to be the fact. Nay, go further. Take the newspaper. You get an eight-page, twelve-page, or sixteen-page paper, as good as any published in the world, and you pay but 2 cents for it. You can not get a similar paper for that price anywhere else in the world. Take photographs, melanotypes, or any pictures of that kind. You can get a better photograph taken in America for less money than you can anywhere in Europe.

Why is it? These are all things which by the nature of the product can not be interfered with by foreign intervention. Europe can not put her railroads over here. She can not get our coastwise trade, because our laws protect it. That is cheaper, too, as shown by my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. You can not have your picture taken in Europe unless you go there. They can not set their camera on the other side of the Atlantic and take your picture on this side. They can not furnish you with a daily newspaper. They can not remove their hotels here nor furnish you daily meals while you are here.

I challenge you free-traders to show me one American industry which by the nature of things is free from foreign competition that the prices of its products are not lower and the articles better than any like article anywhere in the world.

Under a healthy, free American system, with just and equal laws—most products would not only be cheaper to the consumer but would realize more to the producer, and especially to the farmer and the workingman. While the other side is constantly crying "Lo! the poor farmer!" you are adding insult to injury by presuming upon his ignorance, for the intelligent farmer well knows that he above all others is benefited by the protective system. He has under its benign influence better houses, better fences, better barns, better utensils, better furniture, better instruments, better schools, better morals, better men, better women. The farmer never gets to the point of starvation by reason of any general business crisis. No man can economize much in the consumption of farm products, for food we must have at all times, while the product of the business man, the laboring mechanic, is not at all times indispensable.

Moreover, farm products under our tariff system have generally increased in value while other products have decreased. Why, sir, during the last Democratic administration, under "ten-cent Jimmy," in many localities coal was so dear and corn so cheap farmers used corn for fuel. I remember very well, and I want you farmers to remember—I remember very well, in my short lifetime, when it took a good cow to buy a good cooking-stove. To-day a good cow will furnish the best kitchen in the land with cooking-stove and all the utensils necessary for a well-regulated kitchen.

I worked for years as a watchmaker, and I remember well when it took a good horse to buy a good clock, and to-day the price of a good horse will set you up in a respectable watch and clock business. Clocks for a dollar. A good horse is all the way from $250 to $1,000.

Why, sir, it used to take, in my short lifetime, a whole calf to buy a saw. To-day you can buy the best of Disston's make for the hide of a calf.

I remember when it took a pound of the best butter to buy a pound of nails. To-day you can buy a pound of nails with a quart of skimmed milk.

Yet you talk about protection to the farmer. Where has his commodity fallen in price? Every other commodity has fallen by reason of protection, while the farmer has always held his own or rose steadily from year to year, and this is what I learned the rhetorical oracle [Mr. HURD] called legalized robbery of the farmer, while that is false. The truth is, your system of free trade, involving the Malthusian doctrine of the survival of the fittest, is rapine and murder most foul and unnatural, by forcing brother against brother in the desperate struggle for life. But they tell us a protectionist is a monopolist. Protectionists never were and can not be monopolists. What does it mean in that sense? Do we protect the individual wool-grower, do we protect wool only in one locality or in one State? Do we protect any one man or any one corporation or any one locality? No; we protect the article and we invite every man to partake in that protection. If wool-raising by our protection is a profitable business, we invite you to become wool-growers.

If iron and steel be more profitable under our protection, we beg of you come and develop the undeveloped iron and steel and coal and minerals of our hills and valleys. Is that monopoly? Why, your system involves the very essence of monopoly—to protect and defend British monopolies; to protect and defend the American whisky monopolies. Why, there is not a whisky dealer that is not praying and begging to have the tax kept on. The monopoly has driven all other men out of the whisky business except the rich nabobs in Kentucky and other States, and yet you charge us with being monopolists!

Then, again, you tell us that under free trade we have had better wages as compared with the purchasing power of commodities. I deny it. In the first place we have never had free trade in this country, and especially have we never had free trade and free labor at the same time. For ever since Abraham Lincoln issued the emancipation proclamation abolishing slave labor we have had protection, and therefore when you say that example has taught anything in favor of free trade you tell us that which you know is not true.

Then, Mr. Chairman, comes the raw-material sophist, the greatest humbug of all. Sir, there is no raw material except the pure sunshine of heaven, the air, the water, the earth in its natural state. Gold as raw material in the bowels of the earth is worthless. Dig it out—that is, apply the magic wand of labor—and it becomes very valuable. Yet it is still raw material under your theory to the assayist, the coiner, the jeweler, the artist, and the scientist. Iron and coal are worthless raw materials in the mine, but the talismanic touch of labor changes their value from the iron in the mine to the hair-spring and the almost invisible pivot and screw, which are much more valuable than their weight in gold; and yet, under your theory, they are raw material to the watchmaker.

Sir, the more human tissue and brain-sweat that is expended on a production the further it is removed from raw material. Now, by this bill you call coal raw material; and Mr. HEWITT, of New York, above all others, advocates placing coal upon the free list. Why, sir, there is not a product of earth upon which so much human tissue is expended, so much brain-sweat, so much labor, so much suffering and toil as there is in the production of coal. The miner makes greater sacrifices in producing that article than any other producer in the world. Down miles into the bowels of the earth, groping his way in the darkness, facing all the torturing elements of sickness and death, fire, sulphur, falling rock, dust, the treacherous black-damp, and water, amid these elements this toiler produces what Mr. HEWITT chooses to call "raw material," a commodity in which more money is expended and more lives lost to the product or the return than any other commodity that was ever yet produced by the labor of man. The price of the coal in comparison to the waste of tissue is less than that of any other article; nay, it not only requires this waste of tissue, but requires men, men with muscle, men with brains, men with hearts, heroes that face danger in all its most horrid forms, men who take their lives in their hands, who leave their wives and little ones every morning, go into the bowels of the earth out of the pure air and sunlight, which they never see except on the Lord's day in the winter months! These are the men who produce the article that the honorable gentleman from New York chooses to call "raw material."

Why, sir, of all men on this floor, Mr. HEWITT certainly ought to know better. He is the owner of coal-lands and of coal-mines, and ought never to forget the slaughter of Avondale and Pocahontas in this country and greater slaughters in the old country. I am sorry he is not here. I do not see him in his seat, for I should like him to answer the question why he attempts to hoodwink you with the idea that coal is raw material.

But I must hasten on. I had intended answering a number of equally ridiculous propositions of other gentlemen, but I find my time is growing short. One remark further, however, upon this point. Mr. HEWITT himself described the horrible scenes of poverty in the coal regions, but permit me to say it was very much overdrawn. He only described the surface scene; he only described the horror and the misery of the miners and the laborers on the surface, and that picture was much overdrawn. For I tell you, sir, that among the miners and laborers in the coal region there is as much comfort as there is among any other class of workmen in this country and far more intelligence than the gentleman's constituency possess. It is only this imported labor that you find in such wretchedness and misery. You find the Hungarian, an article of recent importation, housed as you find some of the constituency of the gentleman from New York housed in New York, but none others of our laborers are in that condition. And who is responsible for this? Why, Mr. HEWITT himself, on the Committee on Ways and Means, in reply to Mr. Day said he [Mr. Day] was a public benefactor because he imported this foreign element.

I do not mean to say Mr. HEWITT imported this element himself, nor that he is responsible for the short hours. But he is a member of one of the coal corporations he speaks of that brought about this state of contracting the hours of labor to three days a week under the anthracite board of trade. If he is not now, he used to be of the firm of Cooper, Hewitt & Co. One of the largest miners of coal in my region turned his cash assets and lands into stock forming a corporation known as the Alliance Coal Company. The gentleman finds fault with the very men of whom he was, or seems at least to be, a part.

It is an argument, he says, to show that overproduction is the great evil we are contending with. That has been repeated by almost every gentleman on that side of the House. I tell you, sir, there can be no such thing as overproduction, general overproduction, It is simply a question of ability to distribute. Our capacity of consumption is correlative with the power of destruction, and all you need do is to give us the opportunity, give us the chance, and we will consume everything you produce that is worth making. The argument is as false on that proposition as every other one that you have advanced. Your remedy should be in such a financial system as would facilitate the interchange of commodities and prevent spasmodic fluctuations by allowing corporations to control the medium of exchange, namely, money; in such just and equitable laws as would give to the producer a fair share of his product. The evil is not in the tariff; it is in your monopolies. It is in the fact that under your monopolistic system you have allowed them to build up their railroads on credit and to absorb the sweat and blood of laboring men in gambling in watered stocks, unearned interests, and dividends encouraged by your vile credit system.

You talk about your millionaires of recent date. Who are they? Railroad men, commercial nabobs, stock-jobbers, bankers, brokers, and bonanza kings. There is hardly one that is a manufacturer; hardly one that is a producer. Had you been half so zealous in stopping the evil effects of these monopolies as you have been in falsely attempting to charge it upon the doctrine of protection you might have solved this problem and proved yourselves great benefactors.

Why, says the gentleman (Mr. HEWITT), in the iron-ore regions of my State men are working for 62 cents a day. And yet in the same breath he would make iron ore a raw material. Where is the consistency of such logic? That the demand for iron ore is so meager that you can only get 62 cents for mining it, and for the purpose of bettering that condition you must allow the foreign iron ore to come in on our market and flood it more than it is flooded already! Only 62 cents for mining; but bring in the product of the pauper laborer of Europe and we will cure it all!

Again, the unions of labor, trades-unions, are the fancy of Mr. HEWITT. He thinks they are the only thing that will remedy this evil. In England the trades-unions have made progress, I grant you. But they have made it simply because there are no conspiracy laws there preventing them from combining. I was glad to learn that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] was in favor of the abolition of conspiracy laws. He was right in that. I wish he was as right in other propositions. Under the English system they have made this progress by their unions. In this country they will make greater progress if you will only abolish the conspiracy laws, restrict the powers of monopolies, and keep up your protective system.

The importations of foreign contract labor is one of the hardest questions to solve. I grant you that manufacturers are no better than other people. They will take advantage of a business point as well as the farmers and others. But they are no worse. If they can get cheap labor from Europe they will have it. And in that they are only human. Stop the importation of your serf labor, stop the importation of the laborer under contract, open the door to white labor in the South, and that will go far toward remedying this evil.

Whatever chance the laborer has to compete with this foreign labor he has by virtue of protection. Take that away, and you pull down his only remaining support, you aggravate the evil the more. Simply because we are not all perfect, simply because we have not arrived at that point where every workingman can be independent and stand erect in the true dignity of his manhood and assert his rights, you say, wipe out what little chance we have in this protective policy, thus aggravating the evil. You tell us that cheap products in themselves mean cheap living, and that will cure it. This, too, is false. Let me call your attention to this fact: If a laboring man earns $10 a week, having a mortgage on his house say of $100, and he can save 5 per cent. of that $10 a week, it will be 50 cents. If he gets but $5 a week he saves the same percentage. Five per cent. on $5 is 25 cents; 5 per cent. on $10 is 50 cents; and thus he will be able to pay 100 per cent. more on his mortgage every week under our system than he will under yours.

To say the least of it, this protective system is in favor of the debtor classes. Your system, in its best shape and phase, can only possibly help the creditor, can only possibly help the banker, can only possibly help the broker, can only possibly help the commercial shark. Our system must at all times help the debtor and the honest creditor by stability. Therefore your system contemplates no other mode of acquiring a foreign market unless your commodities be so cheaply produced as to enable us to undersell all foreign competitors. This, sir, is utterly impossible. You may try it from now to doomsday and you will never accomplish it while we are in direct unprotected competition with them, for they are already down to the bottom rock of despair. The European, the Asiatic, the African producer is already down so low that we can get no lower, no matter how much you may attempt to crush us down.

We can never hope to supply their market except, first, with our incidental surplus productions, our "dump," if you please, the result of domestic competition, for which we rely principally (under our protective system) upon our home market. Second, we can only hope to supply their market with products in which by our superior genius, climate, quantity, quality, and other resources we have the natural advantage over them.

Sir, cheapness alone will not do it. Even if by your damnable policy you force us down amid the poisonous vapors of Asiatic misery and African wretchedness we can not cope with our foreign adversaries in their markets, for we still lack the necessary stability that can only be acquired by a proper system of economic laws and protection against the dump of the pauper labor and cheap surplus capital, backed by all-powerful despotic commercial governments.

But, sir, the most astonishing jugglery and necromancy is in the success of the deception you practice by reasoning from false premises, and the wholesale perversion of the truth. Many of your cheap statesmen while clamoring for cheap products of labor are loud-mouthed for just reward for the man that is to produce this very cheap article. Oh, yes; you favor high wages, but want nothing to result from labor to pay it with. But the most cheeky of all propositions is the claim of your party to be the friend of the poor workingman. Since when, I pray, have your acts sustained the claim? Why, sir, ever since I have known anything of the Democratic party the whole history of that party is a history of championship of slave labor.

You not only championed slave labor until we forced you away from it; but you were willing to destroy the greatest government, the only free government under the sun, that you might build up your confederacy on the rock of the divinity of slavery. Slave labor was your shibboleth; slave labor gave you your strength. You are to-day no more honest than you were then. You are to-day in favor of slave labor just as much as you ever have been. You are to-day fighting under the same black flag of Bourbon Democracy.

You are to-day in favor of grinding down not only the laborer of your own sunny South, the negro, by depriving him of his political rights and of his manhood, but you are endeavoring to deprive the laborer of the North of his rights by the horizontal leveling of all labor to your Southern status. And, as suggested by my friend near me [Mr. PETTIBONE], all this is in the name of Democracy.

Moreover, you restrict the labor market and hem it in by a system of social, commercial, and political ostracism that prevents the natural ebb and flow of the labor of our country. Tear down your Chinese wall of selfishness, jealousy, and envy and encourage the superior talent and energy of the North to come among you and teach you how to become as progressive and prosperous as we are. You will then not only benefit the laborer of the North, but will add threefold blessings to your own people.

Sir, your system seeks a commercial victory at the expense of social, political, and moral defeat. Our system seeks commercial supremacy by the broad highway of progress that leads us to national greatness. The whole problem of life under your system is only the almighty dollar, and for this soulless god you would sink the American citizen beneath the mire of India serfdom and have him burrow under the slime of British despotism for the laudable purpose of dragging us with all humanity down into the Cobden and Malthusian hell of extermination by oppression, war, famine, and pestilence.

While protection to American industry means protection to American institutions, it means the elevation of the American citizen to a still higher plane of civilization, it means a broader and purer democracy, a more comprehensive republic, a more charitable and liberal toleration to all men. It means, sir, a wiser, healthier, and happier people, going onward in the way of progress, adding a haloed luster to the bright sunlight of liberty, that it may shed its rays over the rest of the benighted world and show all mankind, in the name of God and of American institutions, the direct road up to the horizontal plane of universal rights, universal duties, universal burdens, and universal happiness. [Great applause.]

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I listened a few days ago with interest to the speech of a gentleman who has for twelve consecutive terms been elected to a seat on this floor—who has served longer continuously than any other member, and who receives and is entitled to the appellation of the Father of the House, for by it I expected to be advised of the benefits of a protective system, and of the evils of a contrary policy. And if I say that by his argument I failed to be convinced of the one or the other, I have an abiding faith that those who heard it as well as those who may read it will not attribute it to my mental obtuseness. All the poverty and misfortunes of "prosperous, merry, free-trade England" were charged to the account of her free-trade policy.

Lest it might be regarded mal apropos in me I shall not criticise the mode of investigation by which the learned gentleman ascertained certain facts, but will be content with saying that the best investigation of the misfortunes of that country could not be made by an invalid tourist in the short space of eleven weeks, nor is the best authority in regard to the diseases of Switzerland the hearsay statement of an unnamed medical pauper practitioner of this country.

Is there naught but the system of free trade that causes the poor of England to suffer more than the poor of the United States? Is it not a fact that other causes than that named by the gentleman produce the results to which he so feelingly alluded? Are tales of woe, and poverty, and misery, and crime unknown among the sovereigns of free, enlightened, prosperous, but tariff-ridden America?

We claim, sir, that we have the freest, the fairest, and the proudest governmental fabric ever erected by man, in which every man is a sovereign. The freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, the right of trial by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, the right to worship God according to the dictates of the conscience of each, all guaranteed and maintained—a "government of the people, by the people, for the people." We pay no tribute to the monarch. The cost of keeping up magnificent households and the gorgeous paraphernalia of royalty are not paid by us. We have no princes to whom we grant annuities, no titled nobility that draw a pension from our exchequer. Does the laborer in a country so ruled and possessed of such rights have no advantages over those of merry England? If not, our form of government is a farce, and the glories of a republic a myth!

England has been known for centuries to the civilized world. From the invasion of Britain by Cæsar to that of the elder Napoleon eighteen hundred years intervened. It is Old England. Every acre of her available lands has been cultivated for centuries; worn out, they have been restored by costly artificial processes time and time again to productiveness. An eternal fog rests upon her, and her climate is cheerless and forbidding. The limits of her municipalities cover almost the entire realm, and her territory, small in extent, is crowded with teeming millions of people. The agricultural acreage of the country is not sufficient to supply her people with the necessary means to feed and clothe themselves, and for these they are dependent on the great world's supply. To render her less dependent on the South for her cotton and on the West for her supplies of animal and vegetable food she has made the great sacrifices and such questionable experiments in India that she has. Her real estate is owned and held in large tracts by a landed aristocracy. The masses as a rule have no interest in it save as the tenants of extortionate landlords or as the servants of a titled nobility. Her poor have no homes, no lands—landless and homeless. Her laws of primogeniture and entail have prevented them, no matter how industrious and frugal, from acquiring a real-estate footing.

How great the contrast when compared with the United States. Scarcely a century has passed since she had a government of her own. Not four centuries have elapsed since Columbus discovered it as an unbroken wilderness uninhabited save by roving bands of untutored savages. There are yet living those who saw the first President inaugurated. It is Young America! An athlete unfettered, able to cope with the world in the world's great battle! Within her limits she has every character of climate to satisfy the varied tastes of mankind, possessed of a soil, a large proportion of which has never been scarred by the plowshare, it needs "but to be tickled with a straw and it laughs with an abundant harvest." Her territory, as compared with that of England, is limitless. Though we have a population of over 55,000,000 of people, our country is sparsely settled. The products of our farms afford not only enough to supply the demands of the people at home, but under proper encouragement and wholesome laws capable of supplying the deficit of every country beneath the sun. Under her wise and beneficent homestead laws there are none so poor that they are not able to acquire lands and homes from the public domain—a domain sufficient, unless unwisely granted by Congress to corporations, to satisfy the wants of settlers for generations yet to come.

I shall not speak of other natural and material advantages possessed by her lest I weary the patience of the House; but I ask, is it any wonder that, surrounded by all these advantages and blessings, the American laborer is more thrifty than his brother of England? If these are not the causes that contribute to this end rather than that claimed by those who favor a protective tariff, then I assert by a parity of reasoning that the wages paid in the countries of Europe whose governments maintain a high protective tariff should be higher than those who have adopted the free-trade system. Is this so? England is a free-trade country. France and Germany are dominated by a protective tariff. A comparison between the wages paid by these countries ought to settle this question.

I hold in my hand tables prepared from unquestioned data by Mr. Jacob Schoenhof, showing the different prices paid in the different industries of those countries and in the United States. I shall not detain the House by reading them, but will incorporate them as part of my remarks, where gentlemen can consult them at leisure if they so desire.

In the cotton industries Mr. Schoenhof says that the wages paid in the United States in 1878 were on the average not more than 15 per cent. higher than the wages of English cotton operatives. And he says that, "as compared with Germany and France, English wages are fully 50 per cent. above those of Germany and on the average at least 30 per cent. above those of France. In the woolen industries wages on the average are about 30 per cent. higher in the United States than in England; in England about 20 to 35 per cent. higher than in France, and fully 50 per cent. higher than in Germany. In the iron industries American wages average fully 75 per cent. more than English wages. Wages in England are fully 75 per cent. higher than those paid in Germany for like work in metals, and perhaps one-third higher than in France. In the manufacture of boots and shoes about the same relative prices exist as in metals."

The protectionists by these facts are placed in the anomalous position of explaining how a high protective tariff makes lower wages in France and Germany than in England, and how the same kind of a tariff in the United States makes higher wages than in England. Reductio ad absurdum. The truth is, there was never a more senseless argument made by sensible men to a sensible people than that a high protective tariff makes high wages. In different countries they may be different, and in different localities in the same country, but everywhere they are regulated by the same inexorable and unchangeable law of supply and demand. Ah! gentlemen, it is not for the laborer that a high protective tariff is sought to be maintained. It is not for him that our desks are laden day after day with periodicals and papers containing essays and letters in favor of this system. It is not in his interest that tours are made to Europe by paid correspondents that fill the pages of dailies and weeklies with questionable statements and statistics favorable to a tariff.

It is sought to be maintained by monopolies that under its fostering care and protection within the last quarter of a century have been warmed into existence; monopolies that have destroyed individual enterprise, consumed individual energy, and blighted American manhood.

If for the benefit of the laborer such laws were maintained, instead of occupying an humble cottage and sharing his frugal meal with his humble family he would be occupying the costly mansion of the manufacturer and his table would be laden with imported viands, tropical fruits, and all the luxuries that wealth could bring. Instead of himself and his family being scantily clothed they would be clad in silks and satins and fine linens; instead of rising at early dawn and walking to his place of labor, and when tired and worn out returning by the same conveyance to his humble home, he would with his family be riding in splendid equipages, driven by liveried servants, from palace to shop, from capital to capital, knowing no weariness save that imposed by a study of how best to satisfy his own tastes and desires.

The able Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], in an elaborate and unanswerable argument made in the Chamber at the other end of this Capitol, in February, 1882, said:

During the fiscal year just closed the value of dutiable merchandise imported into this country from abroad, as the Treasurer's report shows, was $448,061,587.95. Upon this merchandise was collected at the custom-houses $193,800,897.67, being an average of 43½ per cent. This is the entire revenue of the Government derived from the tariff for the last fiscal year. Now, what amount do the manufacturers receive from the tariff? By the census of 1870 it was estimated that four million dollars' worth of manufactured articles were consumed annually in the United States. The figures for 1880 are not yet published so as to be accessible, but following the ratio of increase in population and everything else, they must now amount to at least $5,000,000,000 each year. All these manufactures being increased in cost to the consumer by the amount of tariff duty, which, as I have before stated, is an average of 45 per cent., which goes to manufacturers, it is easy to see on that basis what the share of the manufacturer would be. But I will discount that per cent. so as to more than cover all contingencies and all drawbacks, and say they only receive under the tariff 25 per cent. on the sum total of manufactured articles consumed in the United States, and it amounts to the enormous sum of $1,250,000,000 annually. And the amount increases each year with the population and trade of the country.

So for the year 1881 the results of tariff taxation and the distribution of its proceeds may be tabulated thus:

Revenue received by the Government	$193,800,897 67
Bounty received by manufacturers	1,250,000,000 00

So that for every single dollar paid into the national Treasury under the existing tariff six and a half dollars, at the lowest calculation, go into the pockets of the manufacturers. If this vast sum of money were collected annually from the pockets of the people directly to be given to the already richest class of people in this country each year its monstrous iniquity would of course be so apparent as to defeat it. But it is collected indirectly, though as surely, in an increased price of everything they consume, in everything they eat, drink, and wear; in every tool and implement they work with; in every article which enters into the construction of the houses they live in, whether used for strength or utility or ornament; in every book or newspaper they read. This tax is as all-pervading as the atmosphere they breathe, and they have been so accustomed to it that they neither feel nor appreciate its enormity.

The total number of all the laborers in the United States in 1880, including those dependent on them, engaged in manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries, was in round numbers 7,700,000; divide the bounty received by the manufacturers, according to the statement of Senator COKE, $1,250,000,000, by this number and it gives to each laborer $162.26 per annum, and to each one dependent on him the same sum. Placing the number of dependents, including himself, at three, which is a moderate estimate, and the laborer would receive from the Government direct $486 per annum instead of as now the sum of $395 per annum, which is the average amount paid to the laborer by the manufacturers of this country. This amount would be given him without the stroke of a single lick or the effort of a solitary muscle.

I have spoken alone of that class of laborers who are engaged in the mining, manufacturing, and mechanical industries of the country. According to the census report these represent only about 22 per cent. of the laboring population, and under the mechanical head is included carpenters, blacksmiths, brick-masons, &c., which receive no direct benefit from the tariff. Deduct these and we have but about 12 or 15 per cent. that the advocates of a high tariff claim are directly protected.

The exactions laid by the tariff are paid, as I claim, not to the laborer, but to the manufacturer; but admit for argument sake that they are distributed alike to the laborer in the manufacturing industries and the manufacturers, 85 per cent. of the population of this country pay the immense bonus to the other 15 per cent. What do they in turn receive? Says the protectionist to all the people: you are nourishing the infant industries of the country; they will soon be self-sustaining and enabled successfully to compete with foreign manufacturers. How much longer will the cry of the infant be heard in the land; when will his lamentations cease? In the beginning of this century it was thought a temporary tariff of 8 per cent. would bring about this result. In 1815 the father of the American system thought that a tariff of 25 per cent. would accomplish it, and that too within the short period of three years. In 1824 it was increased for the same purpose; again in 1828, and so on, and so on. The infant is yet in its swaddling clothes, though manufacturing has increased to that extent that the home demand—the only demand we are allowed by our law to supply—can be fully met by running on half time.

It is time this infant stopped "puling in its nurse's arms." It will be an infant so long as Government pap is furnished it. It needs but to come in contact with the world and the world's trade to show its manhood. Strip it for the fight by taking off the garment of protection that weakens and enervates it. Bid it God speed; and in a few years, grown strong by competition, it will return to you bronzed and hardened by contact with the world to pour into your lap the commerce of the South American governments, of Mexico, of the islands of the Atlantic, of far-off China and Japan, and it may be, entering the British dominions, turn her trade to America, and secure to your country the title of Queen of the Sea.

To the American farmer the advocates of a high protective tariff say you are benefited by having furnished to you at your own threshold a market for your surplus products. I state it as a fact that the enhanced prices paid by the farmer on account of the tariff on every article he wears and consumes will more than double the gross amount received by him by sale of his products to the manufacturer and all his employés. This home-market theory has been told him for "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." If this be so, why does the report of the trade of this country with foreign countries show that at least 80 per cent. of its total exports consist of farm products?

The truth is that foreign countries to-day fix the price of the produce of American farms and not the home demand. But for this foreign demand the fields on which this surplus grows or is raised would grow up in weeds, or after having been garnered it would rot in the barns or gins or be burned for fuel, as in my country years ago. The farmer receives no protection at the hands of Congress. He is compelled to ship his surplus produce to other countries, taking there the price that is fixed by the law of supply and demand. Rising with the morning sun, he is compelled to work until the going down thereof. Receiving no bonus like the manufacturer, his gross profits in the year 1880 were only 5 to 7 per cent., while those of the manufacturer for the same year were over 36 per cent.

The wages of the laborer on the American farm are from 300 to 500 per cent. higher than similar labor of any other country with which his farm products come in competition abroad. Notwithstanding all this, he is not permitted to buy what he wants or needs in the market where he sells or the cheapest market. To illustrate: A farmer may ship a cargo of corn to Liverpool and sell the same at a better price than he could receive at home; yet if he wished to buy any article of necessity or luxury with which to make up a return cargo the tariff laws of this country would, before permitting him to receive and use them, compel a payment of a tax of 35 to 150 per cent., prohibitory in its effect. He is thus compelled to enter into competition in the sale of his products with the lowest-priced labor of the world, and is compelled to buy what he may need in a market that under the law is permitted to fix a price from 35 to 150 per cent. higher than in the market in which he sold his produce.

Doubly robbed, the high protectionist would doubly damn him because he repudiates their doctrines, or, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would compel him to raise sorghum as an antidote for "all the ills that flesh is heir to." Under this system the farmer of this country, notwithstanding he has a virgin soil to work, is growing year by year poorer and poorer; mortgages are made on the homestead to make ends meet, with the hope that next year will bring better prices, but hope deferred makes the heart sick, and the old man dies with the incumbrance still on the farm, and the young man takes it up where he left off, and the same tale is repeated again and again. If this be the case when the lands are new and fresh, how much more sad will it be when the soil is exhausted and there is no surplus to sell, but the tariff tax must still be paid.

No wonder, sir—

Said Mr. Marshall, of Illinois, several years ago, in a speech on this floor—

No wonder, sir, that the Western farmer is struggling with poverty and conscious of a wrong somewhere, although he knows not whence the blow comes that is chaining him to a life of endless toil and reducing his wife and children to beggary.

It is claimed by the advocates of a high protective tariff that the higher the import duties the cheaper will be goods. So flimsy a claim can only be based on the idea that the manufacturer is too honest to take advantage of the privilege that is given under the law of charging a profit equal to the tariff or promulgated in the belief that a credulous people will receive as true any statement that may be made by this favored interest. No fact is better established than that the importer of any article not produced in this country on which a tariff is laid must pay the duty upon it, and in selling it to a consumer must have returned to him what he pays for the article, including the cost of transportation and insurance and the tax or tariff paid to the Government. And if the article be produced in this country the producer will place the price on a level with the foreign article. There may be and doubtless are times when the American producer sells for less, but it is the exception and not the rule.

It is asserted, and notably by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], that the great prosperity of the country within the last decade is attributable to a high protective tariff, and comparisons were made by him to establish this fact.

It is needless to say, Mr. Chairman, that no one cause could produce prosperity in a country. It is dependent on many, the least of which in my opinion is the tariff. I wondered while the gentleman was speaking if he would have attributed the unparalleled prosperity of England in the last forty years to the abolition of all import duties and the establishment of free trade—that prosperity that showed itself by the increase of her exports of merchandise from $310,000,000 in 1840, to $1,533,000,000 in 1882. The fallacy of such arguments is easily exposed.

As it is not for the benefit of the laborer so it is not for the purpose of creating a home market for the farmer, nor for the protection of infant industries, nor for the purpose of making goods cheaper, nor yet, as claimed by the gentleman from New York, of causing the general prosperity of the country, but it is for the purpose of enriching the few at the expense of the many, of concentrating the wealth of the country in the hands of a favored class. It is for the purpose of building up a moneyed aristocracy, the most disgusting and contemptible of all aristocracies, not relying upon its antiquity nor its noble deeds nor on an unsullied escutcheon, but acquiring and maintaining its position through dollars contributed by the sweat and muscle, the groans and mental anguish of the poor laborers of the country. Beware of fostering and encouraging such an element. It will fasten itself on the body politic and by corrupt practices will destroy the liberties of the people and uproot the foundation-stones of the Republic.

If all were accomplished by levying a high protective tariff that its advocates claim, I still protest that Congress has no power to levy or impose any tax on the people except for the legitimate purposes of Government, for the payment of its expenses, ordinary and extraordinary. It has no right to take my money and give it to another to enable him to succeed in an enterprise which would otherwise be unprofitable. The power of taxation is a sovereign power, delegated by the people and the States to the General Government. It is a power that should be restricted and confined within the limits imposed by the letter of the fundamental law. When this limit is intentionally overleaped, taxation in excess thereof becomes legalized robbery. I need not quote the Constitution of the United States, neither the decisions of the Supreme Court under it, to prove the position I have assumed.

It has time and again been announced and approved by the judiciary of the Federal Government, and of every State in the Union, and he who would dispute it would "dispute against the sun." Yet in the face of these universally approved propositions, we find some of the leading apostles of a great national party asserting that they are in favor of protection for protection's sake, which interpreted means that if the Government were out of debt and required no revenue, yet they are willing and ready to impose restrictions on importations from foreign countries that would give to American manufacturers the exclusive control of the home market. That a doctrine so monstrous should be espoused in the full blaze of the nineteenth century, is but an evidence that there are those who respect no landmarks and know no constitution.

The United States needs no high tariff laws to protect her labor or her manufactures, and a tariff limited to the purposes of revenue is the only tariff that can be imposed under the Constitution; it is also the one that will bring the greatest prosperity. It is a conceded fact that the capacity for manufacturing in all the leading industries of the country exceeds the home demand and the small export demand; that the present overproduction of manufactured articles is very large; that the factories do not run on more than three-quarters time and frequently on half-time. I assert that one of the best evidences of the prosperity of a country is in the fact that its labor has continuous employment. It will not be denied that a population spends what is already earned when not actively engaged in work more rapidly than when it is, because it must find that recreation in pleasure which is in part yielded by active employment. Idleness is said to be the devil's workshop, and any population that has nothing to do will become more or less vicious according to surrounding circumstances, and discontent and restlessness undoubtedly follow.

What is the cause of labor being unemployed? The reason is given that manufacturers have stocks on hand more than sufficient to supply the demands of trade. What trade? The trade of the people of the United States. What limits the manufacturer to this trade? Why does he not sell his goods in other countries? The answer is that the citizen of the United States is prohibited by law from buying or interchanging commodities with the people of other countries, and that right exists between the people of other nations. Not being permitted to sell what they make or produce to the citizens of the United States, it is not strange that they should buy what they want from others who are given that privilege.

It is the interchange of commodities that produces commerce, without which no country was ever truly great. It is the high tariff that closes the ports of foreign countries to our trade; that has swept our merchant marine from the high seas and placed 95 per cent. of our foreign carrying trade under foreign flags. Modify these laws by reducing your tariff to a revenue basis, break down the barriers that prevent the manufacturer from seeking a foreign market for the sale of his manufactured goods, and you will hear no more of overproduction, of labor unemployed, of machinery stopped, of silent forges, or furnaces blown out, and in a few years your flag will be floating in every sea and in every harbor over ships freighted with rich treasures from America.

The truth is that there is now no excuse for a high protective tariff. When a large part of the able-bodied men of the country was engaged as soldiers in a great strife, when the labor of the country was in a measure demoralized, when the honor and credit of the country were at stake, and immense sums of money were needed to preserve the one and sustain the other, when great drafts for materials were made on foreign countries, and the importation of merchandise of all kinds, through the abnormal condition of the country, was stimulated and increased, the Government was afforded temporary relief by imposing high duties. It was a war tax, and when the war ceased it should have been repealed or modified as other taxes levied under the same circumstances and for the same purposes, or at least when the needs of the Government no longer required them to be collected. With about $150,000,000 surplus in the Treasury, and the prospect of an additional accumulation of fifty or sixty million dollars annually, the people should be relieved of the great burden which they have so long been subjected to, and which they have borne with a patience unequaled in the annals of any other country, and there is no earthly excuse for their servants on this floor to fail to give them the relief they have the right to demand and expect.

The honorable gentleman who opened the debate on the other side of the House [Mr. KELLEY], as well as others who succeeded him, insist that they be relieved by abolishing the tax on tobacco and distilled spirits, and the tariff be permitted to remain as it is. Sir, I am unwilling that the luxuries used by a part of the people shall escape taxation and the necessaries of life used by all shall be made to pay the expenses of Government; that the tax on whisky and tobacco, which goes directly into the Treasury of the Government, shall be abolished, and the salt and sugar, the cotton and woolen goods, the lumber, the coal and iron, the medicines and drugs, necessaries of life, shall be burdened with taxation, the larger part of which does not go into the coffers of the country, but into the pockets of a favored few. I am aware that there are many and serious objections to the mode and manner of collecting the tax on whisky and tobacco, but by wise legislation the defects of that system can be remedied. Dear luxuries and the necessaries of life, cheapened by the removal of unnecessary and illegitimate burdens and the reduction on others, will afford the relief expected and demanded by the good people all over the country. The latter remedy is proposed to be effected by this Morrison bill; and though it does not come up to my views in the matter, I indorse it as the beginning of the end of a most iniquitous system of taxation.

It was conceded by all parties a few years ago that this step should be taken. Mr. Garfield, in a speech delivered in this House on the 28th of March, 1870, said:

> It is undeniable that the heavy internal taxes imposed upon manufacturing industries neutralized the effect of productive duties and made an increase of the tariff necessary as a measure of compensating protection. But as I have already shown, the heaviest burdens of internal taxes have been removed from manufactures, and a demand that some corresponding reduction in the tariff rates shall be made is coming up from all quarters of the country. The signs are unmistakable that a strong reaction is setting in against the prevailing rates, and he is not a wise legislator who shuts his eyes to the facts of the situation.

That note of warning is no less true to-day than then.

Mr. ALLISON, now Senator from Iowa, then a member of this House, used the following language:

> It is admitted by all that the increase of the tariff was commenced and carried on upon the basis of the protective duties of the Morrill tariff of 1861; the increase of direct taxation, added to the price of domestic manufactures, rendered an increased tariff necessary in order to prevent our country being flooded with cheaper foreign productions. Certainly, then, upon the decrease of internal taxation the tariff may be, and ought to be, decreased in proportion, the danger being no longer in existence which was sought to be averted by these increased duties.
> But I may be asked how this reduction shall be made. I think it should be made upon all leading articles, or nearly all; and for that purpose, when I get the opportunity in the House, if no gentleman does it before me, I shall move that the pending bill be recommitted to the Ways and Means Committee with instructions to report a reduction upon existing rates of duty equivalent to 20 per cent. upon the existing rates, or one-fifth reduction. Even this will not be a full equivalent for the removal of all internal taxes upon manufactures. It will not be difficult to make a reduction upon this basis.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], in a speech made in the Senate May 9, 1870, used this language:

> At the same time it is a mistake of the friends of a sound tariff to insist on the extreme rates imposed during the war if less will raise the necessary revenue.

And again:

> Protection has here no legitimate claims and it may be taken off whenever direct taxes are repealed and less revenue is required.

In obedience to the demands of the country a decrease of 10 per cent. was made by act of June 6, 1872, but by act of February 8, 1875, the duties were restored, so that with some few changes on certain articles they remained up to the last Congress unchanged from the war rates. Two years ago the demand for a reduction was so great that the Republican party, then in control of this House, could not turn a deaf ear to the people; but the protectionists, bent on receiving for as great a time as possible the profits that inured to them under a high tariff, insisted that this should not be done until a tariff commission had examined into and reported on the matters connected with a reduction. The country is familiar with the facts connected with the formation of that commission, of the appointment by the President of parties interested in maintaining a high tariff. And right here let me read an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Delano, a former Secretary of the Interior, before an association of wool-growers in the State of Ohio, as it gives a better insight into the workings of the protectionist than anything I can say:

> The personnel of this commission was not overlooked by the manufacturers. They, with a vigilance and industry that seem worthy of commendation, did not fail to secure as its president a distinguished gentleman of great experience and ability in such matters, who was and had been for many years their agent and salaried employé. It is true, as I understand, and if so it should be mentioned, that this gentleman resigned his official relations to the manufacturers before entering upon the duties of his office. It is equally true, as I am informed, that he resumed these official relations as soon as he was functus officio with the Tariff Commission.
> It is certainly true that as soon as his duties on the commission were ended he entered upon his normal duties as agent for the manufacturers, advocating and securing changes in the report of the commission greatly beneficial and advantageous to manufacturers.

It will be remembered how this commission had about concluded to ask for an extension of time to make their report. What a cry from the people of the whole country went up against it! How hurriedly it was drawn, and all that, and how under the force of public opinion they advised a reduction on the average of 20 per cent. in import duties! The Republican party had in effect pledged themselves that they would abide by the report of that commission and enact legislation in accordance therewith, but Punic faith is no phrase by which to characterize their bad faith. By a species of jugglery and legislative legerde-main unknown in the history of this country they passed a law reported by a committee of conference, which was opposed to the action of both Houses solemnly expressed, a law which, instead of reducing rates 20 per cent., and instead of blotting out the inconsistencies and incongruities of the old law, increased them on many articles, made a Chinese puzzle of its provisions, and reduced the revenues but 1.74 per cent.

I said, sir, by that act the tariff was largely increased on many articles. I have not the time if I had the data to prove this statement by detail, but I will give one instance supported by actual figures that has recently come within my knowledge. A firm of standing in this country, who have had occasion recently to buy the articles mentioned in the following invoice, writes to a distinguished gentleman from my State a letter, from which I take the following extract:

DEAR SIR: We take the liberty of inclosing for your information a copy of an invoice recently imported by us. The duty under the present tariff not only amounts to nearly double what it would have been under the old, but almost equals the cost of the goods free on board steamer in London. These nettings are used mostly by persons of small means engaged in the business of raising poultry for the market.

The invoice alluded to is as follows:

Bought of Boulton & Paul, Manufacturers and Galvanizers.

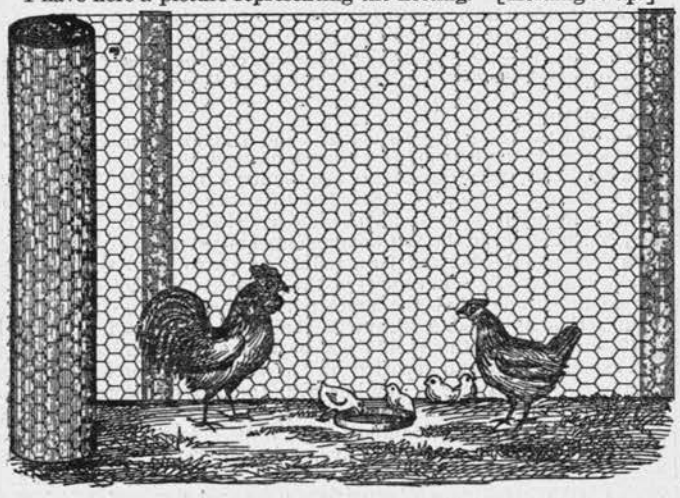
Value of goods in United States currency		$283 83
Duty paid under new tariff		202 08
Duty previous to July 1, 1883		101 15

I have here a picture representing the netting. [Holding it up.]



It will be observed from this invoice that the amount of tariff paid is within $81.75 of the full value of the goods and that the tariff paid under the new law is within 22 cents of being double the amount paid under the law as it existed July 1, 1883.

What an astonishing commentary on the iniquities of the law. This material is not a luxury. It is used by the old woman who perhaps has given her sons as a sacrifice on the altar of her country, and who in her declining years is compelled to raise poultry as a means of obtaining the comforts of life. It is used by the farmer, when for the night he throws himself down to rest from his plodding labor, to inclose his sheep against the attacks of the wild animal or the ravenous dogs. And this is the tariff that makes goods cheaper! This is protection—such protection as the robber gives to his helpless victim.

Confronted by the demand of the people for revenue reform, by the fact that a corruption fund in the shape of an immense surplus is being piled up in the Treasury, by the quasi fraud by which the tariff of last session was enacted, the appeal is made to members of this House not to discuss the tariff, not to attempt to modify or reduce it, lest the business interests of the country may be disturbed. If the business interests of this country are builded in wrong and injustice, the sooner they topple and fall the better will it be for the country and people. But, sir, there is no such result to be apprehended. The real business men of the country are demanding a change. The bugbear conjured up by the monopolists of the land is but the tale of a nurse to the infant to quiet public opinion and lull it to repose, that it may reap the benefits of existing unwise and vicious legislation. Others say it is unwise for the Democratic majority in this House to attempt to do anything, because their efforts will be futile from the fact that the other branch of this Congress is Republican and are opposed to this bill, and from the further fact that the President of the United States would veto the bill if passed.

I do not know whether these statements or either of them be true, but I have yet to learn as a legislator that a failure on the part of one branch of this Government to conform to its obligations and duties relieves or excuses any one of the others from performing its duties. Let us throw the burden of a defeat of this measure where it properly belongs, and if the Republican party through its Senate or by its Executive fails to join us in our efforts to relieve the people the cyclone in the fall of 1882 will be as a soft breeze compared to the political tornado which will sweep over this country in the ensuing November. [Applause.]

In France wages of shoemakers are between 5 and 6 francs a day (report of Secretary Evarts, State of Labor in Europe, 1878).

In Germany, in 1882, according to the tables of the Concordia Society, wages for men in the shoe industry vary from $4, paid in Frankfort (on the Main), Karlsruhe $3.84, to Offenbach (on the Main) $3, the latter the center of a large manufacturing industry in this line.

a Leone Levi, "Wages and Earnings." b Government report to Parliament, 1883, on wages in the United Kingdom in 1880. c Report of Consul-General Shaw, December, 1881. d Report of commissioner of labor statistics of Massachusetts, 1883. e Report of United States Consul-General Walker, 1882. f United States consular reports.

NOTE.—For 1882 the Concordia Society gives reports from one hundred and thirty-four factory towns of the German Empire. The earnings of weavers in power mills (66 to 72 hours per week) are at rates varying from $1.50 to $4.50 per week, mostly of 66 hours (some with 72 and 78 hours). The earnings are: 2 at $1.44; 7 at $1.92; 9 at $2.16; 16 at $2 40; 7 at $6.24; 18 at $2.87; 10 at $3.12; 13 at $3.36; 20 at $3.60; 6 at $3.84; 10 at $4.32; 2 at $5.04; average, $3 for men; women's earnings, of course, are considerably less.

Mr. EATON. Through the kindness of my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] I have at this time an opportunity of addressing this committee, but by his request I first yield fifteen minutes of the time to my friend from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY].

Mr. FINERTY. Mr. Chairman, I will not inflict upon this body a repetition of the rather indigestible statistics that have been furnished by so many gentlemen on both sides of this question. The devoted student of political economy may, perhaps, revel in the multiplied evidences of the different and differing theorists, but the masses will appeal from the doctors in the temple to the results outside of it.

The word "free" carries with it, especially to Americans or to people naturalized as Americans, an overpowering charm. It covers a multitude of errors, if not an aggregation of sins. Without the qualification "free," the argument of "free trade" would lose half its potency. In times not long past weak nations were compelled to submit to the strong on this question by the argument of bribes and of cannon. The nation which at one time was the hoggish protectionist of the globe, which denied her nominal dependencies, like the Ireland of 1778, the right to trade with countries not on commercial terms with herself, has, of late, because of different conditions, become the hog of the "free-trade" market. She has bullied China, beggared India, and ruined Ireland. She has been the champion of opium among the Mongolians because it benefited her merchants, just as she was the strangler of the woolen trade of Ireland because it interfered with the prosperity of Bristol and of Liverpool in the reign of William of Orange.

In America she seeks to accomplish by means of pamphlets and dinners what in China and in Ireland she won by the bolder operation of brute force. She wants to be the workshop of the world, and the American advocates of what is called "free trade" are doing their utmost to gratify her ambition.

The bill under consideration is not, I will admit, "free trade," but it is the precursor of that policy. It is "not the light, but to bear witness of the light," and it shines in the darkness only to make its economic darkness more visible. It is an easy mode of legislation—aiming at the reduction of taxes while it strikes at the very heart of infant industries. The great monopolies, as they are called, will not be crushed by it; the struggling manufacturers will. Twenty per cent. off the industries that pay a large present profit will still leave them able to continue in operation, while the industries that are trying to establish themselves at a present loss, or at any scale under the proposed horizontal murder system, must disappear from the earth.

It is like filling a large tank with water to the depth of, say, 5 feet 6 inches and putting into it men of different statures. The six-footers would pull through, while without assistance those of 5 feet 9 would be hard pressed, and those under that figure, like my distinguished friend now in the chair [Mr. COX, of New York], must drown. [Laughter.]

That there are abuses in the tariff system hardly any member will dispute. That the free-list in the matter of necessaries for the masses should be enlarged few will care to argue against, but that the almost unqualified "free trade" advocated by the frank and brilliant gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], the American El Mahdi of the "free-trade" army, is an impossibility, while American workingmen intend to live outside the conditions of European and Mongolian pauperism none but a splendid enthusiast like himself will care to dispute.

The gentleman from Ohio as an orator, not to flatter him, reflects luster upon this House, but as a Democrat he must not be intolerant of those who, while differing from him on this, are constitutionally in sympathy with him on other questions. In his remarks, as quoted in a morning paper, he is made to say:

> The agitation has already begun. The people, long silent and quiet, are moving now. The culture and chivalry of the nation, long anxious for this hour, are ready to take the lead. The conflict can not long be delayed, and then the result can not be doubtful. Private extortion must yield to public rights: selfish interests must be sacrificed to the general good, and each individual's manhood must be left free, unhindered and unhaltered by the Government, to work out its own destiny. And in the glorious result of the struggle I am sure that this protective grant of robbery and extortion will disappear from the land, never again to offend America or darken her fair fields with its shadow.

I have failed to observe, looking over the customary mediums of news, where "the people" have begun to agitate this question in a violent manner. A few politicians, anxious to make "an issue," some socially inclined gentlemen at a banquet board, a limited number of rhapsodical theorists, "the culture and chivalry," perhaps, to which the gentleman has made allusion [laughter and applause], all these may be "moving now," as indeed they have been for a long time, but the stern masses of the artisans and laborers of the country, who do not desire to accept the condition of European serfdom or Mexican peonage, are they "moving now?" The "culture and chivalry" of the Democratic party, fumigated by the postprandial odors of the Cobden Club dinner parties [laughter], may "move" all they please, but the man of toil, who is not "cultivated" to enervation, and whose "chivalry" is concentrated in the protection from pauper surroundings of his wife and little ones, is not influenced by such incentives to a suicidal policy of experimental economy.

If he is, where are his mass-meetings in advocacy of "free trade?" You may say "the agricultural interests demand free trade." I have respect for the agricultural interests, but they do not embrace everything in the life of the nation. I fail to observe where they labor under the panicky evils depicted by some gentlemen. The English farmers are not protected, and they are tired of being exposed to our competition. Protection is rapidly becoming a living issue in Great Britain. It has even entered the house of commons, and will go beyond that body. Germany bars her gates against our exports of "hog products." France has only lately modified her embargo. Europe, in general, is apprehensive of the American farmer, especially of his beef and bacon, and where she is threatened she either agitates for protection or arbitrarily, as in the case of Germany, protects. Evidently she is not in love with "free trade," unless where she can undersell the market and ruin her transatlantic competitor.

The object of Great Britain, particularly, has been to get hold of American trade, to control the American market. For this she, the perjured apostle of negro emancipation, espoused the cause of the seceding American States, and let loose her thinly disguised privateers to ruin our carrying trade. The advocates of free ships may say what they will, but history confronts them with the fact that England, upholding slavery for a bribe of cotton, drove the flag of our merchant marine from the ocean. [Applause.]

What the aggregate damage, constructive if not direct, was is beyond the reach of the ablest of our statisticians. We know, however, that while maintaining our blockade the Navy of the United States captured seven hundred and thirty-three foreign ships, mostly British, whose cargoes of cannon, rifles, uniforms, and other requirements of war aggregated $26,000,000. Great Britain could afford to sink most of the foregoing amount in the hope of breaking up the American Republic and placing the cotton crop of the South at her mercy. The desire to place the consumers of this country, now happily reunited, at the mercy of her greedy capitalists would impel her to spend a hundred times the amount in carrying out the policy of free trade, in which she as a small country, with a large and dependent population, must have, under the most favorable conditions, the lion's share of advantage. Should England in a possible conflict with some of her colonies be treated by the United States as the latter was treated by her, she must disappear from the face of Europe and of Asia as a first-class power. It was only our great territory, the variety and multiplicity of our resources, that enabled this Republic to still continue the home of American freemen and the asylum of all of the oppressed of the older world who have come or who may come here to accept American conditions.

It will not do to damn the protective system with the cry of "war taxes." It is true we have a large surplus in the national Treasury, but our Navy remains unbuilt, our coasts are almost defenseless, and were all that should be done in time of peace to prepare for war accomplished, that much-complained of surplus could be materially and to good purpose reduced. American labor would find a wider field of industry, and the voice of this Republic, now subdued and fearful in the presence of the despot, would be heard with respect to the remotest corners of the globe. [Great applause.]

The protective policy was the great bridge that carried us safely over the bloody gulf of the civil war; that prevented a more stringent direct taxation, paid our armies, sustained our fleets, and maintained our credit in Europe. It was, perhaps in a measure a war policy, but with Cuba again knocking at the door of liberty for refuge from the Spanish tyrant, and with the latter showing his teeth almost at our gates, it may be doubted whether the entire abolition of "war taxes" on foreign products might not lead to national disaster. We can not afford to strip our Treasury while the government of Madrid holds in its vindictive grasp the Queen of the Antilles.

The vigilance of this Government can not always prevent the departure of revolutionary expeditions from these shores to Cuba, and with the lesson of the Virginius difficulty fresh in our minds, we can not doubt the covert resentment and hostility of Spain. And we know that she is now, by reason of her naval armament, in a condition to beard us if she so desires.

I am not opposed to a fair revision of the tariff, but I consider the time for even that inopportune, and I can not look upon the horizontal proposition as a cure for such evils as may exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The fifteen minutes yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] have been exhausted.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. He has been speaking in the time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

Mr. BRUMM. I know that.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the time be extended, not to come out of the time of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I must object to extending the time, for there are other gentlemen who desire to be heard and the time for debate is now limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] controls the time. Does he yield further?

Mr. EATON. I yield gladly to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY].

Mr. FINERTY (resuming). John Randolph, of Virginia, in 1824, delivered a speech against the tariff in this House of Representatives.

He went somewhat further than any gentleman who has spoken in this debate in support of his favorite theory. Speaking of England, he said:

It is in such a climate only that the human animal can bear without extirpation the corrupted air, the noisome exhalations, the incessant labor of these accursed manufactories. Yes, sir, accursed; for I say it is an accursed thing, which I will neither taste, touch, nor handle. If we were to act here on the English system, we should have the yellow-fever at Philadelphia and New York not in August merely, but from June to January, and from January to June. The climate of this country alone, were there no other natural obstacle to it, says aloud, "You shall not manufacture!"

That, gentlemen, is a quotation from one of your idols. Such, sixty years ago, were the words of the sage of Roanoke. Since he blasphemed against our climate, as one in which we could not manufacture, the American inventor, the American artisan, the toiler in the blast-furnace and the mill, all these have proved their superiority, and the march of the American manufacturer has kept pace with the course of empire, until to-day the smoke from 10,000 factories rises like incense to the god of industry, and brings from the clouds the beneficent rains that make fruitful beyond the fruitfulness of Egypt the limitless prairies of the West. [Applause.]

I could load you with statistics, but I have mercy on your patience. The ghosts of Adam Smith and of Richard Cobden have been summoned to this banquet of wisdom, but as truly as John Randolph erred when he said our climate forbade us to manufacture, so surely do the free-trade apostles of this day err when they assert that the destruction or emasculation of the tariff is the one thing necessary to perfect the prosperity of this nation. Time will permit me to say but little more. You may cover the earth with the pamphlets of the Cobden Club, you may tickle the ears of the gods with your imposing rhetoric, but the workman who flies from European conditions will not vote to place around his neck new and more revolting chains.

The Germans, the English, the Irish, the Scandinavians—all these, who come here to escape from pauper wages and oppressive laws, will not be in haste to establish on this continent the system they abandoned in Europe. The American workingman will ponder long and deeply before he flies to the ills he knows not of. He is not always justly or generously treated, but he will never voluntarily come under the galling yoke of the foreign monopolist.

Men do not fly by millions from their native homes to seek for poorer wages. Were America reduced to the condition which some of our political alarmists depict, the tide of emigration would set eastward across the Atlantic. I, who was born on a foreign soil, and who was old enough when I left that soil to remember what insular Europe was, will not by my vote aid in inflicting upon the working people of this Republic the evils that disfigure and disgrace Lancashire as well as Limerick. I want for this people the full measure of commercial glory, and that can never be attained by the surrender to the tender mercies of foreign capitalists, as is virtually proposed in this bill—not so much the great corporations, that defy extinction, as the struggling industries that have hardly begun to breathe.

I will not vote to place the whip of monopoly in foreign hands. The native monopolist we may curb by legislation or alarm by revolution, but what is our influence in Manchester, in Sheffield, or in Birmingham?

If the idea is to benefit the people, spend some of your surplus fund in constructing new water ways or improving old ones, so as to lower the freight imposts on the producer. You have plenty of opportunity to do this—to spend American money on American soil.

If you are really the friend of labor, protect it against the fatal competition of contract slaves; maintain American conditions; punish the greed of the monopolist. You can do that in America, but can never reach it in Great Britain.

You say our manufacturers can compete without protection. Do you mean to affirm that when nine-tenths of them at least are opposed to free trade they stand in their own light and are foes of their own prosperity? If so, it is an extraordinary development of national folly. Nobody can doubt the business talent of our manufacturers. They will not sin against their own interests.

In a word, sir, I oppose this bill because it is indiscriminate, inopportune, and unwise. It is but a feeble movement toward "free trade," which means the commercial domination of Great Britain on this continent as well as upon the ocean. Against it the voice of every patriot should be lifted, against it the vote of every freeman should be cast. If we are to legislate on this matter at all, let us so frame our laws that the mechanic shall not be sacrificed to the pretended interests of the farmer and that the American manufacturer shall not be beggared to enrich the foreign monopolist. [Great applause.]

Mr. EATON. I have no set, prepared, memorized speech to make. I have sat here during this discussion and occasionally jotted down memoranda that will govern me in the remarks I shall make to this committee at this time.

In my judgment some plain talk is necessary, and believing it to be necessary, I shall not hesitate to express myself so that I may be understood and not misunderstood. I have no speech to make—and I say it in the presence of two associates—I have no speech to make to my people. They know where I stand. On the stump, when I made the canvass for Congress, I was denounced as a free-trader. Here I am denounced by Democrats as a protectionist. Both ends of the candle are to be burned at my expense. [Great laughter.]

I may be pardoned, my age will force you to pardon me, if I speak a little of myself. I am a tariff reformer. For forty years I have been before the people of my State and of other States, and always and everywhere I have been in favor of a low tariff.

I would not talk here to-day but for the fact that on this floor, in the corridors of this Capitol, in the lobbies of the hotels, men who feel as I feel, that this is not the proper time to legislate upon the subject, have been denounced without measure. Sir, I accept the combat against those men, here and everywhere.

In my judgment no tariff can be properly made except under the provisions of the Constitution. Let me read them. I will not dodge this question in any particular:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Now I am in favor of no tariff, of no system of taxation, that does not come directly under that clause of the Constitution. The enumerated powers of Congress are named, and paragraph 18 gives this:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department thereof.

If a tariff bill is offered that does not come under that clause of the Constitution, I will not vote for it. And I say to my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], and I say to the eminent chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] that this bill they have forced upon us is utterly and directly opposed to the Constitution of the United States. They say it is a step in the right direction. I say it is the staggering of a political inebriate. [Laughter and applause.] It is not a step forward in any direction; it is a crab-step. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the right to tax is a sovereign right. The right to tax is inherent in all governments. No government can exist on the face of the earth without exercising this sovereign power. Some governments exercise it in one way, some in another. We tax in accordance with the constitutional provision I have read.

Why did I read the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution? I desire not to be misunderstood. That "general-welfare" clause, I beg to say, embraces no power except to carry out the enumerated powers. Under the enumerated powers you may for the "general welfare" of the country exercise the right to tax.

Now the manufacturers of this country buy 2,000,000 bales of cotton in round numbers annually. I may not state the precise amount within 100,000 bales; but no matter, the principle is the same. The manufacturers of this country then give to the cotton producers of the South from $75,000,000 to $90,000,000 annually for their product. The manufacturers pay the West from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year annually for their breadstuffs and their cereals. And is it not for the "general welfare" that taxes should be paid? The South draws from us $80,000,000 annually; the West, $50,000,000 annually. Were there no manufactures, what would cotton be worth to-day? If 2,000,000 bales of cotton were not consumed in the United States, what would be the value of cotton to-day in Great Britain?

But, say my friends from the South: "The price of cotton is governed by Liverpool, because Liverpool buys more than the United States." I grant it; but only the other day we were informed by one of these new lights that the price of grain, 90 per cent. of which is bought and consumed in the United States, is determined by the 8 per cent. bought and consumed in foreign countries. Thereby hangs a difference.

I agree that the country which consumes most of the product of any other determines the value of that product. That is sound commercial sense. Therefore I say that so long as Great Britain consumes 4,000,000 bales of our cotton, and the United States 2,000,000 bales, the price will be determined by Great Britain. But if Great Britain consumed 6,000,000 bales and the United States none, the price, instead of being 10 or 12 or 14 cents a pound, would be 6 or 7 cents a pound.

But I wish to read a provision from another constitution, because it seems to me some of our friends here are acting under it:

SEC. 8. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenue necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States——

[Laughter.]

But no bounty shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duty or tax on importation from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

A MEMBER. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. EATON. From a book belonging to the Library of Congress called the Weekly Register; and I have read what purports to be the eighth section of the constitution of the late so-called Confederate States; and it seems to me some of our friends are acting under that provision. [Laughter.] They seem to have forgotten that this is Washington, not Montgomery. [Renewed laughter.] I speak in all kindness, as they know. I say this, because in that constitution there is no clause authorizing Congress to promote the "general welfare" of the country. In the Constitution of the United States there is a clause giving Congress power to promote, under the enumerated powers, the "general welfare" of the people of the United States. Such a provision is not found in the instrument from which I have just read; and it seems to me (again I say I speak in all kindness) that many of the arguments which have been used on this floor take that constitution as their basis.

Again, this is a great economic question. It ought to be outside of politics entirely. It has no business here as a political question. Being impressed with this idea, having no doubt of my duty in the premises, five years ago I introduced in the other end of this Capitol a bill to establish a tariff commission. With the aid of my friends there—and on that question my friends embraced every Senator—that bill was passed by the Senate. Fifteen Senators, while adopting the principle, did not vote for that bill, but for another measure giving Congress the power to name the commission. The principle, however, of the two bills was exactly the same; and every member of the United States Senate is on record in favor of a tariff commission. Yet I hear gentlemen say in the course of this discussion that that commission was an infamous one—the child of protection. Is Mr. BECK, one of the Senators from Kentucky, a protectionist? Can you apply that name to my friend Mr. GARLAND, of Arkansas, or twenty other gentlemen whom I might name? Yet each and all of those men supported that bill and avowed themselves in favor of its principle.

And permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, as a man who has seen not a little of political life, not a little of that which governs the industry and business of this country, that in my judgment had this House passed the bill which at that time passed the Senate you would have had no more tariff agitation. It was agreed between my friends and myself and the Cabinet of Mr. Hayes who should be upon that commission.

The commission would have had a year and a half to get together all the information that the country could give them; and then there would have been nothing for this House of Representatives to do except when full of information to have passed such a bill as the business interests demanded. I say this much in defense of a measure which I believe to have been the wisest one I ever advocated.

It seems to me when I look around this House that in the estimation of a certain class of minds here there is no other question except this tariff question. Local self-government, the preservation of the true rights of the States, good government everywhere—these are nothing; and this Congress has nothing to do except to piddle with an economic question which they have not the power to act upon. I beg to say that I do not read this matter as do my good friends from whom I differ. Why do I oppose this bill? In the first place, it is not the part of wisdom and it is not the part of true statesmanship in my judgment to undertake the passage of a measure (and I am now supposing this to be a good one) that you know you can not pass.

"Ah! but," says my friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], with great power and eloquence—I am not quoting him exactly, for I did not note it—"but it is our duty to make a record; it is our duty to show to the people what we would do if we had the power." I give the idea, but not the words. I would have done this, desiring to keep this question out of politics, believing fondly five years ago that it might be taken from the political arena. I agree all I did in that regard passed for nothing; but here it is in the political arena. The duty, then, of the patriot alone has gone by; as a patriot alone I would not have this question before Congress; but now I come to it as a party man, a Democrat of forty years' standing—yes, sir; of forty years' standing; and I am to be read out of the party, am I? [Laughter.] I should be apt to say, as a much greater man said on another occasion, where shall I go?

Now, then, there are thousands of industries in this country the plants of which amount to three thousand million dollars. Would you unsettle them for nothing? My friend shakes his head. I believe he would not, but, if he will pardon me, he has a poor way of showing his belief. [Laughter and applause.] Believing as I do, and as my friend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means well knows, as all my friends on this side of the House and on the other side of the House well know, I was averse to any action by this Congress. I, as a party man, was averse to it. I said so frankly to my Republican friends, and yet I am told I joined the Republican party because I voted with them. I might as well say my friend from New York and my good friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] joined the Republicans the other day because they voted for a certain thing against which three-fourths of the Democratic party voted. [Laughter and applause.] I do not say any such thing. Perhaps my friend has forgotten what that was. [Laughter.] It was simply taking out of a committee of this House, the Committee on Appropriations, the right to carry into conference what was very necessary to have in order to make a good trade with the Senate conference committee. [Laughter and applause.] That is all there is about it.

Again, as a political measure the Morrison bill so called, and I use the name of my friend from Illinois because it is attached to this bill—the Morrison bill so called is in my opinion unworthy of the distinguished committee who have brought it before this House. He smiles, and I think he himself agrees with me. [Laughter and applause.] I have not heard him say to the contrary. [Renewed laughter.] If a record is to be made, about which so much is talked, why, then, let us make a record, a clean one, a decent one, and not cut off the tail of this miserable Republican bantling and call it a Democratic measure. [Laughter and applause.] A bill passed by the last Congress, a Republican Congress, a bill, I said to all my friends—though I was not a member of either House, but I was here—for God's sake, do not vote for that measure, it is rotten; have nothing to do with it. But now they come and cut the tail off that bill and call it a Democratic measure. [Laughter and applause.] There is not a car-driver, permit me to say in all kindness—there is not a car-driver in the District of Columbia who is so stupid he could not have made just such a bill as this. [Great laughter.] All he would have to do would be to take his car-hook and chop off a little of the old bill. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Now, then, I have a right to say here, after having done everything I could do to prevent the consideration of this bill, for I did all I could and I shall do all I can to defeat it; but after it was brought to the House I had the right to say to the Democratic members of this body that I propose to go to work with certain gentlemen, I need not name them, they are here and hear me, to formulate a bill that would honor the Democratic party and not dishonor it. [Applause.] Against my judgment that anything ought to have been done, that this was not the time to do it, what would you have done as a party man? I will tell you what I would have done. I would have formulated a tariff bill; not the Ohio platform either, but a tariff bill. I would have asked every member of the House to sign that bill. would have recommended the Democratic national convention to make that unanimous formula of the Democrats of the House the platform of the Democratic party.

That is what I would have done. In my judgment that is wise statesmanship. I would commit every one to a bill of that character; not to a deformed, misshapen thing like this.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Bring forward your bill.

Mr. EATON. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I say bring in the bill which you propose; we are ready to formulate a more radical bill. Bring it here; let us know what it is.

Mr. EATON. Sir, I thank you for the suggestion. I know to whom I made that proposition. I made it in the proper quarter. Shall I tell you the result? Well, it was refused, and I did not choose to bring in a bill for the mere purpose of saying that I had fathered it.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Why is not the House the proper quarter?

Mr. EATON. Because, sir, in my judgment it was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means who was the proper man to take charge of that subject.

Mr. MORRISON. Did you ever present any bill?

Mr. EATON. No, sir, I never did. Is it desirable for the gentleman that I shall state to him the reason why I did not? I was not about to state it.

Mr. HORR. Let us have it.

Mr. EATON. I did not present any bill, but why? I did not choose to go to the labor and undertake a work of two weeks with the services of two or three experts to make up a bill which I knew would not be accepted. But if the proposition had been accepted the bill would have been brought forward.

Now, sir, I will have nothing to do with this bill. It is a bastard Democratic bill. [Appplause and laughter] It is a misbegotten bantling. It has but two god-fathers that I know of—one the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], and the other my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

Why, I did not know until to-day that anybody was really in favor of the bill. [Laughter and applause.] Now, sir, that bill, that Republican bantling that they are ashamed of, has been brought here by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and he can dandle it and then pass it over to my friend from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], and the eloquent and distinguished gentleman who spoke his piece here the other day, from Ohio, may sing free-trade dulcet tunes over that child if he likes. Sir, I will have none of it, and the people of this country will have none of it. [Applause and laughter.]

You get up another meeting of the Cobden Club, make a good many more speeches, drink a good deal more of wine, and think that that is the will of the people. [Laughter.] You may ask Tammany Hall to get up a public meeting and pass a series of resolutions that every Democrat in the land would vote for, and then make free-trade speeches on top of these resolutions. [Laughter.] That will be manufacturing public opinion. But it does not mean anything in the end.

Now, they say that public opinion is terribly in earnest on this subject, in manufacturing districts in particular. Well, here I am a member of one of the largest and richest manufacturing districts in the United States, and not one single solitary individual from that district has ever written me a letter as to the course I ought to pursue on this subject. They take for granted that I would do what was right. They knew that I would. They could trust me. I say I have no doubt that was the opinion, that they could trust me; and I try to be worthy of their trust and confidence.

But now, sir, a word or two on a different thing. Protection for the sake of protection in my judgment is wrong. I have no doubt about it. I find no power, no authority, no warrant in the Constitution of the United States to lay duties of that character. If other gentlemen may find such authority, then I suppose they will act under it. But I do not find any. A close examination has not enabled me to find any. But there are certain facts that ought to be known to all of the people of this country. We have heard a great deal of talk here on this floor, and they do not agree well either. These men who hunt the same coon do not hunt him into the same tree. [Laughter.] My good friend from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER], to my utter astonishment, said the Yankees stole from them three thousand millions a year in the shape of protection; my good friend from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] says it is $1,150,000,000 a year; and my friend [Mr. CLAY] from Kentucky has got it up to one thousand two hundred and fifty millions a year; while another gentleman who spoke yesterday, whose name I have forgotten, put it at $550,000,000 a year; and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] puts it at four hundred and fifty millions a year.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And that from the agricultural classes alone.

Mr. EATON. Oh, I thought it was from the South. [Laughter.] I did not quite understand, then, the gentleman's argument. Nor did I understand, I am free to confess, how my friend from Kentucky figured up that these terrible Yankees stole $3,000,000,000 a year from the people of the South when their entire cotton crop is not worth but three hundred millions a year. I did not quite see where the other twenty-seven hundred millions came from. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, then, there is another thing I desire to say here on this floor, in this House, and I want to say it to the members. I am not talking to my people. I revise no speech. If the reporter can get down any of this disconnected rambling stuff he will do better than I could. I could not write it out if I tried to. But to the members of this House I desire to address myself, to those who are talking of robbery, of plunder, corruption, stealing, and thievery. There is not a single article bought in the South, from the wagon that draws the farmer's cotton to the markets to the pin that his wife uses, that is not 100 per cent. cheaper than it was fifteen years ago. [Applause on the Republican side.] No matter how wrong the principle of protection may be, that is the fact. I grant you that it is wrong; but the fact remains the same. It has cheapened everything under God's heavens that men, women, and children use in this land—everything. And there is a reason for it. We are growing out of it. Let us grow out of it. There are sixty articles manufactured in the State of Connecticut alone that might just as well go on the free-list as to be where they are to-day. I want the people to know it.

Talk about the cotton of which my shirt is made. There is 50 per cent. duty on that cotton. And it can not be made anywhere on God's great earth except in New England; it can not be made for the same money anywhere else. I know it; I assert it; I defy contradiction from anybody and anywhere. Take the Collins axes that have driven the English axes out of England and Scotland and Ireland and the Swiss ax out of Switzerland, and yet there is a duty of 50 per cent. on the Collins axes made in my county, their office under mine. There is not an ax that can be sold anywhere on the face of the earth in competition with the Hartford ax; and yet they pay, permit me to say, to meet the argument of my friend from New York, they pay for what is called raw material—and it is not raw material, it is material, but not raw—they pay duty on their iron and steel and yet make an ax which has driven every manufacturer of every other country out of the market.

I assert it as a fact, for I brought it to the attention of the State Department when I occupied a very honorable position in the other branch as head of a committee, that the trade-marks of Massachusetts and Connecticut are stolen by Great Britain to-day—four in my own State and four in the State of Massachusetts; that she can not sell her own wares in her own country without stealing the trade-marks of the United States. [Applause.]

These are facts, and ought to be known. Then, shall we reduce the tariff? Certainly I say so. Take these things and put them on the free-list, where they belong, and let the people of the United States know they are not imposed upon. They are now; I assert it without fear of contradiction from anybody.

Now a little story. Mr. Lincoln used to point an argument with a story. Suppose I do it, although I know it will not be as good as his stories were. There was a certain professor in my country, a theorist of the first water, a man who does not know any more about the practical tariff than I know about the Hebrew that he is well acquainted with. This professor came up into a large manufacturing village in my county to make a theoretical speech, such a one as my friend from Ohio delights in. There was a farmer standing by a post in the lecture-room and the professor thought he might be a good subject to operate upon; so he said to him, "My friend, you are a farmer?" "Yes." "You live here?" "Yes." "Do you know these manufacturers in this village are robbing you?" "Why, no, I do not know it. How can they rob me? I came here ten years ago with $500; I bought a farm, running in debt $2,500 for my farm and stock. I went to work raising truck for this village. I paid my debt and have got money in the savings-bank and do not owe any man a dollar. How have they ruined me?" The professor said, "Well, it appears you have been a hard-working man and have lived it through. But you pay 6 cents a yard duty for the very cloth your shirt is made of." "Well, Professor," replied the farmer, "you may think so, but you can not prove it by your algebra or your logarithms; you can not prove it unless by Æsop's fables; for I did not give but 5 cents a yard for the cloth." [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman can not have more time unless some one yields it.

Mr. CLAY. I believe I have some time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has ten minutes.

Mr. CLAY. I yield that time to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. I am under very great obligations to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. HENLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENLEY. I was put down for an hour in this debate. I have not yet availed myself of the privilege although I believe my time was to have been assigned me to-day. I wish to inquire of the Chair the status of that question, whether I am entitled to an hour or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell when the name of the gentleman from California will be reached on the list.

Mr. HENLEY. Would it be in order to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has not yet been recognized. The gentleman from Connecticut has already obtained ten minutes more.

Mr. HENLEY. I did not want him to limit himself, and I wish to yield him some of my time

The CHAIRMAN. The House has already limited debate. The committee has no power over it.

Mr. HENLEY. I desire to yield the gentleman such portion of my time as he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut has ten minutes more.

Mr. EATON. A great deal has been said about free-trade England. Sir, I thought ten years ago that I would look into the business of free-trade England a little. England commenced her system of protection more than six hundred and fifty years ago, under one of the early Norman monarchs. She determined she would refuse to purchase the cloths that were made in Flanders, Ghent, and Bruges. What did she do? She imported the weavers of those countries and made them to belong to England. And from that time until 1844, for more than six hundred and fifty years, the system of protection was pursued by England; not methodically for the first two or three hundred years, but methodically for over four hundred years. This is the history of free-trade England.

In 1844, as some gentlemen would fain have you believe, because she wanted to better her people, England adopted free trade. It was that she might control the commerce of the world, because she had become the manufacturer of the world. That is the reason.

What was the cause of the Revolutionary war? Talk about throwing tea into the harbor of Boston. Talk about this, that, and the other thing. It was the refusal of England to permit New England to manufacture even a hob-nail that caused the Revolution of the United States. What said one of the leading statesmen of England on the floor of Parliament? That he would not permit Massachusetts to make a hob-nail. And Massachusetts made hob iron for him. [Laughter.] Now England became the manufacturer of the world by necessity, by protection. And, sir, we have advanced further and nearer free trade in forty years than she did in six hundred years. We are growing out of protection to-day. My friend from Massachusetts knows it; I know it, in very many of our productions we could stand to-day with a tariff collected directly for revenue; not that we wish to do that, or that it is best for the country; but we could.

But let us go on with wise legislation and in fifty years or less—I will not live to see it, but there are members on this floor who will live to see it, who I hope will be members here forty years from now—and those men will be members of a great confederacy of one hundred States with 100,000,000 freemen having free trade, because the country will have grown into free trade. Nobody will rejoice more than I to have that brought about; but let us be wise in our day and in our generation.

Something has been said about our commerce, about our commercial marine having been driven from the sea. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] in his speech made some remarks in regard to that. Sir, he does not understand the very horn-book of our commercial marine. I say here that the gentleman from Ohio knows nothing about the commercial marine of this country or what caused it to be driven from the ocean. When he says it was protection he says so because he has got before his eyes an ignis fatuus that he calls protection, and when he turns around it is free trade, and he can not see any further; that is the end of it.

What makes commerce? What was the freight-money of the United States in 1859? It was $60,000,000. What is the freight-money this year? It is $122,000,000. Protection has driven us from the sea, has it? Sir, freights go to the country that carries them the cheapest.

For divers and sundry reasons, which I have not time to go into here, we have been driven from the oceans, such as the change from wooden to iron ships and the manner in which England seized upon that change. Putting heavy subsidies into the hands of her iron-ship makers, she drove us in four years half from the sea, and the war did the balance. Let us look at these things like sane men and sensible men and estimate them if we can. Let us bring free ships here and we will get back our commerce.

One remark fell from my friend from Kentucky, whom I do not see in his seat [Mr. TURNER], that I was sorry to hear on this floor; I dislike it. He spoke about the "Yankees." What does he mean by that, or what does any other man mean by it? The Yankees! Does he know the origin of the term "Yankees?" Does he know that it is a corruption from the Indian "Yengeese," their way of pronouncing the word "English;" that from that comes the term "Yankee?"

Sir, I am a Yankee, a New England Yankee. I desire to say that I love my native State and my country—my whole country. But I will not hear without administering just rebuke any man sarcastically allude to the term "Yankee."

I do not forget who fought the battle that turned the tide in the Revolutionary war. I do not forget that it was the husbandmen of New England who won the battle of Bennington. I do not forget that when at the battle of Saratoga the commander-in-chief was either stupid, a coward, or drunk, one of the three, in his tent, a Connecticut general who had no command led the attack three times and won the battle.

A MEMBER. What was his name?

Mr. EATON. His name, I regret to say, was Arnold. My friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] laughs. Sir, he did his duty that day when other men sulked and skulked. I speak of him as a Yankee.

A MEMBER. And a traitor.

Mr. EATON. Yes, and the only one I know of from New England. I think I could go to other States and find a great many. [Great laughter and applause.]

Again, who fought the battles of the United States on the waters in 1812? Where did the tars of the United States come from? They came from Connecticut, from Massachusetts, from Maine, a few from New York, and a few from Philadelphia. Go ask the shades of Decatur, Preble, Hull, and Bainbridge, who fought and won the battles of 1812 on the water, and they will tell you it was the Yankee tars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I will yield from my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] whatever time he wants. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!" and applause.]

Mr. EATON. Sir, I am through with an unpleasant thing. I do not want to speak about the last terrible civil war between the sections of this country, a war that I would have laid down my life, would have laid my body on the altar to have prevented, and thus have saved a million of lives and ten thousand millions of treasure. Sir, there were heroes in that war on both sides. I do not talk about it. I talk about only those wars when we were all as we are now—one people, solid to the core, one people.

A favorite expression in debate here is that men would build a Chinese wall around this country. Well, that is good poetry but poor fact. No Chinese wall can be built around this country of fifty or sixty millions of people, that in the near future will be a hundred millions. There can be no wall built around this country. The world requires our products and we require the products of the world. We shall get theirs and they will get ours. There is no Chinese wall here and there is to be none, and very few Chinese. [Great laughter.]

What is to be the future of the country? The future of party is of small consequence. I am a Democrat, a party man, and desire party success. I desire the Democratic party to be in power, because I honestly believe, I may be mistaken, I honestly believe that with the Democratic party in power government will be better all over this broad land. I so believe; therefore I am a Democrat.

Other gentlemen are Republicans, and for equally good reasons, I doubt not. We shall therefore do our best to win in the coming struggle, I for the Democratic candidate, and my friend in front of me [Mr. WAIT] for the Republican candidate. But we will be brethren all the while, friends all the while.

Now, I see no good that is to be effected by the passage of this bill to my party, none at all; therefore I shall oppose it.

Mr. RANNEY. Or anybody else.

Mr. EATON. I do not know that anybody does, my friend; if they do they have different spectacles from mine. [Laughter.]

But the future of this country I can in some measure grasp. I shall not live to see it, of course; my sands are well-nigh run. But there are men here who I hope will be members of this House in the future and who will see this country the greatest country on earth—independent of every other nation; independent, without "Chinese walls;" independent because of the manhood of her sons and the virtue of her daughters; independent because the prairies of the West will furnish breadstuffs for the world; independent because New Mexico and Colorado and Texas and Nevada and California and Ohio will be in ten years the sheep-walks of the world. I see it. There is no reason why we should not raise wool cheaper in New Mexico and in Texas and in California by and by than it can be raised anywhere else in the world. Do not let us grudge a little for the public welfare as connected with the great wool industry. In other words, discriminate, my friends; lay your duties under the enumerated powers of the Constitution (for we have no other guide to go by) in such a way as to discriminate in favor of American industry, as Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Jackson and Benton and Polk and Buchanan and Calhoun and Lowndes did, and as every other great Democratic American leader has done in the past [applause], not for protection's sake, but for the common weal, for the general welfare. As some one has said, "Not a cent for tribute, but millions for defense," so I would say, "Not a dollar for protection, but discrimination for your friends and brethren."

In closing let me say (and I am under great obligations to the gentlemen who have given me their time, for I was not prepared to make a set speech, only a discursive talk), let us act as a great brotherhood of States. Let us never forget that this Government rests upon thirty-eight pillars called the States—they may become a hundred. The rights of the States are the salvation of the Federal Union. There never was a truer thing said in the world than was said by the Emperor Nicholas of Russia to my friend Thomas H. Seymour, then minister to that government; and you knew him very well, sir [Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair]. Said the Russian Emperor to my friend, Colonel Seymour: "There are but two governments in the world that can stand; my government, which I hold in the hollow of my hand, can stand as long as I am just. As long as my people believe in my justice so long will my government stand; yours, Colonel Seymour, will stand so long as the rights of the States are preserved against the dangerous centralizing power of the Federal Government." [Applause.] I mention this as a remark of a great man, a man who had read the history of our country justly.

In speaking of the rights of the States I do not speak of the ghost of dead secession; I speak of State rights such as Massachusetts and Connecticut have combated for and are ready to combat for again—rights older than the Constitution, because they belonged to Connecticut and Massachusetts and New York when Connecticut and Massachusetts and New York were independent governments. Until we subscribed to the Union we were independent sovereignties as Russia and Great Britain are independent sovereignties.

For eighteen months, or thereabouts, after our present Constitution had gone into operation—I do not undertake to be accurate as to the exact period, for at this moment I do not recollect—little Rhode Island and the State of North Carolina, now so ably represented on this floor, flew their flags to the breeze on every sea as independent nations of the earth. They did not come into the Federal Union for a year or two after the present Government had begun the exercise of its powers.

Let us then stand by this great principle of the rights of the States as upholders of the Federal power. Let a proper discrimination be made by the Federal authorities with regard to State power and their own, and our Government may stand a thousand years. Aye, sir, I hope that we may stand as one people and one Government until—

> God shall fall
> The darkness for creation's pall.

[Great applause.]

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, a surplus of anything is bad. It has grown to be a proverb that "too much of even a good thing is too much." Too much money in the hands of one man works many wrongs to society, unless he uses it with exceptional good sense. Too much money in the hands of a government is bad, and only bad because it can not be wisely used. Speaking of its evils in this country President Jackson, in his eighth message, said:

> The influence of an accumulating surplus upon the legislation of the General Government and the States, its effects upon the credit system of the country, producing dangerous extensions and ruinous contractions, fluctuations in the price of property, rash speculations, idleness, extravagance, and a deterioration of morals, have taught us the important lesson that any transient mischief which may attend the reduction of our revenue to the wants of the Government is to be borne in preference to an overflowing Treasury.

If that was wisdom in 1836, with the then insignificant income of the Government, how forcible is it now? Those who have observed the course of affairs here for the past few years have seen this prophecy become history. Specifications need not be made to prove what none dare deny.

But lavish, careless, even reckless appropriations can not exhaust our surplus revenue of a hundred millions of dollars per annum, and so strong an argument does it make in favor of tariff reform that men have racked their brains how to dispose of this immense income and yet keep the tariff intact. Naturally Pennsylvania, with her seven hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of manufactured goods per year, is greatly troubled. In July last her Republican convention resolved to keep the tariff high and distribute the surplus among the States to use as they please.

DISTRIBUTION AMONG THE STATES.

In many quarters it was commended; but when reflection had operated Mr. Blaine opposed that plan in his letter of 22d November, 1883, published in the Philadelphia Press. His first objection to it was that the amount would be uncertain. "It may be one million or it may be one hundred millions," he said. He urged as a more serious objection that it would divide the duties of supplying State and Federal wants and tempt the Representatives and Senators to starve the latter to fatten the former. He urged nothing else on that point but that "such a partnership is at war with the well-being of both State and nation." But he foresaw, what every high protectionist must have foreseen, that the temptation to make revenue for distribution among the States very large might result in a very low tariff to increase importations and customs income. He urged another objection, and his last, in these words:

A third objection to the Pennsylvania proposition is that it proceeds upon the assumption of a continuing redundancy of national revenue.

He said:

This is opposed to all sound views of national administration. The Government wants just enough revenue. A redundancy always leads to extravagance, to many forms of corruption, and to all manner of schemes for getting rid of money. A Congress assembling with tens of millions of surplus at its disposal is very sure to hold sessions which would prove profitless to the people and perilous to its own members.

Having thus delivered himself of these universally accepted truths as to the dangers of a surplus and mentioned the probability of the abolition of the internal-revenue system by a coalition of Judge KELLEY and his protection allies and Mr. COX and his low-tariff allies, he came to his real solution of the question. He declared that "our State and municipal taxation is direct. It comes upon the property with crushing force;" and showed how easily fell a tax collected as liquor glided down the throats of the tax-payers. Then he asked:

Why, therefore, should not the States be permitted to have the tax on spirits for their own benefit if the National Government does not need it?

Others have thought the United States should cease to collect this tax in order that the States might have it for their use. But that will not suit his views. He was so kind to the States that he feared they could not collect the tax, and to urge that the best way is for the United States to collect it and divide the same among the States in proportion to population. He said:

The machinery of collection is to-day in complete operation. A bill of ten lines could direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the whole of it, less the small expense of collection, to the States and Territories in the proportion of their population, and to continue it permanently as part of their regular annual revenues.

Mr. Blaine said he had considered the question "very carefully for several months," and had "possibly overlooked objections which others may suggest." But he hinted at no possible objection. Indeed, he attempted to support it while arguing the objection of uncertainty of amounts, which he urged against the Pennsylvania plan by saying:

An occasional gift from the national Treasury would not be valuable. That was proved by the distribution of the revenue under the act of 1836 in the Presidency of General Jackson.

That was said apparently without design, but carries with it the force of a precedent and the sanction of high Democratic authority. And it has been so treated by writers, if not carelessly ignorant, not caring to disclose the truth.

The United States never made any "gift" from the national Treasury to the States during Jackson's Presidency. The act of 1836 simply loaned the surplus to the States subject to call by the General Government, and that only to get rid of greater dangers.

In proof I place against Mr. Blaine's assertion the history. That act was approved on the 23d of June, 1836. It required each State before it could take its share to authorize some officer to "pledge the faith of the State for the safe-keeping and repayment thereof, and pledge the faith of the State receiving the same to pay the said money and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury."

In his eighth annual message in December, 1836, on the same subject, President Jackson used this language:

The suggestions made by me in my annual messages of 1829 and 1830 have been greatly misunderstood. At that time the great struggle was begun against that latitudinarian construction of the Constitution which authorizes the unlimited appropriations of the revenues of the Union to internal improvements within the States, tending to invest in the hands and place under the control of the General Government all the principal roads and canals of the country, in violation of State rights and in derogation of State authority. At the same time the condition of the manufacturing interests was such as to create an apprehension that the duties on imports could not, without extensive mischief, be reduced in season to prevent the accumulation of a considerable surplus after the payment of the national debt.

In view of the dangers of such a surplus and in preference to its application to internal improvements, in derogation of the rights and powers of the States, the suggestion of an amendment of the Constitution to authorize its distribution was made. It was an alternative for what was deemed greater evils—a temporary resort to relieve an overburdened Treasury until the Government could, without a sudden and destructive revulsion in the business of the country, gradually return to the just principle of raising no more revenue from the people in taxes than is necessary for its economical support. Even that alternative was not spoken of but in connection with an amendment of the Constitution.

No temporary inconvenience can justify the exercise of a prohibited power, or a power not granted by that instrument; and it was from a conviction that the power to distribute even a temporary surplus of revenue is of that character that it was suggested only in connection with an appeal to the source of all legal power in the General Government, the States which have established it. No such appeal has been taken; and in my opinion a distribution of the surplus revenue by Congress, either to the States or the people, is to be considered as among the prohibitions of the Constitution. As already intimated, my views have undergone a change, so far as to be convinced that no alteration of the Constitution in this respect is wise or expedient.

Later in the same month (to wit, on the 21st December, 1836), Mr. Calhoun, in discussing the deposit law, said:

One point was perfectly established by the proceedings of the last session—that when there was an unavoidable surplus it ought not to be left in the Treasury or in the deposit banks, but should be deposited with the States. It was not only the most safe but the most just that the States should have the use of the money in preference to the banks. This, in fact, was the great leading principle which lay at the foundation of the act of last session. He considered it no less fully established that there ought to be no surplus if it could be avoided. The money belonged to those who made it, and Government had no right to exact it unless necessary.—Calhoun's Works, volume 2, page 572.

But it may be claimed that these are the words of Southern Democrats opposed to high tariff, internal improvements by the General Government in the States, and to the deposit banks. I call to witness Mr. Webster, the great Whig expounder, he who claimed that internal improvements had brought the far-off Western settlers so near to the East that he could almost "see the smoke of their cabins and hear the strokes of their axes." On the 31st of May, 1836, Mr. Webster introduced into the Senate a proposition for the distribution of the surplus revenue, and spoke in its support. He advocated the deposit in State banks and to increase their number to get rid of the "distressing uncertainty which now hangs over everything" and which culminated in the terrible financial crash of 1837. He called it the "unparalleled pressure for money which is now destroying and breaking down the industry and even the courage of the commercial community."

He then spoke upon his second proposition, to distribute all in one year, instead of dividing it into several years, as follows:

I have already observed that in my opinion the measure should be limited to one single division, one distribution of the surplus money in the Treasury. * * * I think it safest to treat the present state of things as extraordinary, as being the result of accidental causes or causes the recurrence of which hereafter we can not calculate upon with certainty. There would be insuperable objections in my opinion to a settled practice of distributing revenue among the States. It would be a strange operation of things, and its effects upon our system of Government might well be feared.

After drawing a distinction between other money in the Treasury and the proceeds of public lands, he said he would willingly distribute the latter, "regarding the public lands as a fund belonging to all the States." But rather than take money from the Treasury for distribution among the States, he said:

I have no hesitation in declaring now that the income from customs must be reduced. It must be reduced even at the hazard of some branches of manufacturing industry, because that in my opinion would be a less evil than the extraordinary and dangerous state of things in which the United States should be found laying and collecting taxes for the purpose of distributing them when collected among the States of the Union.

Here these great souls have "risen from the dead" to denounce the pretended precedent and the perversion of history. This would seem enough; but we live in "perilous times." We have seen a State bought during an election; we have seen several States bought after an election. But here is a proposition to bribe all the States and all the influence of property and monopoly in all the States by one magnificent offer before an election. The devil, when he took our Saviour "up into an exceeding high mountain" and showed him "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them," had doubtless considered the matter "very carefully for several months," and saw no objection to the unholy worship which he craved. But the Saviour did. And if there be virtue left in the people they will adopt His language and cry out, "Get thee hence, Satan!" That I may do no injustice, Mr. Blaine's words are quoted. He showed how by such distribution Maine would be entirely relieved and Pennsylvania almost entirely relieved from State taxation, and by way of peroration he concluded:

States that have been so oppressed by debt as to be tempted or driven to repudiation would be enabled to regain their credit, and every community from ocean to ocean would in one form or another realize that burdens of taxation were in some degree ameliorated.

He did not mention that thereby the present tariff might remain unreformed. This he knew would be understood by the manufacturers of the East and West.

Mr. Webster thought he saw great evils in that "extraordinary and dangerous state of things in which the United States should be found laying and collecting taxes for the purpose of distributing them when collected among the States of the Union," but never dreamed of this enormity. Do not the rich, "rounding their millions" invested in untaxed United States bonds, pay little enough now to their States for the protection of their persons and property? Must the whole Government be perverted from its constitutional purposes to lighten their burdens and keep the load upon the propertyless consumers of food and clothing? Shall the dust be wiped from the dirty bonds of the carpet-bag governments to be ready for their part of the spoils? Suppose the plan adopted and the States unwilling to pay the repudiated bonds? What then? Suppose the people tire of the hateful "machinery of collection," which Mr. Blaine says is "in complete operation," and destroy that machinery. What then?

Suppose the States no longer self-reliant but dependent upon the bottle, the whisky bottle furnished by a centralized empire. For a time they might feel "o'er all the ills of life victorious." But how long would that last? What a state of life would that be the daily food of which depends upon the changes of trade, the caprices of taste for strong drink, the votes of a Congress! No, this plan will not do; another remedy must be found. I say must be found, because with this surplus of revenue are linked all the dangers before mentioned and surplus taxation besides.

TAXATION.

In the eighth message of Jackson, from which I have quoted, he said:

The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their hands to be used for their own profit.

And in his farewell address, in 1837, he said:

The taxes which it—

The United States—

lays upon commerce—being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax-gatherer. But the tax imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imports is drawn from their pockets.

In his sixth annual message, in December, 1874, speaking of the tariff, General Grant questioned whether the law did not often result in "the direct loss of the Treasury and to the prejudice of the interests of honest importers and tax-payers."

In his last annual message Mr. Arthur said:

There are cogent reasons, however, why the national indebtedness should not be thus rapidly extinguished. Chief among them is the fact that only by excessive taxation is such rapidity attainable.

That this is not simply the language of high officials of both parties but the common understanding of the country, I make two quotations from the leading Democratic paper of Georgia, to wit, the Constitution, published at Atlanta. The first was on the 10th of May, 1883, in these words:

There is no room to doubt the disposition of the voters of the country with respect to the tariff. They are in favor of cutting down the enormous taxes, which, in the name of "protection," are wrung from the people for the benefit of the monopolists, and they are ready to indorse and support any party that takes a bold stand against this infamous system of robbery.

The other was on the 2d of June, 1883, and said:

Mr. McDonald advocates in a letter recently published a tariff within the limits of the Constitution, and he adds the belief that the public mind will never be satisfied "with any tariff that has not for its leading purposes the raising of revenue for the Government." The sentiment of the South is practically solid in support of the policy that these eminent Northern leaders [Tilden, HEWITT, McDonald, and Hendricks] unhesitatingly support; and it is therefore difficult to see how it is possible to swerve the party from the position it took both in 1876 and 1880. The man who does not know that a revenue tariff is gathering strength rapidly does not understand the drift of public sentiment. The more light the people get on the tariff question, the more the subject is discussed in Congress and out of Congress, the sooner will we secure a just and equitable and constitutional system of taxation.

THE REMEDY.

The Democratic party alone can right this wrong, for the Republican party has brought it about and will not aid. It but hinders the reform. But many of our friends say, wait until we are in possession of the Government. When will that be? It is not certain that we will even have the House in the next Congress. It is certain that we will not have the next Senate. But suppose we should have both, and also the President. May our majority not come from the protected States? May the President not be from one of them? Shall the large Democratic majority in this House confess to the people that it dare not now even originate a bill for their relief? Verily one feels like asking the questions of Patrick Henry, which, as schoolboys, we were fond of declaiming:

Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely upon our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot?

All agree as to the evil, but all do not agree as to the remedy. Some say, repeal the internal-revenue system and thereby rid us of its horde of officers and offensive machinery. Others contend that such repeal, however desirable, would be but a partial and temporary remedy; others, that it would not do to make strong drink cheap and keep bread high. Some especially fear cheap whisky in the Southern States. Say others, yet such repeal should not be thought of until at least the millions of taxes on distilled spirits and malt-liquors are collected. To this Mr. KELLEY replied that he would repeal now, without collecting the tax, because the corn now made into whisky could build up the growing industry of making glucose sugar. But Louisiana cries out that the people should have pure sugar made of cane and not the bogus sugar of corn. An eager Eastern manufacturer says make sugar as free as the coffee which it sweetens. Mr. KELLEY would advise an increase of duties so as to diminish importations and destroy revenue.

But the farmers of the West, with a surplus of grain and meat, and the manufacturers, with a surplus of goods for sale, assert that prohibition would destroy their markets. Some say, increase the free-list, but none agree as to which of the 4,000 articles taxed shall be freed. Mr. HEWITT, of New York, would make free all "raw material." But no two men agree as to what is "raw material," and some suspect that that would break down the growing industries of the South in iron and cotton by helping that capital to stay in the East which should be carried to our mines and the cotton belt.

There are difficulties in the way, many and serious, but they are not so many nor so serious but that careful attention and an honest purpose to do the work will succeed.

Mr. Chairman, the place left for me being so near the end of the general debate I will not reiterate general doctrines already so forcibly put, but reply to the main objections to this bill and to some of the points made by its opponents.

Some of our friends disapprove of a horizontal reduction. We have had a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. in each of the years 1833, 1835, 1837, and 1839, and of 20 per cent. in 1842. We increased horizontally 20 per cent. in 1865, and a 20 per cent. decrease horizontally was made in 1866. In 1872 we reduced 10 per cent., and in 1875 increased 10 per cent., all horizontally. A horizontal scale is often applied to wages; why not to taxes? It might in some instances work unequally, but these, as well as all other instances of wrong, can be and will be righted by amendment while the bill is under consideration by sections. This horizontal plan is therefore usual, and it is simple.

Special cases of hardship can be better taken care of under it than under a bill specifying every item in the tariff-lists, because it will give more time to consider those special instances. Such a bill being shorter allows more time for other matters of public and private importance. And it is doubtful whether we would have time to pass a bill in any other shape. We tried it last Congress, and after spending weeks in its discussion had to take a bill originated in the Senate and pass it in the House without its details having even been read by the Representatives of the people. However, its form and contents are only suggested by a committee of this House, and are entitled to no more weight than the reported bills from that committee should have. We are of course at perfect liberty to alter or amend as we please. All that our party has agreed to do is to make an honest effort to pass some bill which will reduce somewhat the suplus revenue and somewhat more the burdens of taxation. Upon that we have agreed with far greater unanimity than is usual upon public questions of any unusual interest, and have a right to expect the co-operation of all whose absolute sense of duty does not compel them to hold back.

Seeing that the Democratic party was in earnest in this matter, the protectionist press began with one accord to put obstacles in the path to prevent even a discussion of the bill. They tried to alarm the manufacturing States by a cry that we were about to inaugurate free trade. They knew the bill aimed at no such thing. They had read the speech of Mr. RANDALL on the Tariff Commission, of May 5, 1882, in which he said:

In my judgment the question of free trade will not arise practically in this country during our lives, if ever, so long as we continue to raise revenue by duties on imports, and therefore the discussion of that is an absolute waste of time. * * * So, too, with free trade, there is hardly a man in public life who advocates it pure and simple.

And to impress that upon the public mind he spoke of four representative Democratic tariff reformers as follows:

Let me cull a few sentences from recent debates to show the feeling on this subject.

Senator JAMES B. BECK says:

"Nobody asks or expects this Congress to establish free trade or tear down custom-houses. * * * In adjusting taxation on imports with a view only to obtain revenue or 'for revenue only,' we never thought of discriminating against American industries, or of depriving them of the incidental benefits or protection a proper revenue tariff would afford."

Senator BAYARD says:

"The power to tax by laying duties upon imports may be so exercised as to do what it has done ever since the foundation of the Government, and that is to give an advantage equivalent to the amount of the tax to the American producer or manufacturer over his foreign competitors in the same line of production or manufacture, and this becomes his protection."

Senator COKE, of Texas, says:

"As an inevitable consequence domestic manufacturers and producers of the articles upon which such revenue import duties are laid are to that extent protected against foreign competition."

Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, in substance reiterates these sentiments. So they all say, with rare exception. The real question presented and which is in controversy is the revision of taxes, so we may hold the control of the markets of the world for the benefit of our excess of productions over the home consumption.

They next cried out that we favored direct taxation. No man in either House of Congress had hinted at any thought of direct taxation. In that same speech Mr. RANDALL had said:

Who favors direct tax? No one. * * * Nobody wants direct taxation, although it would bring taxation so near and so constantly before the people that Congress would hesitate long before it voted the sums of money it now does, if not for improper, at least for questionable purposes.

That was the only suggestion in its favor which I recall since I have been in Congress.

The platform of the Democratic party in 1840, among other things, declared:

Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our country.

And these words were repeated in every Democratic platform up to and including that of 1860. Nor has the party ever uttered any doctrine inconsistent with that resolution. Even the Ohio platform, honestly interpreted, is not inconsistent with that resolution.

Mr. MCKINLEY, in his speech, said we would tax tea and coffee. He knew that both were made free in the Democratic tariffs of 1846 and 1857 and so kept in the act of March 2, 1861. They were taxed, coffee from 4 to 5 cents per pound and tea from 15 to 20 cents per pound, by the acts of August and December, 1862, and that of 1863, and so remained till May, 1872. Before the act of 1846 tea was taxed as high as 68 cents per pound when not shipped in American vessels. Individuals have favored the return to the policy of taxing them, but neither party has so desired. Mr. MCKINLEY said that because a committee of a Democratic House so reported our party must be so considered. John Sherman, as Secretary of the Treasury, repeatedly so recommended, and by parity of reasoning his party must be so considered. Nor has the Democratic party ignored all considerations of special classes. It has uniformly discriminated between luxuries and the common supplies of the masses of our people, favoring the poor rather than the rich.

But to return. Failing to prevent discussion an appeal was made to prejudices and hatred (no milder word will tell the truth), and the bill is denounced by the New York American Protectionist as the "Jeff Davis bill." The National Republican of this city puts it thus:

> Having failed to shoot the Union to pieces, the Southern free-traders, the disciples of Calhoun and nullification, propose to starve the Northern mechanics and laborers.

This remark excites naught but a pleasurable pity, pity for the man who thus sneers at one of the brightest names that has shone in American history, and pleasure to see an opponent reduced to such straits; and, Mr. Chairman, I have been mortified to-day to see the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], a man in experience older than he is even in years, a man of broad views and generous impulses, in his advocacy of a doubtful dissent from his party, stoop to take comfort by like twaddle. He read from the Constitution of the Confederate States—in order to do what? To prove that this tariff bill was wrong? Not at all, but to excite Northern prejudice against the South, because it furnishes Democratic Representatives favoring tariff reform.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman has no right to make that statement.

Mr. HAMMOND. I know it is true. Any one but a fool would know that. Gentlemen can not conceal their purposes from people who have brains. They can not conceal them from the working people of this country. They read and they think.

I wish to make a remark or two about that confederate constitution. It was almost in its very words the Constitution of the United States. The resolution under which it was framed was that, being satisfied with the form of government from which we seceded, our committee should report a constitution as nearly as practicable the same. That constitution preserved the peculiar institution of slavery because that was the property of the South. It lengthened the term of president from four years to six, because the framers of the instrument had seen, as you have seen and as we yet see, the corruption which may be exerted for the securing of a second term. In the promotion of purity that instrument undertood to cut off such a source of corruption.

With these exceptions I recall none other but those the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has to-day brought before the House. They did "wipe out" "the general welfare" clause, for under it all the jobs, all the corruption, all the dishonesty, all the black pages of American history in legislation have been written. They were a people without any manufactures comparatively; they had but little seacoast comparatively, and they believed so much wrong had been done by a perversion of the taxing clause and by the perversion of the commerce clause of the United States Constitution in legislating for one section against another section, in the teeth of Democratic platforms, that they determined to take that power away from their congress. They were as honest in making that constitution as were Carroll and Hancock when they signed the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. EATON. I did not impugn their honesty at all.

Mr. HAMMOND. No, sir.

Mr. EATON. I stated a fact.

Mr. HAMMOND. You stated a fact, and I have stated why you stated it.

Mr. EATON. You have not stated that correctly, because you do not know.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am proud the gentleman disavows it. He now comes up to the measure of the man I have thought him to be. He does not stoop like these penny-a-liners to make false prejudice against a measure instead of arguing against it.

Mr. EATON. If the gentleman will permit me, he ought to know me better than that. I am in favor and shall be one of a committee to report an amendment to the Constitution making a single term of six years for the President, as it was in the confederate constitution.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am glad to see the gentleman following after the grand men who undertook to make successful that ever-to-be-lamented attempt at revolution.

Mr. EATON. I do not quite understand you.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will now go on with my remarks.

Such twaddle is an insult to the Northern voters. They can read; they can think. They know that a cause is good or bad without regard to who favors the cause; that the proposed reform is urged by men from the North as true to the Government as any who oppose the measure. Those voters know that that cause is weak which must be supported not by combating the arguments made in its favor, but by abuse of some of its advocates. Let not the Republicans hope in that way to distract attention from the merits of the controversy. Nor can those voters be made the followers of the new theory of Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, as to the functions of this Government. He attributes the prosperity of this country to "the laws which force such a diversity of interests and at the fullest possible compensation for labor." And elsewhere in his speech of April 17 he lauds "a law, whether natural or otherwise, that compels a diversity of interests."

It recalled to my mind the famous "Georgia protest" of 1829 against the tariff of 1828, the first tariff in which sections were directly opposed to sections as such in this country. The protest was signed by John Forsyth, governor, and presented in the United States Senate by John McPherson Berrien, "par nobile fratrum." The climax of the State's denunciation of the principles which led to its adoption was "the degrading system which considers the people to be incapable of wisely directing their own enterprise; which sets up the servants of the people in Congress as the exclusive judges of what pursuits are most advantageous and suitable for those by whom they were elected." So Mr. Tilden wrote:

> Devoted to the rights of our American industry, which is now beginning to fill the world with the renown of its achievements, it [the Democratic party] has refused to direct its application by prohibitory or protective tariffs, preferring that each man should judge how he can make his own labor most productive, and trusting for the aggregate result to those natural laws which enable every one of our million of city population to daily choose his food, and yet furnish buyers for everything that has been provided beforehand.

Mr. RUSSELL'S doctrine would authorize Congress to forbid our boys from following callings or professions suitable to their capacities and tastes and bind them to the trades of their fathers, as has been done in despotic ages and governments. Such doctrine would have authorized Congress to bind forever to drudgery men who have adorned the highest places in our country.

SOUTHERN MANUFACTURES.

It is conceded that the Morrison bill can not affect Southern cotton-mills. Absolute free trade subsists between us and the North and West, and yet they can not compete with our cotton-mill products; much less can distant Europe give us trouble. Our advance is due not to tariffs, but to natural advantages of which none can deprive us, though bad laws may greatly impair these advantages.

I am about to call attention to some figures taken or made up from the Compendium of the Census of 1880. I do not claim absolute correctness for them, for the basis is not infallibly correct.

That the censuses of 1850 and 1860 contain many errors none deny. The grossness of the falsity of that of 1870 in the Southern States is recognized by all. Taken in a fluctuating currency, it is wholly misleading everywhere. On these have come the census of 1880, the fragmentary reports of our consuls and of the Agricultural Department; and the brood of lying conclusions drawn from them all has multiplied like the lice in Egypt. In every speech, in every newspaper, they crawl and squirm. But in default of anything better our reasoning must be from these censuses. I call attention to a few of their statements from our last compendium. It is a very common impression that the South was less prosperous as to manufactures before the war, as compared with the North, than since the war. The census shows that that is untrue. Take Georgia and Pennsylvania as representative States. Georgia's capital so invested stood to that of Pennsylvania as 1 to 18¼ in 1850; about the same in 1860; as 1 to 31 in 1870; and as 1 to 23½ in 1880. Southern investments greatly increased, but those of the North increased more.

But the table shows that from 1850 to 1860 manufactures in the Southern and cotton States grew relatively faster than they did in the great manufacturing States of the North. Alabama almost trebled, Arkansas more than quadrupled, Georgia doubled, Tennessee more than doubled, and Texas increased sixfold. No Northern State doubled but Pennsylvania. Cotton never sold for so much as it did in 1857, except just after the cotton famine produced by the war. And all this occurred under the low Democratic tariffs of 1846 and 1857. Here is the table:

Capital invested in manufactures, as shown by the censuses of the United States.

States.	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.
Alabama	$3,450,606	$9,098,181	$5,714,052	$9,668,008

FARMERS.

Those who have spoken against tariff reform endeavored to alarm the farmers. The Democratic party would not knowingly take any step which even might injure them. But let us examine the allegations.

Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island, is a manufacturer, living in a State which in 1880, by the census, raised but two hundred and forty bushels of wheat, and yet he undertakes to advise the wheat farmers of the West. To his speech in the RECORD of 25th April, 1884, he appended a table of values of selected articles for the years 1846 to 1850, inclusive, and 1876 to 1880, inclusive, to draw a contrast between "free trade" and "protection" to the advantage of the latter as to farm products. Who made his figures I do not know. Perhaps it was the same man who in February, 1883, betrayed him into using a table which, upon examination, I showed covered arrowroot, maccaroni, croton-oil, "coffee and milk prepared," "frogs dressed and prepared," plum pudding, venison, house furniture, hubs for wheels, shingles, willow baskets, and sawdust, which table he averred only showed the protection given to our farmers upon "agricultural products pure and simple."

The following table is taken from Grosvenor's Does Protection Protect? I am told that he is now the statistician of the New York Tribune. His figures were made in 1870, and, without regard to his own merits, are trustworthy because made up from the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1863 (Mr. Chase) carefully prepared under Mr. Chase's supervision. Mr. Grosvenor at page 274 gives average prices for six periods, first, the years covered by the protective tariff of 1824 and the higher protective tariff of 1828; second, ten years of "compromise non-protective tariff," 1833–1842 inclusive; third, protected years 1843–1846; fourth, next four years unprotected; fifth, the succeeding four years, and last the years 1855 to 1860 inclusive; all from 1847 to 1860 inclusive being under the Democratic or "free-trade" tariffs. From those six tables Mr. Grosvenor made the table of averages following:

Table showing comparative prices of farm articles during the protection era from 1825 to 1846, and the "free trade" era from 1846 to 1860.

Years.	Wheat.	Cotton.	Corn.	Rye.	Oats.	Butter.	Cheese.
	Per bu.	Per lb.	Per bu.	Per bu.	Per bu.	Per lb.	Per lb.
1825–'32	$1 10½	$0 10¾	$0 62	$0 67	$0 37	$0 15½	$0 06¾
1833–'42	1 35½	12	77½	84½	43	16½	07¾
1843–'46	1 02	06½	57	68	34½	11½	05¾
1847–'50	1 26	09	68½	74½	43	15½	06½
1851–'54	1 44	09½	71½	91½	47	17¾	07½
1855–'60	1 69	10½	81½	94	48½	19½	08½

Certainly this table is far more satisfactory than Mr. CHACE'S comparison of two periods of five years each and they thirty years apart. The most absurd part of his speech was that showing that a bushel of wheat in 1846–'50 would buy less iron or cotton prints then than in 1876–'80, utterly ignoring the fact that the price of wheat varied little, but of the others had enormously decreased in thirty years.

Mr. CHACE. If these figures are correct, then your policy is a bad one for the farmer.

Mr. HAMMOND. I know more farmers than you do. I see more in one day than you have in your State. I see more in my district than you have voters in your State. You come here, with every laborer in your State driven from the ballot-box, to preach the dignity of labor.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman is now stating one of his free-trade facts when he says every laborer is driven from ballot-box. That is about as true——

Mr. HAMMOND. I should have said every laborer of foreign birth. You know what I meant.

Mr. CHACE. I denounce the statement.

Mr. HAMMOND. Only 10,000 men voted in the last election in all your State.

Mr. CHACE. You drive ten from the ballot-box where Rhode Island does one, and you do it with the shotguns.

Mr. HAMMOND. In the South some are driven off in violation of law, but yours are driven away by your law.

Mr. CHACE. If you can make anything out of that, you can.

Mr. HAMMOND. If you can make anything out of this debate, you are welcome.

Mr. HISCOCK on Tuesday presented many figures showing increase in farm products, &c., from 1860 to 1880, and attributed that to the tariff. He makes the high protective war tariff take all the glory which has come from the development of the country, the reapers and mowers, the railroads, steamboats, and telegraphs, all the work of brain and muscle for twenty years. How will he explain that India increased her wheat export from 2,000,000 bushels in 1879 to 36,000,000 in 1883 under English free trade?

Answering them, it would be fair to attribute all the gain to the Democratic "free-trade" tariffs. But candor compels me, and should have compelled them, to admit that the differences are not always attributable to the tariff only. Sometimes it seems so and at others not. For instance, in 1830 wheat sold for $1.07½ and the tariff was 25 cents per bushel. In 1832 the price was $1.23½, and the tariff 12½ cents per bushel. Price plus tariff in 1830 was $1.32½, and in 1832, $1.36. On the other hand, in 1841, the price, $1.20, plus tariff, 25 cents, equals $1.45, and in 1842, the price, $1.06½, plus tariff, 12½ cents, equals $1.19. In one case wheat was higher under the lower tariff and in the other the reverse. Again, in 1854, 1855, and 1856, wheat averaged $1.51, $2.12½, and $2.38 per bushel, respectively, and the tariff was the same in all three years; but the Crimean war made increased demand. In 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860 wheat averaged $1.70½, $1.60, $1.30, and $1.47½, respectively. The reciprocity treaty with Canada was in force from September, 1854, to 1866, and under it Canadian wheat came in free, and that was our main source of foreign supply. With practical free trade wheat was higher than ever before. (My figures are by averaging the highest and lowest prices for each year, taken from Spofford's Almanac.)

But if it be fair so to argue, I present another short table, taken from the censuses of 1859 and 1879, of articles commonly quoted as of 1860 and 1880. The first column is from Secretary Chase's report of 1863, before mentioned, except hay, not there given. The second column is from the Bureau of Statistics, copied into census of 1880, at page 27.

Prices of farm products in 1859 and 1879 and the per cent. of increase of 1859 over 1879.

Article.	Prices in gold in—		Increase, 1859 over 1879.
	1859.	1879.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Per ct.
Corn, per bushel	90.5	47.1	92
Oats, per bushel	47.0	29.7	58
Wheat, per bushel	1 47.5	1 06.8	40
Cotton, per pound	11.5	09 9	15
Hay, per ton	24 64.0	15 02.0	60
Bacon and hams, per pound	09.0	07.0	28
Butter, per pound	20.5	14.2	43
Lard, per pound	10.0	07.0	57
Tallow, per pound	10.5	06.9	43
Tobacco, per pound	09.0	07.8	12
Wool, per pound	39.0	29.0	34

These considerations show how very deceptive mere tables of figures are. Arguments confined to them are only less false than that of attributing all increase of prices to protection in the face of greater decrease in Europe, protected and unprotected Europe. Mr. CUTCHEON yesterday mentioned the cheapening of steel rails as a sample. He knew that by expiration of patents, better machinery, &c., they are so much cheaper in England than here that we fence them out by tariff. Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island, Mr. RUSSELL, another Eastern manufacturer, and Mr. KELLEY expressed great alarm for the farmers of the West because the wheat of India, Australia, and Russia are crowding them out of the markets of the world. Mr. KELLEY advised them to raise sorghum, and told them that they could live on its seed, for that swine, horned cattle, and the negroes of interior Africa had so lived. His words were:

> Our farmers, therefore, need not fear the competition of low wages in the wheat-fields of India and Russia as threatening a vital change. Wheat-culture exhausts the soil. The wheat we export beyond the sea carries with it the vital principles of the farm on which it was raised, which does not return to enrich the producers' acres as it does when consumed in industrial villages or large cities near to where it was grown. With sugar-yielding plants it is otherwise; they are green plants and give to the soil the nutriment they absorb from the atmosphere. Wherever corn will ripen sorghum can be produced in perfection, and the value of the seed of this plant alone is found to be equal to the cost of growing and housing the entire crop. Not only does this seed furnish nutriment to swine and horned cattle, but history and travel afford abundant assurance that in the past more people have lived on sorghum seed than have been sustained by wheat. Myriads of the people of the interior of Africa and Asia, from which dark regions we are but now receiving supplies of richer varieties of the sorghum plant than we have yet grown, have for centuries found in its seed the same food-supply that the Caucasian races have found in wheat.

Mr. RUSSELL reminds us that the yield of Indian wheat increased from 2,000,000 bushels in 1879 to 36,000,000 bushels in 1883, while our exports of wheat fell off nearly 36,000,000 bushels in 1883, and he says that this is but a beginning of the vast trade in wheat which must result from opening up transportation, &c., in India and Russia, and which must cut off our English market. He advises a prohibition tariff on wheat and other cereals, so as to force 700,000 farmers into factories. Would he stop all importations and force direct taxation or an enlargement of the hateful internal-revenue system?

Mr. RUSSELL did not explain how he would keep up wages with this enormous crowd forced into competition with wage-earning mechanics. He said:

> This would in itself give a home market for about one-third of our total exports of agricultural products.

But what would become of the other two-thirds, even if the present product be never increased? And where would the increased product of the factories beyond the present surplus be bestowed? When we shut out the goods of other countries they would refuse to take ours, would reject our cereals and swine and beef and cotton. How much better to encourage exchanges rather than stimulate preparations by foreign countries to supply themselves without coming here. This brings me to recall that far-off Maine sends stone and ice to Georgia almost for nothing, because her ships need ballast when they come for cotton. The very life of prosperity is facility of exchanges of products.

It is remarkable that no Northern or Western man, when arguing that a high tariff favors farmers, deigns to notice the cotton-makers of the South. The crop of cotton is, say, 6,000,000 of bales. The great bulk of it is exported. It has no protection. Even the long-staple cottons, sea-island cotton, has no protection, though the Northern thread-makers import as much of it as we raise in this country. Cotton is almost the exclusive crop of many States. Its farmers can see naught but increase of price to them from the tariff, which keeps Canadian wheat and the like out of the North to enable Northern farmers to sell to us without competition. The tariff on cotton-seed oil is a sham; for none is imported. But five gallons came in in 1881, and none since. These cotton-planters remember the succinct statement of Calhoun, that "a tariff on imports is a tax on exports." Exports in the long run must pay for them. They know Mr. Webster's answer, that the Kentucky mule-raiser and hemp-grower, the ship-owner and others, who furnish supplies, help to make the cotton. But they also know that part of their cotton pays for all that and still leaves the exported balance to pay the tax. I recall also that cotton in the fall of 1857, under the lowest tariff we have had for half a century, brought 13 cents per pound, the highest price ever had except war prices, and wheat ranged from $1.25 to $1.95 per bushel, and wool from 33 to 44 cents per pound.

AMERICAN LABOR.

Mr. KELLEY told us that because Congress made quinine free from import tax the house of Powers & Wyhtman was removed from Pennsylvania to Germany, "where wages were low," and that thus they will be able to "monopolize the American market," and that by thus banishing one house we have closed all the others and made the United States the dumping ground for the cheap and adulterated quinine of all irresponsible continental manufacturers." If Powers & Wyhtman will "monopolize the American market," how can anybody else sell quinine here and how can we get adulterated quinine except from them?

But his main conclusion of that subject was—

Thus did anti-protective legislation banish one vital industry and deprive a few hundred American laborers of employment.

If there is no other work for them to do they are without employment; otherwise not. Should all the people of this country have continuously paid that quinine tax forever to keep those few men from seeking other work? In the same speech Mr. KELLEY denounces the importation of contract labor that is being brought here by Pennsylvania protectionists. It seems that while they talk so much of protecting American labor they will have cheaper labor if they must bring it here under contract or go themselves to Europe to use it there. Verily, "for ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" the Pennsylvania protectionists are "peculiar."

Advocates of protection profess great concern for the wages of factory operatives. Their exaggeration of their pictures throw suspicion upon their sincerity. On the other hand we have listened to a speech of Mr. WOOD, of Indiana, who took the opposite ground. He belongs to the Committee on Labor Statistics, and I suppose he has made this matter a special study. He was speaking for the wage-earning class. He said:

I think a high protective tariff the worst foe we have to American labor. It gives high profits to large investments in certain kinds of industry, and every system is adopted or machine purchased that will do away with laboring men. If the tariff act was reformed, the highly protective duties cut down, profits would be lower but reasonable; then the great inducements for centralized capital would cease, and it would go all over the country to establish other but useful industries. One great and highly protected industry, such as iron or steel, woolen or cotton, having from $500,000 to two or three millions invested, with its labor-saving machinery, does not employ a tithe of the labor that would be employed if this aggregated capital was divided among a dozen different and necessary industries. * * * One great trouble about labor now is that there is not a sufficient market for its products, and one able to consume them.

The Democratic policy would give labor more steady and more remunerative employment. But there are many erroneous statements about wages in the press and in speeches here. Wages, like other things, are not always what they seem. Wages in the protected United States are higher than in England unprotected. But in unprotected England they are higher than in protected Germany or protected France. It is, therefore, certain that protection does not make the difference. A thousand causes operate. Perhaps the chief cause here is that lands are so cheap that the capitalist can not force our mechanics to take his price and stay in his employment at inadequate remuneration.

In a speech made here on the 8th of May, 1879, Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, said, speaking of wages:

Indeed the condition of the laboring people of the civilized world is in this respect pitiable. Our country, more favored than any other, is suffering greatly, but less than others. Our broad, open, cheap lands are protecting us against the intense sufferings others are enduring.

If English wages are so low, with no countervailing advantage, why do not more English mechanics come here? Our factories contain but 80,000 of them and 213,000 German operatives. Germany is a "protected" country. England's population is 484 to the square mile and Germany's is but 213.

The fairness of wages depends not wholly on what is paid a person for any given time, but also upon the value of his labor to his employer during that time. By the Census Compendium it appears that each person in manufactories over 15 years of age produced in 1850 one thousand and sixty-four dollars' worth of goods, and in 1880 twenty-one hundred dollars' worth of goods. Wages are greatly affected by the use of machinery. Suppose, to do a certain quantity of work in a day in India, requires ten laborers. Say their wages and food cost the employer $2, i.e., 20 cents per man. Now if the employer can get a machine with which one will do the work of the ten, he may pay that one much higher wages. But whether the aggregate of wages for the country will be increased depends upon whether the men displaced by the machine are idle consumers or have other remunerative employment.

The wages of individual shoemakers in the United States is double that in England, but it costs the manufacturer less to have a pair of shoes made here than there. With an American machine one man can make three hundred pairs of boots per day, and the number of these machines has increased from fifteen in 1862 to 3,100 in 1880. Before the invention of Blanchard's machine it took seventy-five men to make one hundred gunstocks per day. It reduced the number of men necessary for that work down to seventeen, then to twelve, and now to nine. Suppose the seventy-five men got $2 each per day, the hundred gunstocks would have cost the manufacturer $150 plus material. Suppose he now pays $6 per day to each man, his hundred gunstocks would cost him but $54 plus material and interest on his investment in the machine. Wages for gunstock-makers would thus appear to be trebled, but it would also appear that sixty-four men had been driven to some other employment unless there had been equivalent increased demand for gunstocks. Again, the census tables show that "in manufacturing at the rate of 1,000 rifles a day three men will do as much work as seven to nine men in manufacturing at the rate of fifty a day."

These examples from our census show how deceptive are usual statements about wages, and that whether a mechanic is being well paid for his work depends upon where he works, with what sort of machinery, in what sized establishment, and above all what the food and clothing of his family, fuel, and rent of his dwelling cost.

It is vain for Mr. CHACE to read about the abject poverty of some in England. It is vain for Mr. KELLEY to tell of those whom he saw there living with their pigs. They know, everybody knows, that these are exceptional cases and that such may be found everywhere; that in our own boasted land such may be found of men and women living in squalor and without any pigs to live with them.

The speech of Mr. KELLEY in 1879, from which I have quoted, painted the condition of some of our mechanics as deplorable. He said:

Why, sir, the people of my city (Philadelphia), the working people whose pride it has been to have their families live under their own roof, are many of them huddling together three or four families in one such house, and then are probably unable to pay their rent.

It is vain for gentlemen to try to make grown men believe that such are fair samples of English laborers, and vainer to try to make them believe that such a condition is due to her trade policy.

How much better off are the laborers of England now than before she abolished her protective policy? Since then imprisonment for debt has been abolished, drinking spirits has greatly decreased, education has become general, wages have increased almost twofold. Manhood suffrage has been granted; asylums, hospitals, churches tell the munificence of the government and the charity and devotion of the people. It was to these mechanics and laborers in factories, or men like them, that Cobden and Bright, men born without titles, belonging to the people, preached a crusade against the corn laws. They had imbibed the truths of Jackson's farewell address, that Jackson so glibly quoted as being in favor of a "judicious tariff" when he said:

The various interests which have combined together to impose a heavy tariff and to produce an overflowing Treasury are too strong and have too much at stake to surrender the contest. The corporations and wealthy individuals are engaged in large manufacturing establishments, and desire a high tariff to increase their gains. Designing politicians will support it to conciliate their favor and to obtain the means of profuse expenditure for the purpose of purchasing influence in other quarters. * * * The surplus revenue will be drawn from the pockets of the people—from the farmer, the mechanic, and laboring classes of society.

They might have adopted his very words, except that the main prohibitive duties then were on farm products. It was at Manchester and from the mechanics that the agitation came. For years they struggled until the failure of the potato crop brought Ireland to starvation. Thus re-enforced, they succeeded. The corn laws fell before the hunger of the people. We must come to a revenue basis sooner or later. The present tariff can not be permanent. We have no physical famine. With our broad acres and fruitful soil "the early and the latter rain" will furnish plenty; but our products of hand and loom, of factory and mine; our multitudinous "cattle upon a thousand hills;" our countless droves of swine; our cereals rotting in barns and elevators are more than home consumption can exhaust. Short time, short wages must come unless we appease the universal hunger for a market for the surplus. If this demand is heeded things will adjust themselves slowly and quietly. If this demand is despised the result will come nevertheless. But in that case it may come suddenly; it may come ruinously upon all who withstand the people's clamor for reform and reduction of taxes and cost of living. [Applause.]

FREE COAL ILLUSTRATES THE SPIRIT OF THE MAJORITY.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, to illustrate the practical results of the financial revolution intended by the leading spirits of the Democratic majority in this House I will confine myself to their attempt to put bituminous coal on the free-list. It will exhibit their ulterior designs. For it is not reform, not reduction, but revolution that is the burden of most of the speeches in support of this "Morrison bill." The leaders of this movement display themselves as impatient, champing at the bit or tugging at their chains. Could they draw along with them the small minority of their conservative colleagues, not 20, not 50 per cent. reduction would content them.

The discussion of the tariff question consumed the winter session of Congress two years ago. The result was a tariff commission, which after months of laborious investigation over the whole country reported to Congress. Then the last session of Congress resulted in a marked reduction of internal-revenue taxes and the tariff of March 3, 1883. The country was disturbed, business unsettled, capital and labor uneasy by reason of the two years of discussion which produced that tariff. The American people have been taught to regard tariff agitation as a necessary evil, but they have not yet learned to "hanker" after it for the mere love of agitation at a time when it can not by reason of an opposing majority in the other House result in a change of the law. And yet, without waiting to see the operations of the new tariff, which began July 1, 1883, this House wants to change it materially with a confessed purpose to rapidly change it again and again.

The business of the country, its manufactures, its mines, its markets, its laborers, must be sacrificed to political expediency. It is too soon to reagitate, but the agitation may give a party cry, and some men more closely consider a Presidential election than they do the industries of the country.

The Republican party alone can reduce tariff and direct taxes with the confidence of the country. And it has been doing so. The Republican party is ready to reduce the surplus. It alone can reduce the tariff without alarming the country. When manufactures have enjoyed a century of protection, when labor for a century has adjusted itself to a discrimination in its favor, a sudden change coupled with a threat of repeated change to follow can only bring disaster.

The last Republican Congress swept away millions of direct taxes and so reduced the tariff that under the new law the first six months yielded a decrease in revenue of $11,636,854. While the majority here would legislate for a great producing nation on its vast and varied industries upon the shifting basis of clerks' estimates, the Republican party would first observe the actual working of the new tariff and then it will further reduce the tariff, and, what is just as important, reform and readjust the tariff.

A scientific readjustment can not result from such discussion as this. To-day all over the world there is overproduction, a juncture in trade which has happened and will happen at intervals in every age of commerce and in every country, which results from laws of the human mind and not from acts of assemblies. But we find free-trade orators bold enough to say that for overproduction here we must blame the tariff, while overproduction in free-trade Britain I find a British member of Parliament charging to be due to free trade. A fair-trade league has been established in England, which is undoubtedly increasing in influence. It numbers among its members some very able men, and its publications are being widely read. A fair-trade congress was held at Leamington, England, on Saturday, November 17, last, under the presidency of Lord Dunraven, K. P. Mr. Ecroyd, M. P. for Preston, and himself a manufacturer, sent a letter containing the following remarks:

I had hoped that it might be possible for me to come to Leamington to-morrow, though I had engagements for both last evening and this. I am very glad to find you are already strong in speakers qualified to deal with the question most ably. I have been indeed so closely associated with it from the beginning that I always rejoice to see others taking a more prominent place in its discussion than myself. The course of events is now more clearly than ever demonstrating the truth of our principles. Those who confidently assured the Lancashire workmen two or three years ago that we were on the eve of a recovery of trade and an era of prosperity for both employers and employed are now frankly proclaiming that either a serious reduction of wages or a recurrence to longer hours of labor, or perhaps both, will have to be accepted by the operatives. We are, indeed, apparently entering upon so serious a contraction of our great industries (not necessarily of our buying and selling and shipping trade) that I look for a prolonged and exasperated conflict between the two suffering parties—masters and workmen—as to who shall sustain the first and heaviest share of the common loss. The political and social efforts will, I fear, be lamentable in the extreme. Fair-traders would counsel them instead to join hands against the forces which are silently sapping the prosperity of both, and to insist on the adoption of a national policy which would restore scope and hope to our industries and banish from us, in this active period of the development of the word's resources, the miserable fear that English workmen may have to suffer unexceptional and undeserved reduction of their earnings, their comforts, and their leisure.

Other Democratic speakers ignore the general shrinkage of values in all commercial countries, which, while it raises ad valorem duties, enables them to declaim against the enormous percentage of specific duty when they should in fairness confess, under the tariff, a great decline in price and cheaper goods for the people. and cheaper goods for the people.

What an enormous surplus these gentlemen predicted in the last Congress. How greatly have they diminished their estimate now! They then said the tariff would not reduce the revenue for this year, and I find the customs revenue reduced about $23,000,000 per annum this year.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY CAN WITHOUT ALARM TO THE COUNTRY REDUCE TARIFF AND DIRECT TAXES.

Can the country be persuaded to trust the tariff to their hands? When the English people adopted the doctrines of Cobden, Bright, Poullett, Thomson, and Villiers, they did not listen to the Whigs, who seized upon free trade as a party cry; when the unprotected manufacturers and operatives were seeking free bread they did not accept the guidance of Lord John Russell and Macaulay, but for the quiet of the country and the safety of its business intrusted the proposed changes to Sir Robert Peel and the party in power.

This is ever the wise tendency of a cautious people who care more for their production and wages than for party politics, for their industries than for campaigns, for markets than for platform promises. The Republican party found a bankrupt Treasury and inaugurated a system which yielded a surplus. They can safely readjust the system and decrease that surplus. The people can trust the Republican party which made the tariff to reform it.

But this task is not possible until the comparative working of two tariffs differing in many important particulars and operating under different and complex commercial conditions has had a single year's trial. It will require the result of several years under the operations of the new law to throw abundant light on this subject. Then the Republican party can and will, as I believe, not in a hostile spirit, but in sympathy with labor, with manufactures, and home markets, carefully readjust and gradually reduce until there be no surplus, by abatement of direct taxes and customs duties. This country does not yet know the effect of the new tariff, this Congress does not know it. And my topic, bituminous coal, will show that the very able committee, whose aggregate wisdom far exceeds the combined knowledge of this House respecting revenue, are not even familiar with the very terms of the law which they hasten to change. (Arguments before the Ways and Means Committee, pages 370, 371.)

The chairman and his party friends found a provision respecting coal which they did not know was in the tariff law, whose operation when so instructed they wholly misapprehended, and then the committee fell into a long discussion in which it was discovered that a very important discrimination in the coal tariff did not, in the elegant parlance of the chairman, prevent him from warming his toes in Illinois by a bituminous-coal fire, but only favored foreign steamship lines to the prejudice of our own American coastwise trade. The result of the inquiry shows, if it shows anything, that this provision was not inserted in the law in this House nor in the Senate, nor yet in the conference committee, and that the distinguished chairman, who has presumably thumbed the tariff law until the pages are dog-eared from use, did not know anything of its history, of its effect, nor even of its presence in the law.

A CENTURY OF TARIFF ON COAL.

In this spirit and with this preparation they approached the tariff on coal, which does not yield a half million dollars' revenue, and swept it away. The first tariff (1789) imposed a duty on bituminous coal, and during ninety-five years it has had continuous protection. In 1789 it was 56 cents per ton; in 1790, 84 cents per ton; in 1794, $1.40; in 1812, $2.80. Reduced in 1816 to $1.40 it was increased in 1824 to $1.68. The tariff of 1842 raised this duty to $1.75, and even the lowest of all tariffs in 1846 only reduced the duty to $1.30 per ton.

To admit foreign coal needed in time of war in 1861 the duty fell to $1 per ton, to be raised successively to $1.10 and $1.25 per ton in 1864. It was not until 1873 it was reduced to 75 cents per ton, which is 24 per cent. ad valorem.

But to-day, without warning, it is proposed to pass a law in June putting bituminous coal on the free-list on the 1st of July. Of the 58,000,000 tons of soft coal produced last year in this Union, east of the Alleghanies, not one ton of soft coal is used to one thousand of anthracite for domestic purposes. Free coal for the fireside is thought a good party cry to entrap the unwary. There is no popular demand for it. No one has appeared before the committee asking any reduction of the duty on bituminous coal. Anthracite coal east of the Alleghanies is the coal of the domestic fireside, and anthracite is free from duty. That coal is produced too fast for consumption, and the owners of it time and again have combined to lessen the output, manifestly a monopoly of the worst sort in a free-list commodity. On the Atlantic coast, and away from the mining region, bituminous coal is not used as a domestic fuel.

I challenge any member to show that 10,000 tons per annum of bituminous coal is applied on this seaboard to domestic consumption. You can not by free coal help the fireside, but you can paralyze an important industry and reduce the price of its labor. You will strike an unexpected blow at the coastwise trade. From Georgetown the ships of Maine carry coal to every port of the Atlantic coast. It is an immense tonnage in American vessels. Ninety-three millions of capital, principally east of the Alleghanies, is invested in the bituminous coal trade. Ninety-six thousand people are engaged in it. Of these 36,000 people are in my own State in my own district, 4,500 in West Virginia, 33,000 in Pennsylvania.

THE CORPORATIONS BENEFITED BY FREE COAL.

The only coals in the Union affected by putting bituminous coal on the free-list are the gas coals and steam coals of Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, because their market is at the seaboard at Baltimore, New York, Boston, and Portland, and their coals are not there sold for hearth fires. If the people who used 29,130,096 tons of anthracite last year are not benefited by it, if the cost of transportation makes indifferent to the coal tariff millions of people who use bituminous coal west of the Alleghanies, whom does this new legislation benefit? The great corporations alone will inevitably reap the benefit of this sham reform. The cry is, "free fuel" to a people whose fuel is free.

It cheapens fuel to the great railway companies of the Atlantic seaboard, who ought not to be favored, and whose rates of freight it will not reduce. It gives cheaper and better coals to the English steamship lines, which will help English monopolies to delay the revival of American shipping. It will help a few glass companies. It will give further protection to the great iron manufacturers of the seaboard already enough protected, and it will delight the gas companies of the great cities by adding to their profits still more, but will not cheapen gas to the consumer.

Since 1873, when the duty was fixed at 75 cents, a review of the price of our Cumberland coals affords a striking proof that a protective tariff, by encouraging the rapid development of new coal-fields, may steadily reduce the price to the consumer, and by inducing a constant home competition afford the people cheaper coal.

I quote from Saward's Annual this table:

There was a larger output during 1883 than for a period of years, but the prices realized were very low by reason of the severe competition with Clearfield coal. It is expected that 1884 will show a similar state of affairs—low prices and large tonnage.

Prices have been as below at Baltimore:

Year.	Prices.	Year.	Prices.	Year.	Prices.
1872	$4 52	1877	$3 15	1882	$3 50
1873	4 83	1878	2 86	1883	2 90
1874	4 70	1879	2 75	1884	2 70
1875	4 35	1880	3 75
1876	3 87	1881	3 75

The rate of mining remains at 50 cents per gross ton.

The same coal, which in 1873 sold at Baltimore for $4.83 per ton, sells to-day at that port for $2.70 per ton, and the tendency is steadily downward. Protection has reduced steam coals to one-sixth of the price of Canadian coals in Boston during the war.

If your theory were correct that the duty is always added to the price of the article, take off the 75 cents, and you leave scarcely enough of the price at $2.70 to transport the coal from the mine to the seaboard and not a cent of profit to the miner of the coal, nor a penny to the man who mines the coal.

I rely upon figures given by a gentleman of rare ability and special information.

1. At present the standard freight from mines two hundred and twenty-five miles to Baltimore is	$1 75
Shipping charges, no insurance or other terminal charges	15
Total	1 90
The actual cost of putting the coal on the railroad cars and at the mines, including the cost of mining, hauling it out to the mouth of the mine by mine locomotive, steam machinery, and horse-power, and running it down the incline and putting it on the railroad cars, including 50 cents per ton to the miner	80
Total	2 70
2. Railroad transportation 225 miles, per ton 2,240 pounds, from the mines to Baltimore	1 75
To shipping charges, insurance, and other terminal charges	22
Vessel freight from Baltimore to New York	1 20
	3 17
The actual cost of putting a ton of coal into the railroad cars at the mines being the cost of mining, of hauling it out to the mouth of the mine by mine locomotive, steam machinery, and horse-power, and the cost of running it down the "incline" and putting it over machinery into railroad cars	80
	3 97
The actual selling price in New York is $3.90 to $4.10, according to the nature of the delivery there, $4 per ton of 2,240 pounds, leaving the owner of steam coals a royalty (per ton) of	03
Total	4 00

If coal is shipped to Boston the price there is as much higher as the additional vessel freight, say generally 20 cents to 25 cents per ton.

Tariff on coal has substituted it for wood as a steam generator in this country. Since the destruction of forests has become a public question it is well to see how a protective tariff has indirectly spared them from destruction.

Prior to 1856 the Cumberland region was the sole producer of soft steam coal for the Atlantic seaboard trade. In that year the Broad Top region of Pennsylvania began shipping thither, and in 1862 the Clearfield region commenced, but since the reciprocity treaty expired has been the real development. These regions which in 1865 sent 1,280,030 tons, in 1883 sent 5,246,203 tons to the seaboard.

Since the development began it has substituted coal for wood as a generator of steam, and the active development of our home fields under this fostering tariff has led to the present large proportions on the seaboard of the steam-coal trade. In a day you ask it to compete with English ballast and Pictou coals. How can you reassure the miners of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia? How can you encourage the mine-owners to further develop or even venture to continue the present output?

A DUTY ON PRODUCTS A RELATIVE QUESTION.

Will you continue to tax everything the miner wears, the tools he works with, and half of what he eats, and yet not protect his product also? The reduction is horizontal as to all else, but you launch a thunderbolt at him. Elsewhere you carefully provide the duty shall not fall below the Morrill tariff; but while you reduce every other product 20 per cent. on that basis, which would leave to the coal-miner his present duty untouched, you rudely sponge it out entirely. You can give no adequate excuse for this discrimination against the coal-miner. It is only agitation for political effect, and not a statesmanlike readjustment of duties. It illustrates the recklessness of the whole scheme. It is an added folly upon the folly of horizontal reduction.

COAL AND RAW MATERIAL.

The free-list is appended to the list of dutiable articles. This House should not forget that before the committee reaches coal in this long list it has retained a tax on nearly everything the coal-miner is compelled to use. This is a relative question. Nor can the plea of raw material apply. Raw material is also a relative term. What is raw material to one man because he manipulates it is finished product to another. The manufacture of one man may be used as the raw material of the next.

Coal is not raw material except in the bowels of the earth. A ton of coal, according to the census of 1880, is 60 per cent. labor. And that labor is skilled labor of a high order. It involves, more than most avocations, courage, quick intelligence, and self-sacrifice. It is fraught with peculiar danger and hardship.

The adventurous miner in subterranean darkness, noxious vapors, and falling strata, requires a varied fund of knowledge. He must know how to blast to advantage, to place the prop with skill, to so lay the track that the car and horse may follow his advance to remove the coal; he must "shear" his coal, and with quick decision know where to drive the steel or iron wedges to bring down the coal in marketable shapes. The miner knows where run the seams of slate or sulphur, and he must have a care to divest the coal of all impurities. He must mine the adhesive mass several feet beneath and on the sides and follow a line ascertained by the compass all the while. Unskilled labor, when resorted to, often impairs the mines, wastes the coal, and costs many lives.

Even the most skillful, by the jarring of his blows, may fall a victim to a treacherous roof overhead, or the mass he is manipulating may suddenly maim or crush him. Ceaseless vigilance alone prolongs the life which is always shortened by the nature of his toil. I can speak for the miners of my own district, whom it is a great honor to represent, and all who know them will with me claim for them a high degree of intelligence, and the statistics of the Postal Department will attest that they are a community of reading, thinking men, women, and children, rarely equaled.

How can you reassure them if, with a keener foresight than yours, they fear that not only their wages (now but 50 cents per ton) may be impaired, but their occupation may be gone if their coal here at the seaboard is made free to compete with Nova Scotia and English ballast coals.

My own State, Virginia, and Congress in 1823, 1824, 1825 started the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, which, commencing at the base of the Cumberland mines, once ended at the base of the mound whereon this Capitol stands. This city furnished money; Maryland spent $17,000,000 to open this canal to the coal-fields of Alleghany County. This great public work, now in distress by reason of many mishaps and railway competition, will be no longer the thoroughfare which has supplied a market for the produce of the farmers on the western side of Montgomery, Frederick, Washington, and Alleghany Counties and has built up during a half-century the towns along its banks. Where is a more distressing example of hasty tariff legislation to be found? These communities all have had the trials of war and many vicissitudes since; but you are about to strike a violent, perhaps a fatal blow to a great water way from which the plastic hand of industry may never revive it, if you place the product of our mines at the mercy of foreign competition. At the present rates boatmen of my district can barely make a living, and by reducing the selling price of coal, their principle freight, 24 per cent. what will become of the boatmen who can now barely maintain themselves?

Sir, the great Union to which this section of my State has ever been steadfastly loyal, and to whose defense her sons hurried from the farm and the mine, the town and the mountains, has not spared my district throughout its length from the ravages of war. Its armies have seized and appropriated the property of the citizens, yielding scarcely a pittance of redress. You propose now in this bill to strike a blow at the important railways, a fatal blow at another great public work of my State, and a far-reaching injury to the people I have the honor to represent. There is not a parallel to this legislation. The chairman of this committee would pass this law in June and enforce it in July. Even the English economists, whose disciples are the leaders of this House, would have recoiled from this hasty measure. It is haste unlike the English free-trade statesman's methods.

The most difficult thing of all is for masses of men gathered together at the principal seats of industry to distribute themselves. What is intended to do is commenced long in advance without maintaining vain hopes, and a long space of time is left to enable people to make their arrangements accordingly.

Huskisson proceeded more wisely when he proposed to get rid of the English silk prohibition. It was announced as early as 1824 that on July 5, 1826, protective duties of 30 per cent. would take the place of the prohibition. It was true there was no Presidential election at hand then, and besides, Huskisson was a statesman. But perhaps this coal region of three States is too remote from the home of the distinguished chairman of this committee to awake his interest.

Webster said that every one accustomed to self-examination discovers that there is in human nature that which incapacitates a man from taking a very lively interest in a community situated very remote from his own locality. It is charitable to assume that by this unconscious influence the chairman was persuaded in his efforts through the sanction of his committee to protect the producers of bourbon whisky in Kentucky and to neglect the producers of coal in Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Can the Ways and Means Committee of the House afford to go to the country saying that we give thirty days' notice to the hardy miners of coal that the protection, which by the legislation of a century they had a right to expect to continue, must end, but in tender solicitude they would afford an unexpected stay of three years in collecting a tax which for years had been imposed, without a right of a day's delay, in favor of the producers of whisky?

What a sham reform is this. What an improving spirit of reform is abroad in the Democratic party. Its leading committee in the same session of Congress has tried to take away protection from miners of bituminous coal that to the maker of bourbon whisky it may give protection.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Before that motion is submitted I desire to say that I wish to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING], who will take the floor in the morning.

Mr. MORRISON. I now renew the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. BAGLEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A PAIR.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last a pair between the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. MORGAN, and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. RYAN, was not announced by some oversight. It is due to those gentlemen that this statement should be made.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 767) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KELLEY, until Monday next.

To Mr. DORSHEIMER, on account of important business, until Tuesday.

ANN HUNTER.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. 3493) granting a pension to Ann Hunter; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SOLON L. SIMONDS.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by unanimous consent, also reported back the bill (H. R. 5781) granting a pension to Solon L. Simonds; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT, will preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session.

The hour of 5 o'clock having now arrived, in pursuance of the previous order, the Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. resumed its session, Mr. TALBOTT in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BAGLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BAGLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise with the purpose or expectation of surprising either the committee or myself by saying anything new upon the subject now under consideration. I find, by reading the history of the debates in Congress, that the tariff question has been ably discussed, pro and con, by the foremost men in the country from the time of the assembling of the first Congress under our Constitution to the present time. From these debates I find that there has been at all times a well-defined difference of opinion as to the wisdom of the protective policy; and at times a difference of opinion as to the power of Congress under the Constitution to impose duties on foreign imports other than for revenue purposes; but in the main the protective feature has been maintained from the foundation of our present system of Government.

It would ill-become me to assert that the question was not debatable, and, out of deference to those who differ with me, I assume that the question is debatable, not that I am in doubt as to the power of Congress over the subject, or as to the wisdom of the policy, but that I concede to others the right to differ with me; and whenever their arguments convince me that I am wrong in principle or in policy I shall yield in obedience to that conviction which ought to guide men in public affairs.

We are all equal upon this floor; and are servants of the people to do their will. And now what is sought to be accomplished by our legislation? It is conceded by all that the object is to benefit the agricultural, manufacturing, and laboring interests, with resulting benefits to all classes of our people. Here we meet upon common ground; there are no party lines to be drawn as to the object sought to be accomplished. Now, as honest, well-meaning servants of the people, looking with a common interest to the welfare of our common country, how can we most likely reach that desired result?

In what I may say upon this occasion I shall assume that Congress has the power under the Constitution to levy import duties for the double purpose of revenue and protection.

TRUE POLICY OF A NATION.

The true policy of a nation is to protect by wise legislation its citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and there can be no beneficial protection of the one without the harmonious protection of the other. Without life there is no need of either liberty or property; without liberty life would be a drag and a curse; without property there can be no leisure; without leisure there can be no time for study and thought, and without study and thought there can be no intelligent fixedness in human affairs; and all will concede that what our country needs most is fixedness of purpose in the minds of the people on economic questions, so that our country may develop its resources with reference to the future and assume the responsibility of a nation with reference to its own interests as well as among the nations of the earth.

A nation is but a community of citizens in the aggregation of nations; but the form of government in the one may be so materially different as to necessitate an internal policy wholly antagonistic to the other. Hence our laws should be shaped with reference to our own institutions and interests. No one will deny that we have the power, and that it ought to be our policy, to protect ourselves against the encroachment of all nations that threaten the destruction of our commerce or that tends to impede the development of our own resources. Our people have been educated in the school of fair wages; labor has been elevated, made honorable, and now to place it in competition with the poorly paid labor of Europe would degrade it. Our laboring classes are none too well paid now, and any policy which would weaken or in any way cripple our industries would not better their condition.

COMMENCEMENT OF TARIFF AGITATION.

At the time of the adoption of our present Constitution the population of our country was but one-fifteenth of what it is to-day, and our Treasury was bankrupt, while the manufacturing industries, which had been destroyed or rendered useless at the close of the Revolutionary war by reason of heavy importations of foreign goods, were struggling for existence with shrinking capital; hence the first questions which engaged the attention of the First Congress, which convened in April, 1789, and within two days of its assembly, were revenue and encouragement to domestic manufactures by means of duties levied upon foreign imports. The questions were discussed and considered from that time until July of that year, when a law was enacted and the sense of that body expressed in the preamble thereto in these words:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid, &c.

So that it will be seen that the first Congress which convened under our present Constitution gave force and effect to its meaning as to the power of Congress to levy import duties and to regulate commerce, and that a necessity existed at that time for the exercise of that power to the end that revenue might be obtained and our home industries encouraged and protected.

It was understood then, as now, that the fewer imports of manufactures the more protection to domestic manufactures, and that the more imports the less protection; and this is true, whether the price of the domestic be the same as the foreign, or whether it be higher, so that then as now to check foreign imports legislation was necessary. Not, however, for the purpose of increasing the price of the domestic manufacture, however much it may have that result, but to lessen competition with the foreign product so that the domestic manufacturer might have the privilege of supplying our own people. For instance, if there be but one customer for a suit of clothes and the domestic manufacturer has one and the foreign manufacturer has one to sell, of whom shall he purchase? Our Democratic friends who advocate free trade say that depends upon which he can buy the cheapest; but does it? Shall we regard the cheapness of the article as paramount to the condition of the men who are engaged among us in similar industries? Is a dollar worth more than a man, or shall we esteem a dollar saved in the purchase of foreign manufactures as of more value and importance to us as a nation than the elevation and education of our laboring classes? The voice of God with us is expressed by the people at the ballot. Our destiny as a nation is in their hands.

INTELLIGENCE AND LOYALTY THE SAFEGUARDS OF THE NATION.

The development, progress, and perpetuity of our country depend upon the intelligence and loyalty of the people. Shall we continue the fabric for the encouragement of both? The man who has no children to educate in our public schools is equally taxed with he who has, because education is the basis of society, and society based upon intelligence is essential to the perpetuity of our free institutions; and if we would have our people remain loyal to our common country and its flag we must legislate for their interest, benefit the greatest possible number, and maintain our national identity with less sentimentality.

INCONSISTENCY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

Our Democratic friends at the first session of the last Congress were clamorous for the exclusion of Chinese labor as a measure of relief and protection to American labor, and yet, with few exceptions, on that side of the House, they offer no objection to the importation of the products of their labor or of the labor of Europe, when they know that the exclusion of the products of such labor is as essential to the protection of our laboring classes as the exclusion of the laborer himself. I voted for that Chinese bill because it was in harmony with the declarations of the Republican party and in accord with my views on protection, but why did you Democrats, who advocate free trade or a purely revenue tariff, vote for it. You say it was simply to protect our laboring classes, and so say I, but I am willing to protect them by laying duties upon foreign manufactures; but you say no, give us free trade ultimately or give us death, while some of you on that side of the House have the honesty to advocate free trade now, notwithstanding you know that free trade means heavy importations of foreign manufactures and consequent death to our manufacturing, laboring, and farming interests.

Under free trade, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] says, raise your revenue from income and internal sources. Tax a man on his energy and thrift, encourage him to conceal what he has made, prevent him from investing his money and putting it into circulation, and educate him to abuse the Government that compels him to commit perjury to save what he has earned by honesty and industry. How much revenue would you get from such a source? Then did it ever occur to you that if free trade had the effect to destroy our industries there would be no income to tax?

Where next would you go for revenue? The expenses of the Government must be paid, and the pensions due our soldiers can not be neglected. You say tax whisky and tobacco, articles of luxury, and so say I; but did it occur to you that with little money men buy few luxuries, and that with no money they can not buy any? The payment of the tax on whisky and tobacco would depend then as now ultimately upon consumption, as without consumption there would be no sale, and without sale manufacturers would have no money to pay tax with; so that however much the lessening of the consumption might be desired you can readily see that it would not be a safe source from which to anticipate revenue to meet the emergencies of the Government.

REPUBLICAN TARIFF.

We must, then, in addition to the tax on whisky and tobacco, derive our principal revenue from import duties; and in levying such duties I believe it to be wise policy to impose duties sufficiently high to encourage and protect the domestic industries that come in competition with like industries abroad; and upon such articles of foreign import as are not produced or manufactured in this country I would impose a purely revenue duty, unless such articles were of common necessity, and then I would put them on the free-list.

The biography of our country is in its Constitution and laws, and the wisdom of its laws can be measured only by their results. The development and progress of the nation may be read in its legislative enactments, enactments which were necessitated by the demand of the people to meet their changed conditions, and the experience of the past is the lamp by which we should be guided in the future.

We legislate for a people whose ancestors had the courage and the manhood to seize the reins of British despotism in their own hands; and that their posterity might continue the grasp, instead of wear the bridle, they declared our independence and the equality of all men, and to gain the mastery they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors. A century has come and gone and our free institutions still live, with serfdom and slavery blotted out. We are a prosperous, happy, and contented people to-day because we have maintained our freedom and independence, and by wise legislation protected the agricultural, manufacturing, and laboring interests, making each harmoniously dependent upon the others, instead of all being dependent upon Europe.

PROTECTION DEVELOPS THE COUNTRY AND INCREASES OUR NATIONAL WEALTH.

The nation that depends upon a foreign country for its selling and buying markets can never secure or maintain its independence of that country; and unless we maintain our present independence of Europe by maintaining a home market for our field products, the corporations and land monopolies now justly complained of by so many will fade into insignificance, as our lands will then become the property of the few, as it is in free-trade England to-day.

In England, excluding her numerous parks and waste lands, there are about 52,000,000 acres of land, 5,000,000 acres of which are owned by twenty-five persons, while nine-tenths of the whole acreage are owned by 47,000 persons. This is the result of England's policy—a plutocracy of less than 50,000 land-owners ruling and controlling the 35,000,000 of people within her border. Although her bill of rights forbids a standing army in time of peace, she has an army of nearly 1,000,000 of men, besides her most powerful and improved navy. In England under such a policy one necessitates the other, not only to maintain the iron grip which the plutocrats have, but to enforce discipline among her bread-hunters.

Not so with us. Here we have over 4,000,000 farms, containing nearly or quite 300,000,000 acres of improved land (seventy-five acres to the farm) valued at more than $10,000,000,000 (one-fifth of our entire wealth), producing annually, including live-stock, over $4,000,000,000, and giving employment to more than 7,000,000 of our people, with a standing army of less than 25,000 men and no navy. This is the result of the policy which has been pursued by the United States. We have maintained the dignity of our nation and its credit at home and abroad, not by its Army or its so-called Navy, but by giving encouragement to the development of our resources and in enforcing discipline by giving ready employment at fair wages to our farming and laboring classes.

Our Democratic friends assert that this condition of things has been in spite of our protective policy and not in consequence of it, but where is the proof in support of such a proposition? What has been our growth and development since the tariff of 1861? Let us glance at our condition in 1860 and in 1880, both being census years, and what have we:

Comparative growth and development of the country in 1860 and 1880.

If such growth and development as there shown has been in spite of our protective system, then it certainly has not impeded our progress as some on that side of the House assert. And now, in the face of such prosperity under our protective policy, you propose to abandon it and adopt "a tariff for revenue only," notwithstanding our experience under the Walker revenue tariff from 1846 to 1861. Under that tariff our industries were crippled and our people depressed because of the heavy importations of foreign manufactures, and the heavy exports of gold and silver coin and bullion; and need I say that but for the discovery of the gold mines in California, in 1849—three years after the Walker tariff went into operation—and the silver mines ten years later, which together produced from 1850 to 1860 inclusive, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, $601,750,000, our condition would have been infinitely worse, and as it was the excess of exports of gold and silver coin and bullion over imports for the same period was $420,318,081, or within $181,431,919 of our total production; whereas the excess of imports of merchandise over exports for the same period (1850 to 1860) was $384,913,005, or $35,405,076 less than our excess of gold and silver exports.

So that it will be seen by the above showing that our gold and silver went abroad to pay the balance of trade against us, and that but for the gold and silver production during that period our prosperity would have been measured only by worse calamities, so that whatever prosperity there was under the Walker revenue tariff, was due more to the discovery of our gold and silver mines than perhaps anything else.

PROTECTION HAS RESTORED OUR CREDIT AS A NATION AND KEPT OUR MONEY AT HOME FOR OUR OWN PEOPLE.

Now, what was our financial condition in 1860? I shall not speak of the lost credit of the nation at that time or its depreciated bonds. There was in 1860 but $280,000,000 of specie in the country, and doubtless most of that was held by State banks for the redemption of their outstanding depreciated notes, while there was then but $207,000,000 of paper currency in circulation, or the total amount of gold and silver and paper currency in the country in 1860 was but $487,000,000, but the $207,000,000 of depreciated currency was the principal circulating medium and in many localities the only circulating medium; whereas to-day, with a little more than 60 per cent. increase in population, we have in this country in gold and silver and paper currency, including $217,495,861 gold and silver certificates, all equal to gold, $1,706,895,404, of which amount it is estimated by the Director of the Mint there was on March 31, 1884, $550,924,000 in gold coin, and of silver coin $249,578,000, and if we deduct the gold and silver certificates we will then have left $1,489,399,543, every dollar of which is as good as gold in any section of our country.

Again, the balance of trade is now many millions in our favor and has been for some years, so that we are selling more than we buy, thereby adding to our gold and silver and giving to our people money with which to transact the business of the country. Notwithstanding this condition of affairs, you gentlemen on that side of the House say that our protective system, which has brought us the balance of trade and kept our money at home for our own people, has been oppressive. You not only say it has been oppressive, but you say it has built up monopolies in this country. That is because our people have had more money to do business with than they had during the Walker revenue tariff; they have prospered more, and some have made large fortunes. It is certainly true that some manufacturers have made more money than others, but I apprehend that if you will compare the prices under the Walker tariff with the present prices you will find that those who have made the most money have made the largest reduction in their prices. If they have not made money honestly, that is no argument against the protective system, but most likely an evidence of the abuse of the system, and if so we should check the abuse rather than tear down the system.

PROTECTION BENEFITS THE FARMER.

Can it be questioned that the products of the farm are more valuable to-day than in 1860, or that the laboring classes are better paid? Can it be questioned that these manufacturing industries have built up a home market, developed our railroad system, and enabled the farmer to sell his products in a near market at better prices? Can it be questioned that 90 per cent. of our agricultural products are consumed by our own people; and can it be questioned that the price for that 90 per cent. of field products has been regulated by the supply and demand in this country? Can it be questioned that the great majority of manufactured goods can be bought in the markets of the United States to-day for less money than they were bought for in 1860 and prior years? So that the protective system has not only encouraged manufacturing industries and built up the farming interests, developed our agricultural resources, furnished employment at fair wages to our laboring classes, and built up the railroads of the country, but has cheapened the price of manufactured goods and built up a national credit which is excelled by none in the world. It will be conceded that every industry in this land depends upon agriculture, and therefore the importance of protecting agriculture is in the interest of all classes, and this I say whether the cost of agricultural products be little or great.

Why is it that the Cobden Club, free-traders, are constantly advising the farmers in this country to resist our protective system? Is it because under the present system they have been enabled to sell their products at home for higher prices? Is it because the proximity of their lands to manufacturing industries have enhanced their value? Is it because they have a better market at home for their perishable and non-exportable products—such as vegetables, berries, and fruits? Is it because the system has furnished a home market for 90 per cent. of their products and increased the value thereof? Is it because they have prospered since the system was established beyond all measure? Is it because they are happier to-day than they were under the Walker tariff from 1846 to 1861, when business was so depressed and manufacturing industries so disturbed, that in his message to Congress in 1857 President Buchanan felt called upon to specially ask the attention of Congress thereto? Is it because the farmers of to-day enjoy more luxuries than they did during the "Walker free-trade" days? No, Mr. Chairman; these are not the reasons! It is because the farming classes of this country constitute a larger percentage of our population than any other class, and are important factors at our elections.

These spokesmen for England are endeavoring to turn the greater number of our citizens against the system, knowing that the ballot is the power that wields our destiny, and that to adopt free trade or a purely revenue tariff in this country would enable the English manufacturers to so successfully compete with our own as to force down the price of labor and to eventually reduce it to the English standard. That is the case in a nutshell; and the question is, shall we by our legislation permit that reduction now for the sake of cheap English goods for a while, giving the English manufacturer in the end the control of our market, which would be followed with reduced price of labor and agricultural products, or shall we maintain our present system for a few years longer, until by improved facilities for manufacturing our industries can compete with England without curtailing the price of labor under a revenue tariff? The latter seems to me to be the wiser policy for this country to pursue, and especially in the light of results.

Is the purely revenue system a better one for us now? How can we determine? Our experience with it ought to teach us something. A burnt child fears fire. I have never yet been able to admire the so-called reformer who seeks to tear down without giving something better in its stead, or the man who would lead the people through tried difficulties under promise of something better beyond, and especially when the beyond has passed and is within the knowledge of the most of our people.

You approach any community to-day in this country where manufacturing is carried on and you will find the people prosperous and happy in the main, lands commanding better prices, labor better paid, children going to school, people better dressed, more books and papers to read for less money, and in fact their general condition superior to 1860 and prior years. The farmers have been protected for years against Canada, South America, and other foreign countries, and under the law passed the 3d day of March, 1883, the agricultural products are protected by the following duties:

Rice, cleaned, per pound	$0 02½
Butter, per pound	04
Cheese, per pound	04
Wheat, per bushel	20
Corn, per bushel	10
Oats, per bushel	10
Rye, per bushel	10
Barley, per bushel	10
Potatoes, per bushel	15
Ham and bacon, per pound	02
Beef and pork, per pound	01
Wool, per pound	10 to 12
Hay, per ton	2 00

On horses, cows, bulls, oxen, steers, calves, sheep, lambs, goats, hogs, and pigs, except for breeding purposes, 20 per cent. ad valorem. Those for breeding purposes are admitted free of duty because it is in the interest of the farmer to get the best known breed in stock from all countries. So that it will be seen that these duties which are imposed upon the agricultural products of foreign countries directly benefit and protect the farmer, and this protection will become more important hereafter, as India, Russia, and Australia are to-day rapidly developing their wheat interests and they will soon be able to supply England with wheat instead of us; that will of course lessen the foreign demand for our wheat and compel us to rely still more upon the home market, and every industry which may be established in this country where labor is required creates an additional demand for the farm products. Within the near future and as other heretofore non-agricultural producing countries are developed we will be required to look well toward enlarging our field of manufacturing to supply a market for our farm products and look more to the exportation of our manufactures.

England's wealth to-day is the hard earnings of other nations to whom she has sold her manufactured products, notwithstanding she has been compelled to rely upon other nations for food for her people, and with the grip that she now has on India, with prices of labor in that country below all precedent, she has but to solve the transportation question to get food for her people at prices much below what she now pays; and the cheaper England can get food for her people the less will she pay her laboring classes, and the less she pays her laboring classes the greater profit will she make on her manufactures at even lesser rates. She is a manufacturing country and is to-day "mistress of the seas," with her ships in every known port and hunting more, her flag beckoning commerce from every nation on the globe; so that we must regard commerce, internal and foreign, in all its phases and encourage ship-building.

But you gentlemen on that side of the House say, "Give us free ships and a tariff for revenue only and we will in a few years control the commerce of the seas and benefit both our farming and laboring interests." Why, a purely revenue tariff, as I have said before, was tried in this country from 1846 to 1861, when the conditions were most favorable, and when we had over $600,000,000 in gold from the California mines to aid us, and then the system proved a failure. What industries were developed during that period that gave evidence of prosperity and permanency? None, and the farming and the laboring classes of those times who are still living know it, and it would be useless to cite statistics. Results are facts fixed in the minds of the people, and if the Democratic party would only accept results by examining the accounts of the people then and now, they would be with this side of the House; but infidels always reject established truths and rely on theory.

Why, look at the growth of this country! Why do you shut your eyes to its development? In 1860 we had but sixteen billions of wealth and to-day we have over fifty billions. In 1850 we had a little more than twenty-one million head of sheep, and during the ten years that followed there was an increase of less than one million, whereas to-day we have more than fifty million head of sheep, as shown by the following figures, taken from official and reliable sources:

It appears from reliable statistics that during the last four census years the number of sheep and the production of wool were as follows:

Census years.	Sheep.	Wool.
	Numbers.	Pounds.
1850	21,723,220	52,516,959
1860	22,471,225	60,264,913
1870	28,477,951	100,102,387
1880	43,576,899	235,648,834
1883	50,500,000	320,000,000

It will be seen from the above table that the increase in the number of sheep in the decade from 1850 to 1860 was only 748,055, equivalent to 3½ per cent.; but from 1860 to 1870 it amounted to 6,006,675, or 27 per cent. This augmentation was largely due to the protective tariff of 1867, the influence of which was felt during the subsequent decade, as the increase of more than 15,000,000 (15,098,948), or 53 per cent., in the number of sheep conclusively proves. From information that is believed to be trustworthy the number of sheep in the United States in the year 1883 was 50,500,000, an increase of 6,923,101 in three years, or 5.3 per cent. annually, the same average percentage of increase as occurred in the decade from 1870 to 1880.

And now, notwithstanding the rapid increase in our sheep-growing, the price of wool to-day is higher than it was in 1860, while the price of woolen manufactures is from 20 to 30 per cent. cheaper. And if it were not for the duty on wool which protects the wool-grower woolen manufactures would be cheaper here than in England. And now let us see what the price of some of the woolen manufactures are in this country to-day as compared with 1860. I give wholesale prices of like goods actually sold in 1860:

Articles.	1860.	1884.
Pair Middlesex bed-blankets, net wholesale price	$2 75	$2 55
Pair Norway plain all-wool bed-blankets, net wholesale price	4 00	3 75
Made-up horse-blankets, burlap lined, wholesale price	2 00	1 20
Samples of Fitchburg cassimeres, all wool, 27 inches wide, wholesale price	1 05	92
Samples of Haile & Frost cashmeretts, 27 inches wide, average wholesale price	51	42

These reductions have been made because of the increased skill in American manufactures and by competition with each other, brought about by our protective system.

There are nearly twice as many sheep in Australia to-day as there are in this country, and the importance of protecting our wool-growers can not be overestimated.

Let us take another industry in this country. Need I say to anybody in this House or in the country that the price of cotton goods in 1860, after fourteen years of a practical free-trade tariff, were from 20 to 40 per cent. higher than they are to-day? You who purchase bleached shirtings, brown sheetings, drilling, prints such as are used by the great mass of people, know full well that in 1860 they were higher by from 20 to 40 per cent. than they are to-day; and you know that to-day in the markets of this country you can buy prints at from 4 to 5 cents per yard that before the war you were compelled to pay from 10 to 15 cents per yard for. Here are some of the prices of the best cotton goods, furnished me from reliable sources, comparing the prices of 1860 with now. I give wholesale prices:

Articles.	1860.	1884.
	Cents.	Cents.
Bleached shirtings.....per yard...	15	9 to 10½
Brown sheetings.....per yard...	8½	6½ to 7½
Drilling.....per yard...	9½	7 to 7½
Prints, best make.....per yard...	9	5½ to 6
Ginghams.....per yard...	10½	8

Those are articles purchased by the great mass of our people. The cost of silks has declined still more as the silk industries have developed in this country. So has queensware and crockery, but those who purchased then and who purchase now know the difference without my giving comparative prices.

Now, let us take another great industry, one of the greatest industries in this country, one which affects the building of railroads, the improvement of estates; one which affects the blacksmith and all classes of labor. That is the iron interest, and what do we find there? Why, we find that as late as 1868 steel rails were selling in this country at an average price of $158 per ton; whereas in the month of April, 1884, steel rails of a better quality could be purchased in this market at $34 per ton.

Is not this an item when we consider that the railroad interests of this country transport the farming and the manufacturing products to the market? And it is a fact, which is sustained by the reports from the Agricultural Department, that the cost of transportation over the railroads in this country have diminished as the cost of railroad material has diminished. What would be the cost of transportating the agricultural products from the West to the East to-day if the railroad companies were compelled to pay $165 a ton for their rails? Can you conceive the importance and the magnitude of a question like that, which reaches at once to the agricultural and business interests of the country, for every dollar that the farmer has to pay for the transportation of his grain diminishes the value of the product to him?

Now, in order that you may see for yourselves, and that the country may know how the price of steel rails has diminished in this country from 1868 down to April, 1884, I furnish you a table which is compiled by James M. Swank, secretary of the Iron and Steel Association, &c.:

Does that look like robbery? In the face of such facts your arguments fall. Without protection to our steel-rail industry, would England to-day be selling steel rails at $34 per ton, when without protection to the industry she was getting $165 per ton?

Now, another question in connection with this. In 1867, when there was a duty of 45 per cent. ad valorem imposed on steel rails, there was but 2,277 gross tons manufactured. In 1868 there was but 6,451 tons manufactured. In 1869 there was but 8,616 gross tons manufactured, and so on down to 1883, when we manufactured in this country 1,148,709 gross tons, showing that the increased production of steel rails in this country has been followed by an increased demand for steel rails, while at the same time the price has gone down from $165 per ton in 1868 to $34 per ton in April, 1884.

Here is a table showing the production of steel rails from 1867 to 1883, also furnished me by Mr. Swank:

In the following table we give the statistics of the annual production of Bessemer-steel rails in the United States since the commencement of their manufacture, together with the average annual price at which they have been sold and the rates of duty imposed on foreign rails. The yearly price has been obtained by averaging the monthly prices.

The price of cutlery, hardware, and tools have also declined; likewise farming implements. Reapers, mowers, drills, harness, and trace-chains and everything that is used by the farmer to-day in cultivating the soil is cheaper than it was in 1860. To assert that under a purely revenue tariff the manufacturing industries of the country will develop as well as under a protective tariff is to make an assertion without any facts upon which to base it, and such an assertion is in the face of the experience of the people of this country.

INCIDENTAL PROTECTION A SHAM.

But you Democrats say that a tariff for revenue may be so adjusted as to afford incidental protection; that is, that our tariff duties should only be such as to secure the revenue required for the necessities of the Government, and that such duties should be so adjusted as to afford, by chance or accident, protection to some of the industries of the country; and this has been the declaration in the platforms of the Democratic party in some of the States, and was in Ohio at the last election. You might impose a heavy duty on sugar for the purpose of revenue and thereby protect an incident to the sugar consumption in this country; but the imposition of a duty for the purpose of revenue only can not be adjusted so as afford equal protection to all industries. And if any protection did result from the imposition of such a duty to any industry it would necessarily be to the detriment of some other industry equally entitled to protection. In other words, to give equal protection to all our industries, that object should be kept in view as well as revenue when duties are imposed.

If you concede that you may lay a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, then you concede the constitutional question; for if the Constitution warrants the levying of duties for revenue purposes in such a way as to afford incidental protection, then the Constitution will permit Congress to do by direction what you seek to do by indirection.

But will it do? Is it safe that the capital of this country and its commerce shall depend upon chance, upon something that may or may not happen? No; capital is timid; and, as I have said before, if there is any one thing in this country which is more desirable than another, it is to have fixedness of purpose in the minds of the people on economic questions; and the sooner this question is settled by the people the sooner will capital seek permanent investment and the sooner will its growth and development be made to harmonize with the agricultural and all other interests in the land.

If the tariff question is to be treated as a sore and scabbed at every session of Congress, then will capital be driven from our manufacturing industries and agricultural products forced to seek a foreign market, not 10 per cent. as now, but with the increased product of agriculture which would necessarily follow the destruction of our manufacturing industries we would have a surplus of 50 per cent. or more of agricultural products to sell in the markets of Europe in competition with India and Russia. And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] say that it is of vital importance to the farmers of this country to buy their manufactured products abroad, because Europe will always be the market for our field products, and that we should exchange the one for the other. While in the next flight the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] says that already India can supply England with 40,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, and that she will rapidly increase her production to meet the demand of England for cheap bread for her people.

If our farmers are compelled to seek a foreign market for their products and compete with India and Russia what will their products bring? The argument of the gentleman is a strong one in favor of a home market, just such a market as this side of the House is contending for. The gentleman's reasoning is right, but his conclusions are wrong; eloquence is usually at the expense of sound logic.

AMERICAN MONOPOLY PREFERABLE TO AN ENGLISH MONOPOLY.

But it is claimed on that side of the House that our protective system has built up monopolies; that it is in the interest of the few against the many; but it seems not to have occurred to them that the system they advocate would build up a still more powerful monopoly in Europe, one from which we could extract no benefit and which would be beyond our control. As between the two, I would prefer to have the monopoly at home where we can grapple with it by legislation, rather than aid the building up of one in Europe where it would be beyond our control, so that I am not frightened by such arguments. That has been the argument of the Democratic party ever since the Republican party came into power. Cotton-growing is a monopoly because it can only be raised in the South; slavery was a monopoly because none but the rich could own slaves; sugar growing has been a monopoly because Louisiana alone produced it; mining is a monopoly because it is confined to few localities and requires large capital to operate it; the Standard Oil Company is a huge monopoly and supplies the world with oil, in addition to electing a Democrat now and then to the United States Senate, and I am sure you will not claim that our protective tariff did that.

Before the war you paid from $1.20 to $1.50 for a calico dress of ten yards, now you can buy the same goods for 50 and 60 cents and even less than that. Before the war you paid 200 per cent. more for salt than you pay to-day. Before the war you paid more for boots and shoes than you pay to-day, and yet this system which has reduced the cost of manufactured goods you say has built up monopolies. Well, the people like that kind of a monopoly, which, while it is in process of erection, furnishes them cheaper goods and in return consumes the field products. Agricultural products are 6 per cent. higher to-day than before the war, while the cost of manufacturered goods is at least 30 per cent. lower. Now let us see what the farmer's wheat, corn, &c., will buy to-day under protection as compared with free-trade days before the war.

Here is a table which was prepared by my friend, Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island, published with his remarks on the 24th ultimo, the value of the articles named being based upon the prices from 1846 to 1850 as compared with the prices from 1876 to 1880:

Corn has been depressed in price on account of the tremendous increase of production. While the price of corn is comparatively lower than that of any agricultural product, still the farmer can produce it relatively cheaper, as all know who know anything about it, and he can land it cheaper at tide-water market.

That shows the purchasing power of the agricultural products, and yet you gentlemen on that side of the House say our protective system has been oppressive to the farmer. In addition to what I have shown you about the purchasing power of wheat, corn, oats, &c., the farmers and gardeners to-day find ready market for their non-exportable articles, such as fruits, berries, and vegetables, amounting in the aggregate to many millions of money.

TARIFF BENEFITS THE LABORER.

And now, what has been the effect of the protective system upon the laboring classes in this country? There are now employed in the various manufacturing and mining industries about 4,000,000 of people, with their families, amounting to at least 12,000,000 more dependent upon them, or nearly one-third of our entire population depending upon the employment of the 4,000,000 of laboring men among us.

What I have said about the reduced cost of manufactured goods has been equally beneficial to the laboring classes; and while they have been compelled to pay a little more for provisions now than they did before the war, the enhanced price of their labor, together with the reduced cost of manufactures, is over 60 per cent. in their favor. Need I say that labor is 25 per cent. higher in this country to-day than it was before the war, and at least 50 per cent. higher than it is in England, the highest labor-paying country in the world, except the United States? So that when you add to this the reduced cost of manufactures and deduct the increased cost of provisions, you will see the laboring classes of this country are in much better condition than they were before the war, to say nothing of their superior condition over English labor. Do you want to reduce the price of labor to the European standard? If so, adopt free-trade, and in that event let us see what our laboring classes would receive; and first let us take the iron interests:

Edward Young, former Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, having gone abroad under the auspices of the Government to gather statistics of this character, made the following report:

Wages in rolling-mills.

Occupations.	Middlesborough, England.	Pennsylvania.
Puddlers	$10 50	$21 15
Top and bottom rollers	16 05	27 50
Rail-mill rollers	21 05	40 00
Merchant-mill rollers	12 10	36 83
Machinists	8 59	15 56
Engineers	8 47	15 24
Laborers	4 65	8 58
Iron molders	6 77	11 00
Pattern-makers	7 01	14 69

The report of the Tariff Commission gives the following comparative table of wages in the iron trade in England and in Pittsburgh, Pa.:

Occupation.	England.	Pittsburgh.
Puddling, per ton	$1 94	$5 50
Shingling, per ton	29	77
Rolling in puddling mills, per ton	29	68
Rolling and heating, per ton	1 80	4 80
Common labor	$0 56 to 72	$1 30 to 1 50

And here are prices paid for labor about two years ago, and which is substantially the same as now.

Schedule of wages paid per week in the United States and in Scotland, furnished by Messrs. J. and P. Coats, thread manufacturers.

Occupations.	In United States.	In Scotland.	Differences in favor of the United States.
Cop spoolers	$6 59	$3 40	$3.19, or 94 per cent.
Twister-tenders	5 69	2 25	$3.14, or 123 per cent.
Doffers	4 37	1 94	$2.43, or 125 per cent.
Cleaners	2 63	1 52	$1.11, or 73 per cent.
Reelers	7 88	3 52	$4.36, or 124 per cent.
Winders	7 25	2 80	$4.45, or 159 per cent.
Wrappers and boxers	7 96	3 04	$4.92, or 162 per cent.
Dyers	9 84	6 32	$3.52, or 56 per cent.
Bleachers—men	11 81	5 10	$6.71, or 132 per cent.
Bleachers—women	5 25	2 43	$2.82, or 116 per cent.
Mechanics	13 13	7 94	$5.19, or 65 per cent.
Firemen	10 66	5 83	$4.83, or 83 per cent.

The same condition of things exists in our woolen-mills and paper-mills, while the cost of living in this country is less than it is in any country in Europe. I will now give you the cost of living in the various countries of Europe and in the United States:

Many articles there named are cheaper in this country to-day than they were in 1878, as you who purchase them know.

Our consul stationed at Cologne, Germany, reports: Masons, per day, 70 cents; carpenters, per day, 50 to 72 cents; engine-fitters, per day, 71 to 77 cents; blacksmiths, per day, 67 to 71 cents. In this country the same mechanics get from $2.25 to $2.75 per day for the same kind of labor.

So that in every phase of the question the people of the United States are better off under our protective system than they were under the Walker revenue tariff, and infinitely better off than the people in any country in Europe. Then why disturb the tariff law enacted on the 3d of March, 1883. That law reduced the duties on imports many millions of dollars, and sufficient time has not yet elapsed since that law went into force for the country to be advised of its defects, and besides many of our industries are now suffering. But you propose to reduce the duties on every article alike 20 per cent. unless that rate of reduction goes below the duties imposed by the Morrill tariff of 1861, in which event the rates imposed by the act of 1861 are to govern, provided the rate does not exceed 50 per cent. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY] pointed out the difficulties in adjusting the duties under the two acts because of the different classifications and the specific and ad valorem rates, differing in the two acts, if this bill should become a law.

My objection to the bill is that it is in the direction of free trade, as announced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], both being free-traders and members of the Committee on Ways and Means, while the chairman of that committee [Mr. MORRISON] speaks of the bill as only partial relief.

The revenue can be materially reduced by reducing the duty on sugar one-half what it is now, and by placing on the free-list such articles of raw material as are not produced in this country and which enter into manufactures.

But it has been said that, abstractly considered, free trade is right. What is meant by that? Why, if the conditions are the same, if the proximity to raw material is the same, if the price of labor is the same, if the cost of living is the same, and all countries adopt it, then I grant you free trade is right; but in a nation of free people where the highest good to the greatest number is the desideratum, I can not consent to the doctrine of free trade. I believe that this country should legislate for itself with reference to its own internal affairs, and that where it can benefit its people by its legislation, independent of considerations abroad, we ought to do it.

PEOPLE OPPOSED TO FREE TRADE.

Who are the men that are clamoring for free trade? Is it the manufacturers, who employ more than 4,000,000 men, skilled and unskilled, representing with their families, as I have said, nearly one-third of our entire population? Is it the wool-growers of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and the great West and Northwest? Is it the 7,000,000 men engaged in agriculture? Is it the 4,000,000 laboring men who depend upon the manufacturing industries for their support? None of these were before the Committee of Ways and Means asking this reduction; but many were there opposing any reduction. The importers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia are anxious for this reduction; the theorists are anxious for it; but none are so anxious for it as England, and to my mind that is why the people of the United States who are engaged in manufacturing and agricultural pursuits should not want it. It is known by all the world that England wants the policy of free trade adopted in the United States. And why? Because it would result to her benefit; and if that be true it would necessarily be to the detriment of the people of this country, and for one I am opposed to building up England at the expense of this country.

Let the issue come. The Republican party is in favor of protection to our home industries. You are not, and we will meet you before the people on that issue and abide the decision at the ballot-box next November.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. TALBOTT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BAGLEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 8 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BUCHANAN: Petition of citizens of Grantville, Ga., praying for the passage of the Senate educational bill—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. CALDWELL: Papers relating to the claim of James M. Hinton—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COLLINS: Petition of James McDuffie & Stratton and all the other firms in Boston, Mass., dealing in earthenware, china, and glass, for a reduction of customs duties—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DIBBLE: Memorial of the mayor and aldermen and of leading citizens of the city of Charleston; also of leading citizens of Lexington County, South Carolina, in favor of national aid to education, &c.—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. GEORGE: Petition from citizens of the State of Oregon, asking for the passage of the Senate educational bill, 398—to the same committee.

By Mr. HAMMOND: Petition of H. A. Brad Weldon and others, citizens of Newton County, Georgia, in favor of aid to education—to the same committee.

By Mr. HUTCHINS: Petition of Merwin N. Jones and others, for the passage of a bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MCKINLEY: Petition of wool-growers of Ashland County, Ohio; also another petition of citizens of the same place, for the restoration of the wool tariff of 1867—severally to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAYBURY: Petition of James E. Grant, William H. Jahn, and many other citizens, of Detroit, Mich., relative to the Chinese restriction act—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MONEY: Memorial of the faculty and students of the University of Mississippi—to the Committee on Education.

Also, the petition of citizens of Mississippi, asking for national aid to education—to the same committee.

By Mr. PRYOR: Papers relating to the claim of Milton Williams—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RANNEY: Petition of Samuel Y. Chase and others, for increase of the pay of jurors in United States courts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SINGLETON: Petition of M. L. McRae and others, and of S. T. Taylor and others, in favor of the passage of the Senate educational bill—severally to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. STORM: Memorial of Jacob W. Parker praying to be allowed to purchase certain lots on Hot Springs reservation—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 2, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a telegraphic petition of F. N. Wicker, late collector of customs at Key West, Fla., praying for a thorough investigation of his alleged connection with Cuban filibusters; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of William M. Brooks, president of Tabor College, and 66 other citizens of Tabor, Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate providing for the return of so many of the Nez Percé Indians to their reservation in Idaho as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior may be safely returned; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of 39 ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Iowa, and a petition of Knox Center Post, No. 189, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the passage of an act granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to all honorably discharged soldiers of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON. I also present a petition of like character from members of Post No. 40, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, expressly mentioning the Sioux reservation about to be opened, and praying that it may be devoted to soldiers. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of General Howell Post, No. 31, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Jersey, of Woodbury, N. J., praying for the passage of certain legislation now pending in Congress in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of Pap Thomas Post, No. 121, Grand Army of the Republic, of Chesaning, Mich., and a petition of Wallace Browns Post, No. 190, Grand Army of the Republic, of Birch Run, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation embracing the recommendations of the general pensions committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARLEY presented a memorial of the Grape-Growers' Association of California, remonstrating against any reduction of tariff on wines and brandies, and favoring the restoration of the tariff on raisins; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented the petition of Augusta Brown, widow of Ditmere Brown, late private Company A, Thirty-eighth New Jersey Volunteers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of John W. Babbitt, John W. Sturtevant, and Joseph A. Leach, a committee representing John Sedgwick Post, No. 4, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Hampshire, Keene, N. H., praying for certain legislation embodying the recommendations of the pensions committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN presented a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, addressed to him, concerning the destruction of the records of the office of the United States surveyor-general and the United States land office at Olympia, Wash., on the 12th of September, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4713) requiring the governors of certain Territories to be residents of said Territories at least two years preceding appointment, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, the amendment proposing an appropriation for the encouragement and development of the raising of raw silk, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a memorial and joint resolution of the Eighth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming favoring additional compensation for the members thereof, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1184) for the relief of William P. Reid, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land

Claims to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 518) further defining the class of persons included in the provisions of section 5 of the act of July 17, 1854, amendatory of the Oregon donation law of September 27, 1850, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to whom appropriately it should have originally been sent.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 589) to carry out the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the payment of the Fourth Arkansas Mounted Infantry Volunteers," approved March 18, 1870, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. GARLAND. If the Senator would not object, I would be glad to have the bill placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, providing that the clerical force of the State Department be increased as follows: One clerk of class 4, one clerk of class 3, and one folder and packer; and presented a letter of the Secretary of State recommending the increase proposed.

The amendment and letter were ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 680) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within five miles of the town of Rulo, in the county of Richardson, in the State of Nebraska, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2140) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within five miles of the town of Rulo, in the county of Richardson, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 450) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State Iowa," to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to request the present consideration of that bill. It is a matter of local importance, and the parties want to begin the work.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is a House bill that is recommended favorably by the Senate Committee on Commerce, and it being an improvement of that character I ask the Senate to consider it now, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that this bill be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa," be amended by striking out of section 2 of said act the words "that the bridge shall be constructed with a suitable ponton draw of not less than five hundred feet in width, located over the main channel of the river," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "that the bridge shall be constructed with a ponton draw or draws of such length and location as shall be ordered by the Secretary of War:" Provided, That said draw or draws shall not be less than four hundred feet in length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. I would take occasion to state, if the Senator from Missouri desires any further explanation, that it is in accordance with the recommendation of the engineer in charge.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only wanted to hear the form of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire whether the bill means that each draw shall be four hundred feet in length, or whether all the draws which may be ordered by the Secretary of War shall aggregate four hundred feet? I am not sure from the reading of the bill what construction might be placed upon it.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is the principal draw in the bridge that is referred to as the 400-foot span. I will state to the Senate that there is a railroad bridge across the river at Dubuque, and this ponton bridge is to be built contiguous to the railroad bridge. The main span in the railroad bridge is, as stated by the engineer in charge, 400 feet; and the engineer in charge expresses the opinion that the draw in the ponton bridge should be of the same width as the draw in the railroad bridge; that any other width of the span would perhaps be an injury; so that the engineer in charge will direct that these spans shall be conformed to the draws in the railroad bridge. That is the object of changing the width of the span or permitting it to be changed below 500 feet, and the language "not less than 400 feet" is inserted in the bill in order to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. The intention of the bill is that the draw or draws, if there be two of them, shall be 400 feet each in length. That is the understanding that I have of the suggested plan; and if the language placed in the bill is not sufficient to carry out that idea it ought to be amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. Not less than 400 feet each.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, if there are two draws, it is not intended that there should be two draws of 200 feet each, or one of 150 and another of 250; but each shall be 400 feet.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McMILLAN subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 450) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa," was passed this morning, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote by which the bill was passed will be regarded as reconsidered.

The vote ordering the bill to a third reading was reconsidered, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 2141) to set aside the unsurveyed, overflowed, and marsh lands of Lake Saint Clair, State of Michigan, as a common preserve in perpetuity for the people of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 2142) to establish the rank of William B. Van Antwerp in the military service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2143) in relation to the United States Naval Observatory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2144) to open to homestead settlement certain portions of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 2146) granting a pension to Isabella Bullock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 2145) to extend an act approved August 8, 1882, to encourage and promote telegraph communication between America and Europe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MORRILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN ZONA LIBRE.

Mr. MORRILL offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish to the Senate a copy of the latest act or acts of the Republic of Mexico creating or modifying the Zona Libre in relation to importations of merchandise.

LANDING OF TELEGRAPH OCEAN CABLES.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to furnish the Senate with copies of all agreements heretofore made with any companies by which cables from foreign countries have been landed upon the shores of the United States, and whether any company is now negotiating for the privilege of landing any cables, and if so, upon what terms.

LAND ENTRIES BY FOREIGNERS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate if any, and what, action has been taken in regard to entries of public lands by the Estes Park Company, organized under the laws of Great Britain, and doing business in Colorado, and made in the interest of the Earl of Dunraven; the Arkansas Valley Land and Cattle Company, an English corporation; Sykes & Hughes, an English firm doing business in Northern Dakota; Faulkner, Bell & Co., another English firm doing business in California, or for the benefit of said corporations and companies, and which said entries by reports in the General Land Office are alleged to be fraudulent.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senate will indulge me a few moments in connection with the resolution, not only to show the importance of the resolution in itself but of other resolutions on kindred subjects, I desire to read a letter sent to the Department of the Interior and referred by the Department to the Committee on Public Lands in answer to a resolution of this body.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator also have read the extract from the report of the Land Office to which he refers, so that the Senate may have the evidence of the affirmation?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, I think I can get that in a moment. My object is to show the necessity of the passage of the resolution and of some affirmative and speedy action on the part of the Government not only to protect the public domain but to protect innocent parties, who are undoubtedly innocent, as it appears from this letter that these parties are innocent, and who are evidently inveigled into these schemes as to land and cattle, and in the end the Government of the United States will suffer in its credit and reputation by opening the door and giving an opportunity to persons to impose upon the credulity of other people. There is a necessity, as will appear from this letter, that something should be done promptly. The letter was written at Edinburgh, and I will read it to show the extent to which this thing is extending itself already:

"TAIT, DENMAN & CO., CATTLE RANCHE AND LAND BROKERS, 100 and 102 Broadway (3 doors from Wall st.), New York.

Agencies: Chicago, Ill.; St. Louis, Mo.; Kansas City, Mo.; Omaha, Nebr.; Cheyenne, Wyo.; Denver, Colo.; Dallas, Tex.; San Antonio, Tex.; Fort Worth, Tex. Correspondents throughout the States."

EDINBURGH, 5 QUEEN STREET, March 27, 1884.

To the Secretary of the Interior, Land Office Division, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: A cablegram which appeared a few days since in the London Times has caused considerable uneasiness among the Scotch companies holding large bodies of titled lands for pastoral purposes—

Mr. COCKRELL. "Of titled lands?"

Mr. VAN WYCK. "Titled lands." The firm evidently is writing in good faith.

and it has agitated in even a greater degree the companies who have purchased cattle and are now grazing them on the public lands with the view of eventually purchasing their pastures. The cablegram was as follows:

"The Senate has passed a resolution directing the Public Lands Committee to inquire in what manner large quantities of the public lands have been transferred to or become possessed by foreign corporations or syndicates, and what, if any, legislation is advisable to prevent such transfer or possession. This resolution is the outcome of criticism expressed in certain localities as to the proceedings of foreigners who are obtaining possession of vast tracts of new country in the Western and Southern States and Territories, some English, Scotch, and Dutch syndicates being particularly aimed at.

That is the cablegram to which the writer refers. Then he continues:

In reply to our inquiry Mr. Edmund J. Moffat, United States deputy consul-general (a gentleman highly esteemed in this country), expresses the opinion that "no law would be passed retroactive in its nature taking away the property acquired under the present state of the law." This seems only equitable, but the words "to prevent such transfer or possession" sounds very ominous to existing owners of large bodies of land.

These men presume that they are owners of the land which we have suffered to be fenced in as we have, to which the attention of the Senate has heretofore been called.

And meantime the trade in such lands is at a standstill.

Is at a standstill in Edinburgh.

Now, sir, we are as a firm identified solely with this land and cattle business, and people here rely a good deal upon what we say in that connection. We have all along recommended this class of investment, and the money sunk in it in Scotland alone is not less than $25,000,000. We are therefore most anxious to be favored with some expression of opinion as to the future intentions of the Legislature. We hear of Senator EDMUNDS's bill limiting foreign holdings to thirty square miles, and we dread Mr. EDMUNDS very much. Some of our companies own twenty times that area of American land. Are their rights to be menaced?

It is scarcely possible to be believed that in this country some of their companies own twenty times thirty square miles, the amount referred to in the bill.

Others again ranging on the public domain intend to purchase their pastures. Has the opportunity been barred by the Legislature? Texas has issued a whole sheaf of legislative enactments which impede and harass the land and cattle trade in a ruinous degree.

A whole sheaf of legislative enactments, and the land and cattle trade in Edinburgh is harassed by this sheaf of legislative enactments passed by Texas!

Are we (we are more American than English) to understand that the United States Government or the introducers of those bills are inimical to the acquisition of land by foreigners in any form beyond a certain amount?

They propound the question honestly and justly and properly, and it is the duty of the American Congress to answer the inquiry.

We have scarcely time to formulate our ideas before the mail goes out, but we are particularly solicitous of understanding if land and cattle companies are favored or objected to. We beg to inclose a copy of one of Mr. Tait's pamphlets on the question of land and cattle, a standard work here.

We have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

TAIT, DENMAN & CO.

That of itself shows the intent, it shows what is being done, and it shows the necessity of immediate action upon our part, when gentlemen will write in good faith honestly believing that they have acquired title to twenty times thirty square miles of land, one company who are investing their millions in this property in this country expecting, as they say, to be able to purchase their pasturage.

It is due to the American people that some action should be taken at once, and it is due to foreigners who are relying upon the honesty of the American character that some steps should be taken at once. So I have offered the resolution calling for this information, because the reports of special agents of the Land Office show that most of these entries of English companies to which I refer were fraudulent entries, and I desire to know what the Interior Department and the Land Office have done in regard to the matter, with a view that we may soon act intelligently on this matter, telling these gentlemen who write honestly and conscientiously, and Scotch, English, and Dutch syndicates, just what their rights are to be in this country, and that we do not intend that they shall purchase our public domain except in a limited amount, as our own citizens have a right to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 767) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress.

WILBUR F. M'DANIEL.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution reported by me from the Committee on Rules about one week ago, early action being very important at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the services of Wilbur F. McDaniel, provided for by Senate resolution of May 20, 1879, be terminated May 1, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the resolution be now considered.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not open to debate. The question is on agreeing to the motion to take up the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I shall have to ask for one amendment. The resolution reads:

That the services of Wilbur F. McDaniel, provided for by Senate resolution of May 20, 1879, be terminated May 1, 1884.

I ask to change the date, striking out the words "May 1" and inserting "May 5;" so as to read "be terminated May 5, 1884."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, the young man whose name it is proposed by the resolution to remove from the rolls of the employés of the Senate was originally appointed from the State of Maryland as a page. While serving the Senate in that capacity, as I learn from employés of this body, he was sent upon an errand by some Senator to the document-room and returning, instead of walking quietly down the stairs attempted to glide down by the banister. He fell upon his head, and sustained injuries the evil consequences of which have continued to develop ever since, until he has now become a mental if not a physical wreck.

Before the full extent of his injuries was apparent, upon the motion of a former distinguished Senator from Maryland, he was appointed a messenger to the Superintendent of the document-room with a salary not to exceed that paid to laborers upon the rolls of the Senate force. Since then his disability has increased to such an extent that he is now utterly incapacitated from rendering that or any other service.

Under these circumstances it is proposed to remove him from the rolls of our employés, and I think it is properly so proposed, for I do not believe that any one should be kept nominally in the employment of any branch of the Government who is unable to render any service whatever as an equivalent for the salary which he is supposed to earn. But while it is right that he should be so removed it is, under the generous precedents established by the Senate, but proper that he should not be thrown in his helplessness upon the cold charities of the world without some moderate provision being made for his support, at least for a time.

The Senate in a number of instances where employés in its service and in the line of their duty received serious disabilities or lost their lives has made provision, such as it deemed suitable, for them, or for their families. In the case of a former captain of the police force of the Capitol, who when attempting to make an arrest in this building received serious injury, the Senate voted $500 out of its contingent fund to reimburse him for his expenses and losses incident to that injury. In the case of another policeman who was permanently injured in this building, to such an extent that he was no longer fitted to discharge the duties of a Capitol policeman, the two Houses of Congress passed a joint resolution directing that he be placed as an extra member upon the force of the Capitol police, and that he be assigned to duty as a watchman in the Dome of the Capitol. In the case of two other employés, one of whom was seriously injured and the other of whom lost his life by an explosion of gas in a closet under one of the stairways of this building, the two Houses of Congress passed an act giving to the one $3,000 and to the family of the other a like sum. In view of these precedents, I think it is right that when this young man is being dismissed from the service, utterly helpless, some provision should be made for him.

It has been suggested to me by a distinguished Senator, to whom I often look for advice, and in whose opinions I usually coincide upon questions of this kind, that a distinction exists between the case of this young man and those that I have cited in this, that he was not in the strict line of his duty when attempting to slide down upon the banisters in coming from the document-room. But we should not apply to the conduct of boys those stern rules of decorum by which we regulate our own in mature life. We should make some allowance for the exuberance of youthful spirits, for the frolicksome disposition of boys, and we should remember that in the days long gone by few of us would have regarded it as a dereliction of duty if in returning promptly from some errand we had indulged in a boyish prank by the way. All that can be said against the conduct of this young man is, that instead of walking sedately down the steps when upon an errand as a page, he attempted to slide down the banister, and in consequence received injuries which have blighted his whole life since, and will continue to blight it until its close.

I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment, which proposes to make a slight allowance to this young man while dismissing him from service. The gentleman whom I have named in my amendment to act as trustee for the unfortunate young man is his uncle, and is an Episcopal clergyman of prominence and of high character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

And the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, for the aid and support of the said Wilbur F. McDaniel, who was disabled for life while in the service of the Senate as a page, the sum of $750, to be paid to the Rev. Wilbur F. Watkins, of New York city, in trust for the above-mentioned purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Rules when this accident occurred, how long this page has been in the employ of the Senate without being able to render any service, and how much the Senate has really done for him in that way. I do not know that I have the information.

Mr. FRYE. The accident occurred in 1879, and on May 20, 1879, the United States Senate passed a resolution appointing him a messenger. He was able to do some work for some three years. For the last year and a half he has been entirely disabled, in fact is idiotic, and the Government has paid him $720 a year under the Senate resolution, and that $720 a year for a year and two-thirds has had no consideration whatever except the boy's unfortunate condition. Mr. Amzi Smith, to whom he was made messenger and who needs a messenger exceedingly and must have one, brought the matter to the attention of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who referred it to the Senate. There is no question that the resolution which the committee reported should be adopted, and that Mr. Smith, the superintendent of the document-room, should have very promptly an able-bodied messenger in the place of this unfortunate boy.

As to the amendment, I do not feel like making any special opposition to it. The boy's father and mother are poor, the boy is an idiot, and he depends entirely for his support upon them. If the Senate in its generosity can give what the Senator from Maryland asks, I certainly, for one, have no objection. He has been presented already with at least $1,500, and certainly the Senate can not afford to go on and pension the boy at the rate of $720 a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 14.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the amendment is insisted on we had better have the yeas and nays. They will settle it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRYE. Now, I should like to have the amendment read once more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sawyer,
Call,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sewell,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,	Vance,
Fair,	Lamar,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Garland,	Lapham,	Palmer,	Williams.
Groome,	Manderson,	Pike,
Hampton,	Maxey,	Ransom,

NAYS—17.

Beck,	Dolph,	Platt,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Edmunds,	Plumb,	Wilson.
Cockrell,	Farley,	Pugh,
Coke,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Conger,	Hoar,	Van Wyck,

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	Colquitt,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Allison,	Dawes,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,
Anthony,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,
Blair,	George,	Kenna,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Logan,	Slater,
Brown,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Walker.
Butler,	Hale,	McPherson,
Camden,	Hawley,	Mahone,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the present condition of the resolution the twenty-fifth rule requires that it shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it is so referred.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule. Order of Business 272, being the bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., was agreed to be passed over until next Monday. Order of Business 287, being the bill (S. 1017) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, was also, by unanimous consent, as the Chair understands, agreed to be passed over.

Order of Business 291, being the bill (S. 764) granting an increase of pension to Abby P. Arnold, the Chair understands was to be passed over until the return of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Order of Business 292 will now be read.

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1333) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. That bill was passed over the other day and sent, without a technical reference, to the Committee on Territories. That committee considered the bill this morning, and I am instructed by the committee to say that it is not possible to discuss it under the five-minute rule, and therefore I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being objected to, goes over.

TRUSTEES OF ISAAC R. TRIMBLE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 91) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble.

Mr. CONGER. Does that bill come up under this order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The bill is first on the Calendar under Rule VIII. It comes up because of its position on the Calendar, and the question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it comes up subject to the five-minute limitation of debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was relieved from the rule confining debate to five minutes by the vote of yesterday morning, its consideration having been objected to and the Senate having then voted to proceed to its consideration notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. CONGER. Does that bill hold its place here under Rule VIII, or under the special order of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote of the Senate opens the field of debate as on any other bill, independent of Rule VIII.

Mr. CONGER. That is a special order and should come up under the rule as to special orders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not come up under the order of unfinished business. It holds its place under Rule VIII, but relieved from the limitation as to debate imposed by that rule. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, there was some dispute about the time of the assignment in this case and I want to call the attention of the Senate to some dates. The assignment mentioned in this report was made May 30, 1861. The President's proclamation declaring war was April 16, 1861, more than a month before this assignment and while many people in Maryland at least were in a condition of belligerency. The troops coming to Washington were assailed in Baltimore, April 19, 1861, more than a month before this assignment. Before this assignment as I have information—the evidence is not yet obtainable, but I think it can be obtained—General Trimble was engaged in breaking up railroads leading to Baltimore, preventing the Baltimore and Ohio cars from bringing troops to Washington for the defense of the capital; and before he made the assignment, before he made this transfer, General Butler's troops were taken down the Chesapeake from Perryville because they could not pass through the line of road which General Trimble was breaking up and retarding, and passed down the Chesapeake on boats to Annapolis. It was not until General Butler had passed from Annapolis to the Relay House and made his night march from there to Federal Hill, which commanded Baltimore, that General Trimble, accompanied by his attorney who appears here of record, Mr. Wallis, who was then a member of the Legislature of Maryland which to avoid Federal interference assembled at Frederick, left the place of their opposition to the Government of the United States and for safety went South.

All these things occurred, all this open hostility, all this breaking of railroads against the coming of United States troops to the defense of Washington under the direction of General Trimble, before he made this assignment of his property, for whatever purpose it was made, and having made the assignment, having been overcome by the troops of the United States, Baltimore being occupied by General Butler from Federal Hill, General Trimble made an assignment of his property and went and joined his personal fortunes where had been his sympathies, with the confederates.

It has been said by some gentleman here who ought to be familiar with this matter that his debts and obligations for which the trustees were appointed have been satisfied and paid. If that be so, these trustees have no right to receive any money that might be coming from the United States or from any source whatever as debts. At any rate, I understand they are dead, and there are now no trustees to take if there was anything to take or anybody to give.

I have stated these things so that Senators may act advisedly when they vote to send to the Court of Claims this original bill, bristling all over with hostility and treason to the United States, for the benefit of a man who was a leader in disloyalty to his country to enable him to get pay for property of the same kind as that which he was at the time engaged in destroying to the injury and wrong of the United States all along the railroads North and South. Having made these remarks I shall go no further.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from Michigan has stated as to the acts of General Trimble preceding the date of the assignment, May 30, 1861, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] yesterday placed in the RECORD the statement that the assignment was made—

Before General Trimble became connected with the Southern confederacy, when he was a citizen of Maryland, and so far as known within the law he was a loyal citizen of the United States.

Again, the judge-advocate of the United States Army who examined this case, Henry Goodfellow, under date of July, 1876, says:

January 23, 1874, the claim was again presented in the name of Mrs. Ann C. Trimble and Miss Georgianna Presstman, who claimed under and by virtue of a "deed of trust" from Mr. Trimble, made May 30, 1861, before his disloyal career.

The assignment was made May 30, 1861. In the decision in Railroad Company vs. Trimble, 10 Wallace, Mr. Justice Swayne, who rendered the opinion of the court, gives the date of the deed of Isaac R. Trimble as May 30, 1861. So there can be no mistake as to the date of that deed, nor on the testimony before us can there be any mistake that at the time Mr. Trimble made that deed he had in no wise connected himself with the confederacy or rendered any act of aid or comfort thereto. But the impression was attempted to be made yesterday that because Mr. Trimble subsequently to May 30, 1861, joined the confederacy and shortly thereafter, therefore there must have been a hostile intent. I endeavored to make the point yesterday that if the deed was made in good faith on the 30th of May, 1861, it carried with it all the title which Trimble had and vested it in his trustees, and that a court of judicature, the district court of the United States for Maryland, had so decided upon the facts and upon appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, the court of last resort had affirmed that decision; and I assumed that this judicial investigation made into all the facts was better evidence than could be had now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Texas will allow me to call his attention to the case decided by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court did not pass upon the validity of this deed of trust, as it is termed. That was passed upon in the court below, perhaps so far as its execution was concerned as a matter of fact, and the Supreme Court of the United States did not pass upon the deed at all in the case before it. It assumed the facts from the finding of the court below, and the only questions decided by the Supreme Court of the United States were that the conveyance which was claimed by Trimble's partner was not valid and that the title to the patent was in Trimble, but it does not appear in the record of the case in the Supreme Court, nor does it appear in the report of the Senate committee whether in fact Trimble had a title to this patent for the territory of the District of Columbia or the State of Virginia. There is no reference to that question at all.

It appears that there was a conveyance from Howe, the original patentee, to Trimble, but it was for certain territory. What territory does not appear in the report of the case contained in the authority referred to by the Senator from Texas, nor does it appear in the report made to the Senate by the Committee on Military Affairs. So far as that is concerned we know nothing as to the fact of Trimble's title to this patent within the territory of the District of Columbia or the State of Virginia where this bridge was used by the War Department.

Mr. MAXEY. Now let us look at the case simply as a naked, cold proposition of law. The trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, who are the claimants here, instituted their suit in the district court of Maryland against a certain railroad company for the purpose of recovering from that company the royalty to which they were entitled or claimed themselves to be entitled to by reason of the use by that company of the Howe truss claimed by these trustees to be theirs. The railroad defendant set up a deed which had been executed but which had never been carried into effect, to a man whose name I think was Scott. The Supreme Court examining that deed said it was an utter nullity, that Scott never having in any manner complied with any of its terms, having abandoned his contract, it left the title where it had been, in Trimble; and mark you that was before Trimble's assignment to these trustees; and then the court go on to say:

The deed of Isaac R. Trimble, of the 30th of May, 1861, conveyed all his rights under the patent, whatever they may have been, to the grantees in that instrument. If his title was sufficient theirs is so. This was not controverted by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and needs no further remark.

So the case went in favor of the trustees of Trimble. It came to the Supreme Court of the United States and was there affirmed. That is the state of the case, as I understand it.

Now I want to go further. Let us see what the question was; and certainly in this matter any one who will take the trouble to read these reports will see that there was a very thorough investigation by Mr. Goodfellow of all the facts, and then when it went to the Treasury Department here was the point made there:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
December 19, 1878.

It is not contended that any contract, arrangement, or understanding was entered into on the part of the United States to secure the right to use the patent. The claim is therefore a claim for damages for alleged invasion of a patent right. Of such claims the accounting officers of the Treasury have no jurisdiction.

For want of jurisdiction the claim is disallowed.

What jurisdiction? Why, that in the nature of the claim, as Mr. Gangewer, the acting Third Auditor, understood it, it was not a claim upon a contract, but was a claim for the use without authority of a patent right, an invasion of that patent right, and therefore the claim was a claim for damages, and being an unliquidated claim for damages was not within the power of the Treasury Department. That was the cause of its rejection:

For want of jurisdiction the claim is disallowed.

Disallowed why? Because they regarded it as a claim for damages, and not a claim ex contractu. That was the point they made. On that Mr. McCrary, then Secretary of War, and for whose legal opinion I have the highest respect, says in a letter dated December 9, 1879:

The papers in the claim of the trustees of I. R. Trimble, of Baltimore, Md., for the use by the United States of a patented improvement described as "Howe's patent truss" for bridges, are, at the solicitation of claimant's counsel, respectfully returned to the accounting officers of the Treasury with a recommendation for reconsideration.

That was after the Third Auditor had placed his rejection on the ground that the claim was for damages instead of a claim under contract. Then Mr. McCrary adds:

The claimant's counsel contend that it could not have been the intention of this Government to use the patent right in question without an implied engagement to pay for such use. This view entirely commends it to my judgment, but I must leave to the accounting officers the question of law whether the executive branch of the Government can now adjust this claim.

He says that it could not have been the intention of the Government to use the patent right in question without an implied engagement to pay for such use, and that that view entirely commends itself to his judgment, as it does to mine. In the decision of the Supreme Court they say that the entire use of the patent, the entire right of Mr. Trimble in the Howe patent truss passed to and vested in the trustees. Therefore the point in regard to the right in the District of Columbia is a new one that I never heard of before. If the entire right did pass, it devolves on those who dispute the right in the District of Columbia to show that there were exceptions in the deed which excepted the District of Columbia, but a general transfer of a patent right carries with it necessarily the entire right which the United States may confer upon the patentee by reason of its having conveyed to him the patent right. That seems to me clear.

Something has been said about the disloyalty of General Trimble. What on earth has the disloyalty of General Trimble to do with this case? If the deed was made in good faith to the trustees, then the disloyalty or loyalty of General Trimble neither makes this case worse nor better. The loyalty or disloyalty of the trustees might be a question that might be considered, and that has been passed upon.

Mr. MCMILLAN. They are both dead, as I understand, and the whole interest in this claim will go to General Trimble himself.

Mr. GROOME. No.

Mr. MAXEY. I understand that both the trustees are dead; but if the Senator will observe the bill, it is a bill for the benefit of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, and I have never known where a trust died for want of a trustee, and the courts so far as that is concerned will make trustees for the purpose of executing the trust. There is no point in that.

But it is said that Mr. Trimble will get some benefit from this. The report of the quartermaster, Mr. Ludington, says that "this deed transferred all his property on the following trusts," and the Supreme Court say that by virtue of this deed his entire right to the Howe truss passed. For what purposes? What were the trusts?

First, to pay all his debts; then to hold for the use and benefit of Mrs. Trimble; and thirdly, to convey to her appointees.

First, to pay all his debts, and the loyalty of his trustees has been proved by testimony which the Senator from Maryland says is incontrovertible. I am not acquainted with Mr. J. Morrison Harris, but I have no doubt of the absolute truth of the statement of the Senator from Maryland that he is a loyal Union man, has been always true and his word is as good as anybody's. He vouches for the loyalty of the trustees. The judge-advocate's report shows that the creditors filed their claims and their loyalty was established by good and credible witnesses of the city of Baltimore and State of Maryland, and the creditors are the persons to be paid. Then you have the statement of the Senator from Maryland, supplemented by that of the Senator from Delaware, that General Trimble was involved, and that the amount of this claim, which is a small one at best, is nothing like sufficient to pay the creditors, and as the creditors have to be paid first before anybody else can receive anything and as there is not enough to pay the creditors, I think this objection is carrying it down very low, to a remote cause that does not count in law.

I have said all I care to say.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, the course of discussion on this bill yesterday and to-day would indicate to any Senator who had not examined the case that the committee of the Senate, to whom in the last and in the present Congress this matter has been referred, had not examined into and ascertained the facts upon which the bill is based. The bill proposes to refer to the Court of Claims the claim of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble for the use of the Howe patent truss by the Government of the United States in the construction of the bridge over the Potomac River.

Most of the facts upon which this claim is based are clear and incontestable. There is no dispute whatever as to the validity of the patent of the Howe truss. There is no dispute whatever that prior to May 30, 1861, Isaac R. Trimble was the owner of that patent as to the State of Maryland and other adjacent territory, part of it being the District of Columbia. There is no dispute that upon May 30, 1861, Isaac R. Trimble made a valid deed of assignment of all his property to his wife and her sister as trustees, first for the benefit of his creditors, and then to hold for the use and benefit of his wife, with power in her to convey to her appointees.

This has been fully settled by the decision not only of the United States district court of Maryland, but in a contested case by the Supreme Court of the United States; and the Senator from Minnesota is wrong in saying that the validity of this deed has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case in 10 Wallace, which was quoted yesterday and again to-day, the prayer to the court, upon which the plaintiffs were allowed to recover, required that the jury should find that the deed of May 30, 1861, was duly executed, delivered, and recorded. Unless the jury so found the plaintiffs could not recover; and the jury did so find, and the plaintiffs recovered judgment against the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company.

Mr. MAXEY. Allow me to state one point. The railroad company being the defendant in fact, if these trustees had not been entitled to the judgment, would it not have been the policy of any good lawyer acting for the railroad to raise that point?

Mr. GROOME. That goes without saying.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Maryland will permit me to interrupt him, that was in the court below, and was the instruction given by the court below to the jury; and the question was assumed of course in the Supreme Court on the appeal there. The Supreme Court did not pass upon the validity of that deed.

Mr. GROOME. The questions of fact are always decided in the United States courts in the court below. The execution, delivery, recording of the deed of May 30, 1881, were facts which the court below said it was absolutely essential to establish in order that there should be a finding for the plaintiffs, and the jury did find for the paintiffs, and no attempt was made in the Supreme Court of the United States to except to the correctness of that finding so far as the establishment of those facts was concerned. The attempt of the counsel for the railroad company in the Supreme Court to reverse the decision of the court below was made upon other grounds. So the validity of this deed was absolutely established in that suit as between the parties to it. By the letter of the judge-advocate, contained in the report, it also appears that the validity of said deed was recognized in the case of the United States vs. The Real Estate of Isaac R. Trimble.

We see also by this report that it was established in what appears to be another proceeding in the United States district court of Maryland; and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] informed us yesterday in his remarks that its validity was attacked in a court in Delaware and that its bona fides was fully established by that court. So then there is no possible question as to the bona fides of this deed; which, as the Supreme Court say expressly, in the case in 10 Wallace, by its phraseology conveyed not only all the other property of Isaac R. Trimble, but conveyed his interest in this patent to the trustees named in the deed, who were his wife and his wife's sister, for the benefit of his creditors, as already stated.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him whether it could have been possible in either of the cases to which he refers that the particular matter affecting the bona fides of this assignment which has been mentioned in this debate could have been tried at all? Those were suits against individual users of this patent. How could they set up the defense which has been suggested here that this transfer was made by General Trimble with a view to going into the confederate army, renouncing his allegiance, taking up arms against the country, and as a mere cover to protect his property? An individual user could not have made that defense.

Mr. GROOME. Unless the parties plaintiff in that case had a title to the patent they could not have recovered in the Supreme Court of the United States, and they did recover as the owners of the patent.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will permit me to say that while the loyalty or disloyalty of Mr. Trimble was not a question before the court, the validity of the deed of assignment was the essential question before the court, for had it not been good the trustees had no standing in court.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, but it is one question whether it might not be good against the railroad company that was sued, and quite another question whether when they come to appeal to the grace of this Government to pay, the relations of the claimant were such to the Government as ought to justify us in paying.

Mr. GROOME. The claimant in this case, the Senator from Indiana seems to forget, is not Isaac R. Trimble. If Isaac R. Trimble had been the owner of this patent at the time that he joined his fortunes with those of the Confederate States or at any time thereafter during the war, the Government might if it had been so disposed by appropriate proceedings have confiscated not only the patent right but all his earnings under that patent right; but having failed to do so in flagrante bello the right ceased under the law of nations after peace had returned to our land, although the Government might practically still have arrived at the same result so far as any earnings for the use of the patent right by the Government were concerned, by refusing to recognize any right on his part to assert a claim for such use, because of his disloyalty.

But it is too plain for controversy, as I have already said, that Isaac R. Trimble was not the owner of the patent at that time. Being in insolvent circumstances, as the Senator from Delaware has stated was the case, to his personal knowledge, in May, 1861, he transferred all his property of every kind and every description to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, as an honest man under those circumstances should have done; and if, being in desperate financial straits, he afterward attempted to better his fortunes by going into the army of the confederacy, that fact can not be used to the prejudice of any prior grantee of his. There is no plainer and better settled principle of law than that the grantor by no act of his subsequent to the grant can impair or prejudice the title which he has conveyed to his grantee.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I understand that Mrs. Trimble is dead.

Mr. GROOME. Such is the fact, as I heard yesterday for the first time.

Mr. WILSON. If that were not the case, can the Senator state to what extent she would have been interested in whatever might be recovered on the adjustment of this claim?

Mr. GROOME. I can not state accurately, but I can state this, that it appears distinctly from these papers that there were a considerable number of claims against the estate of Isaac R. Trimble which were presented to the proper Department here for payment, under this deed of trust. Of one of these claims, and of only one, is the amount stated in this report, and that claim is $9,000. Assuming for the sake of argument that that is the only claim against Isaac R. Trimble which is payable under this deed of trust, then his wife would have been entitled to one-fifth of the dividend upon that claim. That is the extent of her right.

Mr. WILSON. That being the case, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland this question: Does not Isaac R. Trimble succeed on the death of his wife to more or less of the interest which she would have had in this claim, were she now living?

Mr. GROOME. That question I am unable to answer, for this reason: The law of Maryland (except, I believe, in cases where his marital right had attached before 1861) authorizes a married woman by her last will and testament to deprive her husband, against his consent, of any interest in her separate estate, if she chooses so to do. In the excepted cases she can only do so where his consent is subscribed to the will. But this very deed of trust which we are considering gives her the power to designate by appointment any one to receive any interest that she might take under the deed of trust. These things being so, and having no information whether or not Mrs. Trimble made a will or exercised her power of appointment, it is impossible for me to say whether or not Isaac R. Trimble will receive any part of this money; but it is perfectly apparent that he could only receive the one-fifth even on the assumption that the $9,000 claim is the only one against the trust estate.

Mr. WILSON. Then, Mr. President, we have arrived at this feature of the case, that at least it is doubtful whether Isaac R. Trimble——

Mr. HOAR. Does it appear that he was insolvent when he made the deed of trust?

Mr. WILSON. I am not aware as to that. We have arrived at this point, that at least it is doubtful whether or not Isaac R. Trimble is a party in interest in this claim as it now exists. We can not determine that. But suppose he is a party in interest by succession from the estate of his wife; if he could go to the Court of Claims under existing law, he would be required to establish his loyalty to the Government before he would be entitled to recover judgment in that court; but this bill proposes to send him there with the status of a loyal claimant, because under the operation of the bill reported by the committee he goes there without the necessity of proving loyalty to the Government. That will be the effect of this bill if Congress shall pass it and send the claim to the Court of Claims under its operation.

Mr. GROOME. In answer to what the Senator from Iowa has said, I wish to say, although it is but a repetition of what was said yesterday, that the loyalty of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of the proper officer of the War Department and by testimony of the highest character. Mr. J. Morrison Harris, a former member of Congress from our State, and who received the solid vote of the Republican party in Maryland in 1875 as a candidate for governor, has vouched for that loyalty to the best of his knowledge and belief, and the judge-advocate has treated the proof upon that point as complete.

The case presented then is this: that these trustees were perfectly loyal parties; that they were entitled up to the moment of their death to receive this money from the Government of the United States, and as they were entitled to receive it they had as perfect a right to transfer any interest they had in it as any other citizens of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. GROOME. I should like to conclude this point.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. GROOME. There is no principle of law, I take it, better established than that a grantor can convey to his grantee as good a title as he possesses, and it would be extremely unbecoming in the Government of the United States where non-combatant women had a perfectly valid title against the United States to compensation for the use of a patent which belonged to them in trust, to refuse to pay that debt because those ladies or one of them chose (if such be the fact) to transfer, by last will or otherwise, her interest therein eighteen years after the war to a person who was once disloyal.

Mr. WILSON. Now, if the Senator will allow me, if Isaac R. Trimble has succeeded to anything in this case it is not to definite property nor to a sum of money in kind, but to a claim against the Government, which the Government in its grace may allow or not. It is not a thing in possession, nor a thing that can be enforced without permission of the Government. Consequently it is in the nature of a claim. In order to enforce that claim or any other similar claim it would be necessary for Mr. Trimble to prove his loyalty to the Government in a proceeding in the Court of Claims; but that is to be avoided by the terms of the pending bill by sending him there with a clean record so far as loyalty or disloyalty is concerned. As the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, the assignment of a claim against the Government is void by our present law, and we have got to relieve it of that character, as we should by implication by the passage of such a bill as this.

Now, sir, inasmuch as it is a claim and inasmuch as it can not be assigned under existing law, but must go to the Court of Claims for allowance unless Congress shall allow it otherwise, it would be necessary for the claimant to prove his loyalty to the Government, and it is here admitted that he was not loyal. In order to avoid the force of that position this bill is in such shape that it proposes to send him to the Court of Claims as though he had always been a loyal man. That question does not go to the court for its investigation and determination.

Mr. GROOME. The bill does not propose to send General Trimble to the Court of Claims or anywhere else. It proposes to send the trustees, who derived their title before General Trimble entered the confederate service, to the Court of Claims to establish a claim which is believed to be a perfectly valid one, and when their loyalty is fully established. General Trimble has no claim against the Government which existed at the time of the war. His only claim, if he has any at all—and about that we have no knowledge whatever, and are discussing in the dark, comes from the fact that his wife made or did not make an appointment under this deed of her interest in this estate when she died a few months ago. Any title he has is derived from her. Her title was perfectly good as against the United States, and it would be a very inequitable defense if they would attempt to make the title which she has conveyed to him less valid than the one she possessed at the time of the conveyance, if we assume that she made one.

Technically the Senator from Iowa is right when he says that an assignment of a claim against the United States is void; but this is no such assignment as is contemplated by the law. It is a devolution upon him by the death of one of the trustees of her interest in the estate, if she made the appointment in his favor, which it is assumed in this debate she did.

But criticism has been made upon the fact that Mr. Trimble is alleged to have made this claim in his own name in the year 1873. I think there must be some error as to his intention to be understood as making the claim in his own right. He certainly could not have expected for one moment to receive in his own right this money from the Government of the United States. The case in 10 Wallace shows plainly that litigation had occurred before that in the district court of Maryland, in which the deed of trust was set up and sustained as a valid instrument, and which had ended in December, 1870, and that in that case Isaac R. Trimble was a nominal plaintiff in conjunction with the two trustees. In view of that fact it seems to me inconceivable that he could have intended to assert this claim in the Department at Washington in his own right. But whether he did so intend or not he could not by so doing prejudice the rights of those to whom he had already granted the interest he had before the war in this patent.

There are other things I should like to say. For example, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that as a Senator from Maryland I never knew——

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question of fact before he sits down, for the better understanding of the case? I desire to ask the Senator what this claim is for. It is said in the report that it is for the use of this patent in the years 1860 and 1861, or the use of the right under the patent. Now, is it a claim for the infringement of the patent under the assignment to the trustees, or for the infringement of the patent before the assignment to the trustees?

Mr. GROOME. It is a claim, as I understand it, for the use of the patent after it was assigned to the trustees?

Mr. HOAR. How could they have a claim for use in 1860 when they did not get the assignment until May, 1861?

Mr. GROOME. The report states that it was in 1861 and 1862, as you will see.

Mr. HOAR. No; 1860 and 1861; the second sentence of the report.

Mr. GROOME. 1861 and 1862, the second sentence of the report says.

Mr. HOAR. It is not so here.

Mr. GROOME. It is so in the copy I hold in my hand—

This is a claim heretofore stated at $6,081.88 for royalty on the Howe truss-bridge built over the Potomac River in 1861-'62, being a part of the "Long Bridge."

Mr. HOAR. I know; but just read the first sentence above there, beginning

The trustees of Isaac R. Trimble.

Mr. GROOME. I see now; but that is the statement of the committee. I look to the letter of the official of the War Department in which he states the facts, and from which the committee got their information.

Mr. HOAR. Which is true?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is not the statement of the committee. That is a copy of a communication signed by Henry Goodfellow, judge-advocate. The committee, however, states that it was in the years 1860 and 1861.

Mr. GROOME. The committee had the official papers as furnished by the War Department. Those official papers give them their information of facts. The very paper to which they must have looked for their facts states that this work was done in 1861 and 1862. That is all I know about it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The bridge was not built until after the war began in 1861, or at least that part of it to which this patent truss was applied.

Mr. GROOME. I understand it was built during the war. I will only add one remark, that the Senator from Michigan is in error in supposing that Hon. S. T. Wallis ever went South during the war. He went North on compulsion, being sent to one of the forts of our country on the vague charge of disloyalty after the Maryland house of delegates, of which he was a member, had voted by an overwhelming majority that it had no right to pass an ordinance of secession.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is very important to settle whether this committee are right in their facts. They report as their finding:

The trustees of Isaac R. Trimble claim that the United States are indebted to them for the use of Howe's patent truss in the construction of the Long Bridge over the Potomac River, at this city, in the years 1860-'61.

It is true that in one of the letters from the War Department the date is spoken of as 1861-'62. It does not appear what part of 1861, whether before or after the deed of assignment, which was at the end of May, 1861, when five months of the year had expired. Here is the petition and claim of the trustees themselves, signed by these ladies, Ann C. Trimble and Georgianna Presstman:

Petition and claim of the trustees of I. R. Trimble for the use of Howe's patent truss in the construction of the Long Bridge over the Potomac River at Washington city, D. C., in 1860-'61.

This is on the third page of the report, so that it comes as a claim stated by the claimants to have accrued in those years. It is reported by the committee to have accrued in those years, and although the letter of the Secretary of War states that it accrued in 1861-'62, it does not show whether any of it, and if so how much of it, accrued before May 30, 1861, if we were to take that as the correct date.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I wish to say that he will find the report of M. I. Ludington, quartermaster United States Army, dated April 25, 1873, who says:

Case of I. R. Trimble, for patent fees on Howe truss spans in Long Bridge over Potomac River, erected under the supervision of General McCallum, 1861, as per items enumerated, $3,535.96.

Mr. HOAR. What time? That is a very long document. In what part of it is this statement?

Mr. MAXEY. I will show it to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I have seen that; it is the same thing; I just quoted that.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator will refer to page 3976 of the RECORD he will find a paragraph in a letter from Ludington in which he says:

I find that $20,000 was appropriated for the repair of Long Bridge August 6, 1861 (volume 12, page 327), and the money was expended by B. B. French, then Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MAXEY. That is in the same letter of April 25, 1873.

Mr. HOAR. It is very important that we should be sure of that, because if this is a claim any portion of which originally vested in Trimble himself, its assignment to anybody is expressly prohibited by law. A statute passed in 1846, and amended in 1853, provides—

That all transfers and assignments hereafter made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless the same shall be freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof.

This case would come within that statute if any part of the claim was an original claim of Trimble. We must be asked, in order to give authority for its payment, to ratify in behalf of the assignor, who could not prosecute the claim in his own name if he had not assigned it under the existing law, a void assignment to the benefits of which he has wholly or in part now succeeded, which would be a fatal objection. It would also be a fatal objection as the statute is drawn in the Court of Claims, because that only authorized the claim of the trustees to be settled. If, however, this report by the committee is an inadvertent one in regard to the matter of the date, and if the statement of the claim also is an inadvertent one in regard to the matter of the date made by the claimants themselves, and this is a claim simply which accrued to the trustees to whom the patent had been assigned after the assignment by reason of the infringement of a patent which was their property, it presents a very different case, and a very different case from the one which has been discussed.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HOAR. I yield the floor.

Mr. HAMPTON. The Senator makes the point that this truss was used before the assignment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I merely put a question, and will state it again. The committee say in the very first sentence of their report, with the exception of a single line, that this accrued in 1860 and 1861, and the claimants, whose petition is set forth at the bottom of the third page of the report, say that it accrued in 1860 and 1861. Trimble did not make his assignment until the 30th of May, 1861. Then if that be true the claim vested in Trimble before the assignment as a claim against the United States, and under the law he could not lawfully assign it to anybody; and by this bill the Court of Claims would either be obliged to say so, or if this bill was treated as validating and confirming that assignment, then it would have the effect of confirming an assignment which was void in law, not for the benefit of the assignee, but for the benefit of the assignor who has succeeded to the right under it, in whole or in part.

If, on the other hand, the statement of the officer of the War Department that it accrued in 1861 and 1862 is to be taken as a fact, so that a portion of it certainly accrued, if not the whole, after the 30th of May, 1861; then it seems to me that it meets all the objections which have been raised in debate, including the objections which I raised yesterday; because if a person who afterward went into the rebel army made an assignment of a patent right under which there was no claim against the Government or anybody, and his trustees and creditors, being then loyal persons, acquired a claim against the Government by reason of the Government's infringement, it would seem to me that the mere fact that the person who engaged in rebellion inherited that claim afterward from his wife is no reason why we should not pay it. We never have adopted the policy that we would prohibit a person who went into the rebellion from afterward inheriting property, whether a claim against the Government or anybody else, from a loyal person. So it seems to me that fact is a turning point in the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I have here in this report Mr. Trimble's own statement, which for this purpose I take to be correct:

On the other hand, Mr. Trimble presented statement of the account June 23, 1876, which is rather larger than the original statement of the Quartermaster-General. Mr. Trimble's statement is $3,932. He further states that in similar cases those who use the patent without leave have been charged with royalty and interest. He therefore adds $2,830 interest to February 7, 1873; total, $6,762.

* * * * * * *

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, February 23, 1882.

Extract copy of paper on file with claim No. 50688.

A. M. GANGEWER,
Deputy Third Auditor.

The claim $6,081.88, being	$3,535 96
With interest from 1861 to February, 1873, twelve years	2,545 92
	6,081 88

So his claim commenced running February, 1861.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Senator from Missouri will allow me to add one sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. This claim, as presented by Mr. Trimble himself, included interest for twelve years up to February, 1873. That twelve years, by his own statement, commenced February, 1861, before any of these transactions. It is repeated again here. The claim was referred to Quartermaster M. I. Ludington, and he says:

BARRACK AND QUARTERS BRANCH,
Quartermaster-General's Office, April 25, 1873.

Case of I. R. Trimble, for patent fees on Howe truss spans in Long Bridge over Potomac River, erected under the supervision of General McCallum, 1861, as per items enumerated	$3,535 96
Interest to February, 1873 (twelve years)	2,545 92
Total	6,081 88

That is the claim that Mr. Trimble himself presented in his own name which was rejected. If he can not be bound by what he says himself it is because he is unworthy of credit with this body.

Mr. GROOME. With the consent of the Senator from Missouri I should like, through the Chair, to inquire whether any other Senator desires to be heard upon the Trimble bill, and, if not, I should like to ask that the pending order be laid aside informally long enough to allow a yea-and-nay vote to be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland desires to know if the debate upon the Trimble bill has been closed, in order that he may ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business until the vote can be taken upon the bill.

Mr. CONGER. It has not quite closed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The debate is not closed.

Mr. GROOME. Then I do not desire to make the request.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Before the Senator from Missouri proceeds with his remarks, I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the shipping bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield the floor for the purpose indicated?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I send up my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be read for information and printed, if desired; but the amendment of the Senator from Missouri has not yet been offered to the bill and is not pending.

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I thought it had been offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been submitted and printed and laid on the table. It is in order for the Senator from Missouri to offer it at this time and make it the pending amendment.

Mr. VEST. I offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add as additional sections to the bill:

SEC. —. That section 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2513. All or any part of the materials, whether wood, steel, iron, copper, yellow metal, bolts, spikes, sheathing, treenails; canvas for sails, whether flax or cotton; rigging and cordage, whether hemp, manila hemp, or iron wire; anchors and cables; iron plates, castings, and forgings; angle-irons, beams, masts, yards, rivets, bolts, nuts, screws, engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery, and all other materials and appliances which may be necessary for the construction and equipment, in whole or in part, of vessels, whether steam or sail vessels, to be built and furnished in the United States after the 1st day of January, 1885, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be collected or paid thereon."

SEC. —. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1885, any citizen or citizens of the United States may purchase the whole of any steam or sail vessel, no matter where said vessel may have been built, whether within the United States or in a foreign country, or whether said vessel may have been owned in whole or in part by an alien or aliens; and said vessel shall be registered free of duty as to her hull, spars, appliances, outfit, and equipment (including boilers, engines, and machinery, if a steam-vessel), as a vessel of the United States, by the collector in any port of entry of the United States to whom application for such registry may be made by said citizen or citizens, in the same manner as though said vessel had been built in the United States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Now I offer my amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to the proposed amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That such ship shall be excluded from the coastwise trade.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, however much the friends of the amendment before the Senate may desire to avoid any partisan discussion or to escape any debate in regard to the tariff system of the country, the course of the debate yesterday evidently shows beyond any question that such desire can not possibly be carried out or any such object attained. Whenever the subject of "free ships" is mentioned the advocates of the high protective tariff now prevailing in the United States immediately take the alarm and assume that the free-traders, as they are termed, those of us who favor a tariff for revenue, are attempting to break down the tariff system.

Mr. President, free ships do not necessarily affect the high protective system that now obtains. All we ask with regard to the merchant marine of the United States is that an American citizen may be permitted to buy a ship wherever he can buy it to the best advantage. All we ask is that the limitations put upon the purchase of ships by an American citizen may be removed.

It is frequently objected that if a ship is permitted to come into the United States free of duty, a complete and finished ship, this is an exemption from the general tariff system now on our statute-book; but if Senators will for a moment consider the difference between the admission of materials or ordinary articles embraced in the tariff and the introduction or admission of a completed ship which must go upon the seas and compete with free trade the world over, the objection would be seen at once to be unavailing.

The American importer or the American merchant who pays the tariff duty upon cloth or upon leather or upon iron or any other commodity mentioned in the tariff schedules can recoup that duty off the purchaser in the domestic market; but the American who buys a finished ship can not recoup the amount that is put upon that as duty, because he is bound to run that ship at the rate of freight paid to the ship-owners of England, Germany, and the other free-trade nations of the world, and fixed by them, and he can not recoup the amount of duty paid by him on his ship from any source.

Mr. PLUMB. Can not the ship-owners place themselves on an equality by buying an English ship just as well as by buying an American ship?

Mr. VEST. Of course, but I have been under the impression that we were now discussing and inquiring how to build up the merchant marine of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Unless we can give some inducement which does not now exist, will not our capitalists instead of putting their money in our ships put their money into British ships, thereby making greater profit?

Mr. VEST. The very thing that I propose to do is to take off the restriction and prohibition which compels an American citizen to put his money into British ships. As the law now stands and under the system which the Senator from Kansas advocates, an American citizen is forced to buy a British ship and he must sail it under the British flag. He can not bring it into the foreign trade of the United States under existing laws. The difference between the Senator and myself is that I want to give an American citizen, who acts either from patriotic or selfish or mercenary motives, the privilege to purchase in a foreign market; and the Senator from Kansas refuses him that privilege. That is the sole question. That is the very essence and gist of this whole discussion.

The Senator says why not give him inducements? I am attempting to do it. But why offer him inducements when you have laws which say he shall not purchase a British ship, that he shall go to Mr. Roach in order to buy one, that he shall pay 30 per cent. more in order to get a vessel built by an American builder instead of going to England for it. Why talk about inducements when you have a Procrustean and iron rule which shuts out the American purchaser from the British markets. I mention that because it is the largest ship-building market in the world.

What we need to-day in the United States is absolute freedom. We have all to gain and nothing to lose. What we need is that the last restriction shall be taken off the people of the United States in order that they may buy if by any chance they can be induced to buy on any terms so as to put the American flag over our merchant marine.

For years we have heard the cry that next year would see a revival of American shipping. What would be thought of the physician whose adherence to old prescriptions which daily brought his patient nearer the grave, and refused to change because he followed the system laid down in his books or pursued in the former practice of the profession?

What we need to-day is absolute freedom and markets for the overproduction of the people of the United States. Ships are the children of commerce and not its parents; ships are the instrumentalities of commerce and not its origin. We are to-day suffering from overproduction. With fifty-odd millions of people, with unrivaled energies and resources, the Senator from Kansas and the school to which he belongs would shut us out from the markets of the world because, as I said yesterday, and I repeat it to-day and it can not be answered, when an American ship-master arrives at a foreign port and undertakes to purchase from that people or to barter with them for the productions incident to their climate and soil, he must do it with reference to a high protective and exclusive tariff in his own country.

Mr. PLUMB. Inasmuch as the Senator has referred to me as a defender of the system of tariff, will he please explain to me, in accordance with his argument, how he is going to make a market for American products by allowing American capital to buy British ships and thereby build up British ship-yards and make markets abroad rather than at home?

Mr. VEST. We are told always that we must build up American ship-yards; how many have we built up? How much have we built up?

Mr. PLUMB. We have not built up as many as we ought; that has been undoubtedly the vice of our legislation. I am willing to go as far as the Senator, I think, in everything that will correct that, but I do not believe in building up the American ship-yards by adopting a policy that will build up instead the British ship-yards and leave us without even the small business we have now.

Mr. VEST. Why does the Senator say it will build up only British ship-yards? Is that the experience of the world?

Mr. PLUMB. If it will not build up British ship-yards it will be because our people will not buy British ships under a "free-ship" bill, and then it will be an idle thing entirely.

Mr. VEST. I say free ships will build up American ship-yards, which your present policy has not done, and the official reports which I read yesterday from the Register of the United States Treasury show that it has not done it.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator mean to say that giving the privilege to buy British ships will build up American ship-yards?

Mr. VEST. I do, most emphatically and distinctly.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like the Senator to go into details on that subject.

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure. It is my purpose to explain that very proposition. I say that to-day instead of the American ship-yards being built up, the Register of the Treasury shows that they are building less iron ships than they did last year under your system; that instead of increasing they are decreasing. What has been the experience of the world in this regard? Germany had the same system which the Senator advocates, and what is the result?

Mr. PLUMB. Let us have this thing understood. I agree with the Senator that we have by reason of antiquated and, as he described them yesterday, destructive laws, put burdens on ship-builders and ship-owners. Those, I agree, ought to be removed. But he is not willing to remove those and trust to that to build up the manufacture of ships by American mechanics and American capital; but he wants, having taken them off, to go beyond that and authorize the buying of British ships by Americans. I want him to state how that particular feature of his policy, not the taking off these other burdens about which there is no question, but how the privilege of buying ships constructed in British ship-yards is going to build up American ship-yards.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator had possessed his soul in patience for a very few moments I would have answered him satisfactorily I think, to an impartial auditor. I was proceeding to give an example and in the same sentence give reasons why the same results would follow in the United States.

To-day we are building comparatively no iron ships, and until some such ships belong to the merchant marine of the United States our condition will become worse and worse as it has for the last twenty years. The one great thing to-day desirable is to turn the attention of the people of the United States to the ocean and cause them to become interested in the merchant marine. I state that so far as I am concerned I care not where the ships are obtained, because if they are obtained in Great Britain or elsewhere their presence in our merchant marine under the flag of the United States will create an interest with our people, will cause our capital to be invested in ships, and will be infinitely preferable, no matter where the vessels are built, to the present condition of affairs.

If anything is to be learned from example and from precedents, let us look to the case of Germany. Germany had a few years ago the same system which the Senator advocates, and Hamburg and Bremen sent out a few fishing smacks and they alone kept afloat the German flag. I want to call the attention of my friends on the opposite side of the Chamber to this fact: they say that dear labor causes the absolute impossibility of our building up an iron merchant marine. The labor of Germany was and is cheaper than that of Great Britain, and yet Germany could not compete with Great Britain in building up a merchant marine, and what did she do? Did she stand upon her navigation laws? Did she do as the Senator from Kansas wants us to do to-day, rely upon legislation of the time of Richard II and re-enacted in the United States in 1790? The Germans under the lead of Bismarck repealed their navigation laws, bought their vessels from Great Britain, and what is the result now? The ship-yards of Bremen and of Hamburg are to-day in a condition of remarkable activity, and the German flag is seen in almost every port of the globe.

Mr. FRYE. May I ask the Senator from Missouri if after having purchased a few free ships Bismarck did not change the entire policy of Germany, and if the government did not itself at once build up great ship-yards, and if those ship-yards are not now run by the government itself?

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. And if they are not to-day building instead of buying all their own ships and selling them to other markets?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Senator simply supplements or rather takes out of my mouth a statement I was about to make.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Government of the United States do what the German Government does?

Mr. VEST. The Government of the United States to-day could in its navy-yards build an iron navy which could defend our seaboard and carry our flag in honor and glory to every sea. Germany did build her merchant marine, but she first commenced by purchasing from Great Britain, and her ship-yards were initiated and sustained by the repairs of the vessels she had bought from her neighbors in Great Britain.

Mr. FRYE. Germany tried just what the Senator asks us to try to-day, and she became disgusted with the trial, and she built her own ship-yards and built her own ships. France tried the same experiment with Great Britain, bought free ships, became disgusted, built her own ship-yards, and pays bounty for every ton of ship that is built to-day, and bounty for every mile that the ship is sailed. Italy at this very moment is discussing the same proposition, and has concluded that the purchase of free ships is a mistake, and she proposes to build her own.

Mr. VEST. Does not the Senator know that a German citizen to-day can buy a ship where he pleases?

Mr. FRYE. But I know that he will not buy it outside of his own country to-day, and does not.

Mr. VEST. Why does the Senator speak of Germany when he knows himself, and the report proves it, that Germany did buy her ships from Great Britain and does yet, and that by reason of having bought from Great Britain her mechanics were employed in the repairs of those very vessels in her ship-yards? Who does not know this? Germany had the system on which the Senator from Maine stands to-day, and with all her cheap labor she found that she could not build up a merchant marine, and then Germany permitted her citizens to buy from Great Britain; and now the Senator tells me that since the merchant marine has been built up in Germany they will not buy British vessels. Is that an answer to my proposition?

Mr. FRYE. But, if the Senator will pardon me, his proposition made a moment ago was that German labor was cheaper than English labor.

Mr. VEST. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. To-day in the ship-yards of this country our labor is double the English labor in price; German labor is 10 to 20 per cent. less than English labor; and there is no parallelism between the United States and Germany in this matter of ship-building. The whole discrimination is against us by labor.

Mr. VEST. The Senator now goes back to the partisan cry that we hear in every campaign and whenever the tariff question is touched directly or incidentally, that we are trying to prostrate American labor or to draw a contrast between the high-priced labor of America and the pauper labor of Europe. I have always said, and I believe to-day, that the skilled labor, the intelligent labor, and the high-priced labor of the United States will always successfully compete with the pauper labor of Europe, and the history of Germany and Great Britain shows it, because with all her cheap labor Germany was forced to go to the high-priced labor of Great Britain, relatively high-priced compared to her own, in order to purchase her merchant marine.

We are told to-day by Mr. John Roach and the school to which he belongs and of which he is the chief exponent that the real reason of the decline of American shipping lies in the fact that 90 per cent. of what goes into the construction of an iron ship is labor, and that the high price of labor in this country compels the fact that we can not compete with Great Britain in the construction of these steamships. Yet the historic fact remains, which the Senator from Maine himself knows, and every intelligent man who has examined this question knows, that notwithstanding the cheap labor of Germany compared with that of Great Britain, one-half in fact of that of Great Britain, Germany was forced to go to Great Britain for the purchase of her merchant marine, showing that the skilled labor, the high-priced labor of Great Britain, was superior to the pauper labor of Germany, as the high-priced labor of the United States will always be to pauper labor when brought in competition with it.

But I go back to the statement, which is an absolutely true one, that Germany initiated her present system of ship-yards by purchasing her vessels in the beginning from Great Britain, and I supplement it with the other historic statement, which can not be successfully denied, that Russia to-day is indebted for her merchant marine, and for her respectable navy that carries her flag in pride all over the world, to the fact that at the end of the Crimean war she bought from her adversary and opponent in that war, Great Britain, in order to establish her merchant marine. The Russians are superior to us, the Germans are superior to us, even the Chinese and Italians are superior to us, in learning from the past; for to-day we hear again and again, notwithstanding these facts, notwithstanding the experience of the world, that we must stand upon the old navigation laws until our flag absolutely disappears from the ocean.

Mr. President, a very few words more and I shall have nothing further to say in this debate. For free ships, for the poor privilege of buying in the market where we can buy cheapest, we have principle and example and absolute necessity. Without intending to go into an elaborate discussion of the tariff question, I say here now, once for all, and as the absolute result of reflection and as a conscientious conviction, that the man who forces me under a statute to pay $2 for what I could otherwise purchase for $1 robs me of that dollar and of so much of the proceeds of my life and labor. Any government which steps in and says to me, "You shall, not for governmental support, which is a common burden, but in order to protect another class or another individual, give up a dollar of your earnings," which represent my life to that extent, my labor, my limbs, my brain, in order to enrich him, robs me and makes me a slave to the extent of that $1.

When an American citizen is forced by a statutory enactment to spend $30,000 more in the purchase of a vessel for the merchant marine and give it to Mr. John Roach, or Harlan & Hollingsworth, or Cramp & Sons, because they are owners of American ship-yards, when he can go to England or France or Germany or anywhere else and buy that ship for $30,000 less, that Government enslaves him and his labor and his hopes and his aspirations to the extent of that $30,000.

Wrong in principle and, as I have shown from example, wrong in practice, to-day this ocean Republic, which should hold the scepter of the ocean, holds in its grasp a barren and empty dominion. With the waves around us, with 10,000 miles of seaboard, we are at the mercy of Spain or Italy or any of the inferior fourth-rate powers of the world. Twenty of our commercial cities could be battered to dust to-morrow by the ironclads of Italy or Spain. Three hundred and eighty-five million dollars have been given since 1866 to build a navy, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] answered me the other day when I asked where those expenditures had been made that $140,000,000 had been paid to sailors and officers for manning a navy that does not exist. To-day two hundred and sixty-six naval officers are ornaments to your club-rooms and to your corners in the city of Washington who have not a ship to which they can go, who are simply ornamental members of a profession which has no abiding-place upon the ocean.

This is our condition, and the absolute necessity for a change must strike the most obtuse intellect, and would perforate anything except partisan passion and partisan prejudice. How is it possible that any system could reduce us to a worse condition than we are in to-day upon the ocean? Any change would be for the better. Anything short of absolute annihilation would be better. Yet year by year this progress downward goes on. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says down, down, down has gone the merchant marine, and how does he propose to restore it? Who is responsible for its going down? Who has had control of this Government? Who to-day obstructs the progress to a better condition of affairs? You adhere to the same system, you put before us the same laws, you resist any change; yet we are told when we propose to take off this limitation upon the power to purchase in the cheapest markets of the world that we are attacking the sacred protective system of the Republican party of the United States.

Mr. President, what we need to-day is that our people should be again invited to turn to the ocean. What we need to-day is that they should not be driven from it by a navigation system obsolete, unfounded in principle, wrong in practice and in theory, which is adhered to for some reason which has never been satisfactorily explained in the Senate or elsewhere.

I do not believe, and I frankly avow it, that any single act of Congress will bring our flag back to the ocean waves. Speculative enterprises, the thousand avenues to vast fortunes which have obtained in the United States for the last few years, have turned our people back from the ocean to the prairies in the distant West. The youth of the seaboard, and especially of New England, no longer are thrilled by stories of naval glory and adventure and the histories of those who carried our flag against England in the war of 1812. They find in the mountains and upon the prairies of the great West the gratification of the love of adventure and the acquisition of money which they once found upon the ocean. The stories of the lives of Hull and Bainbridge and Decatur are lost in the whistle and the screams of the locomotive and the crash and whirl of the factory.

How are we again to bring our people back to the ocean? Are we to bring them back by continuing the limitations which say to them, "You shall not buy your ships in the cheapest market?" What are we to lose by taking off these restrictions? We have all to gain; we have nothing to lose; and what to-day we want is absolute, complete, illimitable freedom.

There are and there have been always in this country those who are determined to strike down the merchant marine of the United States, because they held that it is better to have an ocean of fire around us than that the protective system should be infringed or broken in one single particular. We want freedom, absolute freedom, and without it there can be no change for the better. In the history of the world there has been but one result to such laws as are found to-day upon the statute-books of the United States in regard to our merchant marine. Legislators once attempted to make men believe that the sun moved and that the earth stood still, and the rack and the thumb-screw were brought into requisition in order to obtain intellectual assent to those propositions; and yet the world has come to believe, notwithstanding those laws, that the sun stands still and that the earth moves around it. Legislators afterward attempted to say that men should eat as they dictated and wear raiment prescribed by statute, and yet those laws have gone into the rubbish of the past, monuments of barbarism that no longer exist. Legislators in the past have attempted to point the road to heaven and the road to hell by statute, and to tell man by law that he should believe in a legal god and in certain dogmas, or to go to the flames here and hereafter; but to-day intellectual freedom and religious conscience obtain the world over, except in the darkest and most benighted regions of the earth. So the end will come as to this system. It will come in this free land of ours as certainly as to-day I make the prediction. You may keep your navigation laws for the present, but they will be swept from your statute-book by the overwhelming sentiment of the American people. To-day the freedom of commerce, the right to barter, the right to exchange, the right to purchase where you can purchase the cheapest, is asserting itself all over the land, and the American people will never tolerate these laws, born in the obscurity and barbarism of the past and continued to-day without any rational defense. Free thought says now to the advocates of this restrictive and prohibitory system—

> Harness me down with your iron bands,
> Make sure of your curb and reins,
> But I scorn the strength of your puny hands,
> As the tempest scorns her chains.

In my life and public career the repeal of these laws may not come. I do not hope that it will be done by the Senate on the eve of a great political campaign, when they regard it as abandoning the system which they have forced upon the country. I do not hope for it now, but it will come. If I have detained the Senate as long as I have, it is with no prospect of immediate success, but under the faint hope that the calcium light of public opinion will be brought to bear upon this system, odious, indefensible, barbarous, without one single thing to commend it to an honest and fair mind.

I have spoken earnestly because for two years it has been my duty as a member of a special committee of the Senate on shipping to examine this question. Is it wondered here that I, a Missourian, should take such interest in the commercial marine of the United States? Sir, I represent in part a State that pours from its agricultural wealth a large portion of the vast products that float upon the waves to the marts of the whole world. Every penny that is taken off the cost of transportation across the ocean, every market that is opened up to the ships of the United States, every dollar saved of the $150,000,000 that is paid to-day to foreign vessels for carrying our products abroad, is for the benefit of the people of Missouri.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, so far as the features of the bill reported by my colleague [Mr. FRYE] for the relief of American shipping are concerned, they will apparently meet with but little opposition. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] representing the minority of the committee has in terms acquiesced in most or all of those provisions, and looking them over carefully I agree fully with my colleague that they will afford a large measure of relief to this suffering interest. They will remove burdens that have been onerous and irksome. For years American ship-masters sailing over the seas of the world have been hampered and annoyed and distressed by restrictions laid by old laws. All of those, or the most of them (those that are the most burdensome and irksome), my colleague proposes to remove, and I judge there will be but little opposition to that. The measure of relief will be, I think, as my colleague has stated, very great, so that if this bill passes, while it will not do everything for American navigation interests and to revive American shipping and to put back into our hands the carrying trade of the world, or our share of it, it will do much in the right direction.

There is but little left to American ships of the carrying trade of the world. There is commerce enough. Our exports have increased with amazing rapidity, and our imports have kept pace almost or quite with the exports. Our seaboard towns have grown and become the wonder of the world; and the American people to-day, producing what is sold in the markets of the world and consuming what is made in the manufactories of the world, stand at the head of civilized nations. Yet but a little of the carrying trade of this vast commerce is left to us. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that no one act of Congress, no one measure that is to be passed here, will bring us back that carrying trade. I do not expect it. We have but a little of it left. The American Congress can not only annihilate what is left, but can put it far into the future, where perhaps there will never again come up the hope of rebuilding American shipping and again carrying our share of the commerce of the world.

I realize, as the Senator from Missouri does, that the United States as a people have changed. When we stretched narrowly along the Atlantic coast our associations were with the sea; our traditions were with the sea; our imagination was inflamed by the sea; there were no prayers sent up in the Atlantic households on Sunday more fervent than for those who went down into the sea in ships. Shipping and commerce and the carrying trade and the association with other people through commerce then made a much larger feature in American life than they do to-day. I realize this. The man is blind, no matter which side he takes on the measure before us, who does not see all this, and I see it perhaps as clearly as does the Senator from Missouri.

We have increased wonderfully. We have become a people of more than 50,000,000 in numbers; our wealth has increased correspondingly, and all the time for twenty years our share of the carrying trade of the world has gone down, as my colleague has said. But American thrift and American enterprise have not diminished. While Great Britain has been perforce obliged to center her enterprise and her capital in commerce and in navigation interests and in shipping, the United States, stretching for 3,000 miles from ocean to ocean, has opened to capital and to enterprise other avenues. The great railroad system that lies as a net-work over thirty-eight States has absorbed tens of millions and hundreds of millions of capital. The mines that have been discovered in the bosom of the earth through all the West have absorbed hundreds of other millions. There has been no great town that has started in feeble infancy and grown to be a metropolis in the West but that her great buildings, her houses and warehouses and exchanges, have absorbed hundreds of millions of capital. So it has come about that attention has not been directed to our navigation interests. I have realized that and realize it now.

It is a fact that in the legislation enacted by Congress for twenty years the only great interest that has lain and languished and suffered has been our navigation interest. It has not been able to gain the ear of Congress. Everything else has been cared for except the shipping interest.

But while it has been the fact that capital has gone in other directions and has paid better than it would pay if it had been embarked in navigation interests, in American ships and in carrying American products, and in bringing foreign products here, still all the while there has been with us an enterprising, earnest, and patriotic business that has consistently and determinedly struggled against this condition, and has built ships and set them afloat upon the waters to carry the American flag and to compete for the commerce of the world. When it was seen that wooden ships were competing with iron ships this business set itself seriously in its ship-yards to the building of iron ships to compete for the commerce of America and the world. There has not been a day for twenty years that this has not been going on. Under every disadvantage the men controlling this business have gone on building American ships, putting them into the American merchant marine, selling them abroad if it were possible, employing men by the thousand, and spending millions of dollars each year.

These establishments exist to-day, and the American Congress to-day is confronted with this situation: that the attention of the American mind and of American capital is drawn to this interest, to the commerce of the world, to the carrying trade of the world; and the American Congress must settle whether it will put the finishing stroke to the enterprises that have been going on for years in maintaining American ship-building and in keeping our flag afloat on the seas of the world, or will encourage them.

The building of iron ships in America is not a feeble, dwindling, dying thing. It is a thing of which, under all the disadvantageous circumstances, we may well be proud. There has never been a day since the little steamboat Codorus was built in 1825 and launched in the waters of the Susquehanna that American building of iron ships has not gone on and progressed; and ever since Jabez Conley constructed the revenue-cutter Saranac in 1841 that manufacture has gone on and increased in proportion from year to year. Single years, like the last, may have shown a falling off, but the general advance has always been maintained.

I do not think that Senators realize to-day how much of American industry is represented at home in iron-ship-building yards. My colleague has alluded to this; let me refer to it a little more in detail. There are the works on the Hudson, at Newburg, of Ward, Stanton & Co., building engines and ships, and repairing iron ships. There is a larger establishment at Camden, N. J. At Philadelphia is the great establishment of Cramp & Son, who have built fifty large ships. They have built them for our own commerce; they have competed abroad with foreign constructors, and have built ships for the Russian navy. They have a yard that to-day has the concentrated power of twenty wooden-ship yards, and you can, by passing the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, give the death-blow to this yard; you can close it up and stop the sound of every hammer there and drive to despair every laborer there employed. Neafie & Levy since 1844 have been building iron ships, most of them small ones, but they are constantly employed. They await the action of Congress upon this bill and with a solicitude that I can not describe the fate of the amendment that is projected and urged by the Senator from Missouri. At Chester there is the great yard of John Roach, with a plant of a million dollars, a yard covering seventy acres of land, which he has built up gradually by his persistent and honest industry. Eighty ships have been launched in the last twelve years from that yard, ranging from 500 tons up to 5,000 tons. He employs 3,000 men, and gives food and sustenance and support and comfort and happiness to 15,000 people, men, women, and children. He and the people who are employed by him await with fear and trembling the fate of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. At Wilmington is the great, majestic establishment of Harlan & Hollingsworth, begun in 1836. That concern built the first iron ship that was launched and used on American waters, the old iron ship named for a town in my own State, the Bangor. From that time this concern has gone on and built more than one hundred and seventy iron ships, ranging from 200 tons to 3,500 tons, and gives employment to 3,000 men, and if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri passes silence and desolation will reign in their yard.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Will he please state how many of those vessels were for the domestic trade, the coastwise trade, and how many for the foreign trade?

Mr. HALE. They have built the small vessels mostly for the coastwise trade. Larger vessels are sometimes for the foreign trade. The greater proportion are for the coastwise trade, but the enterprise has been kept up and these establishments have been in competition for the foreign trade as well as for the coastwise trade.

Take these great establishments and let the amendment of the Senator from Missouri pass and a darkness so deep that no man can penetrate it will fall on them, the bats will gather over the scene and "tire the echoes with their unvaried cries," desolation will mark the spot where now human industry is astir and gives employment to thousands of men and makes hundreds of happy homes. Take the great establishment of the Pusey & Jones Company, who have built eighty iron ships, not for the coastwise trade alone but have determinedly kept along, turning out ships year by year and who have sent many of them to South American waters. Baltimore has something of this; and in San Francisco there are the Risdon Works that are engaged in building and repairing, all upon iron vessels. I get these facts from the census reports, which are very full upon the subject, and these are some of the larger yards and they show to-day the condition of American manufacture of iron ships that are struck at by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Maine with his statistics be kind enough to tell us how many of those ships have been sent across the Atlantic Ocean to carry the exports of the country?

Mr. HALE. I can not tell just what proportion. I have not made up the figures. I can give the list and the Senator himself can make the reckoning.

Mr. BECK. Does he know that any of them have ever gone except one or two in the Philadelphia line?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BECK. Which ones?

Mr. HALE. I can not tell exactly the number, but some of them.

Mr. BECK. There is not one that leaves the port of New York to cross the Atlantic to-day.

Mr. HALE. I do not know what ports they have left, but the ships range in size from 500 tons to 5,000 tons. Some of them have gone into the Pacific trade, some have gone into the South American trade, some have gone into the European trade. The proportion in each I can not now tell, but I will hunt it up and give it to the Senator before the debate closes if he wishes.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will find, I think, that not a single one of them has left the great port of New York for any port across the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. HALE. Whether that be so or not, the effect that I am deprecating would be just as great, if the amendment passes, wherever these ships go, because if anything is true to the comprehension of sensible men it is that if you begin and let foreign ships under our flag into the foreign trade, all built and ready to be manned, not three years nor two years would pass before the whole coasting trade would be opened in the same way. As my colleague has said, no American citizen who under the law puts his money into an English-built ship will bear for a year the burden of being excluded from the coastwise trade in a ship that he has put American money into and has bought and sailed under our flag, under our law. The advocates of free ships know this as well as I, and if there is anything logical in free ships as maintained by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Missouri it carries all trade, coastwise as well as foreign.

Mr. BECK. If it would not disturb the Senator from Maine I should like to call his attention to the difference in the two cases, if he will allow me. The coastwise trade we do not propose to disturb. Why? First, because it is giving employment to the class of men he speaks of, and second, because in that trade there is competition between Americans and all are absolutely equal, no man having any advantage over the others, for all share alike. In the foreign trade by treaties we allow foreign nations the same privileges we have ourselves, and they buy and run cheap ships bought in the cheapest market, and our people are required and compelled to compete with them. The difference must be so obvious that the Senator himself can see it, for all men compete upon an equality in the coastwise trade and we compete with every vessel on the ocean in the foreign trade. We desire to make our people equal to the foreigners to whom we have given that trade under our treaties.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says that he does not intend to disturb the coastwise trade. Let him carry this amendment and let it be embodied as a part of our law regulating the foreign trade, and he can not help disturbing the coastwise trade, nor can I help it. It will then be a competition and a conflict between American citizens, and the American citizen who has his money invested in a foreign-built ship will demand all the privileges of the American flag and we can not fail to give them to him.

Mr. FRYE. Will my colleague yield for a moment? I call my colleague's attention to the amendment. I labored all the time under the impression that the amendment excluded these vessels from the coastwise trade.

Mr. BECK. It does.

Mr. FRYE. It does nothing of the kind. The amendment admits all vessels to the coastwise trade.

Mr. BECK. It is not so intended, and will be amended to make it clear, if an amendment is needed.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Missouri desires, I know, to modify the amendment so that the vessels shall be excluded from the coastwise trade. He supposed the word "registry" would of itself be sufficient to work that result.

Mr. VEST. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HALE. I do not raise any question there. I have no doubt that by the terms of the amendment, as I have examined it, it would include the coastwise trade. I do not suppose that the Senator from Missouri intends that, and I am not so arguing. I have no doubt he will amend it so as not to include the coastwise trade; but therein he is not logical. He may gain possibly a vote here or there for his amendment, but he is simply in one direction taking one step at a time, and neither he nor I will be many years older before I shall find him here clamoring as he is now for ships let in under the American flag to the foreign trade to be at liberty to engage in all the trade that American citizens engage in. I do not doubt that he will modify the amendment and make it in accord with what he has said.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, it does not make any difference about what I shall do, whether I shall get any votes here or there, but the point I want to make is that anybody who knows the statutes of the United States or ever has read them in regard to the merchant marine knows that the term "registry" is a statutory term that applies only to the foreign trade and that "enrollment" and "license" apply to the coastwise trade. If you talked to a naval lawyer, to any lawyer as to that matter who ever read the statutes, about registering a vessel in the coastwise trade he would laugh at you. Therefore the word "registry" confines it absolutely to the foreign trade.

Mr. FRYE. I have just examined the Senator's amendment. I think he is right.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt of it. It would never touch the coastwise trade.

Mr. HALE. Whether it is included or not I think is a question of some doubt. The Senator at any rate had better amend it. I have no doubt he is willing to do it. I do not make that point.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a moment only to state that I had already offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri excluding such ships from our coastwise trade, which he will be so very kind as to vote for, I hope.

Mr. HALE. So the Secretary had just informed me. I knew that to be the fact.

Mr. McPHERSON. However, I do not think it was necessary to do that.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to correct myself again. It is necessary. No vessel unless registered can enter into the foreign trade, but any vessel registered can enter into the coastwise trade. It is a limitation on the foreign service but not on the coastwise, and the Senator's amendment does admit foreign vessels to the coastwise trade.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is very material, as the amendment will be modified to square with the Senator's speech.

Mr. VEST. I can explain it.

Mr. HALE. Whether the Senator's amendment does or does not exclude the coasting trade, he will, no doubt, fix the exclusion. I am talking about the proposition as he means to put it, not as he has put it. I think he had better amend it. I agree with the last conclusion of my colleague.

In this condition of a prostrated carrying trade, yet with an earnest effort on the part of many worthy, meritorious citizens with their capital embarked for the manufacture of American iron ships, the question is here and now before Congress whether we will give the finishing touch to what there is of this American enterprise. The Senator from Missouri says by all means admit foreign ships built in English yards under English labor with English material competing with our materials and with our labor, free of duty, to all the privileges of the American flag. He cites the instance of Great Britain, which has undoubtedly for the last thirty-four years run under the system of "free ships."

I am very glad that the Senator has brought up Great Britain, because if we can learn from anybody with reference to navigation interests it is from the British Empire and from British legislation. There was never a people on the face of the globe which traded with other people, that for hundreds of years maintained with such severity the most extreme navigation laws and who jealously guarded their own ship-building interests as did Great Britain; and never until by this system of guardianship and protection Great Britain had brought her ship-building interest into such a prosperous condition that it could compete advantageously with all the world, did she throw open her shipping laws. The attempt was made over and over again, and never succeeded until Great Britain realized that she could gain more than she could lose and could build ships cheaper than any other great maritime power. She began with the most extreme legislation. It was read yesterday by the Senator from Missouri. Let me repeat it, as the foundation of the English navigation laws the statute of the first and fifth Richard II, chapter 3, recites. Listen to it:

No subject of the king shall ship any merchandise outward or homeward save in ships of the king's allegiance on penalty of the forfeiture of vessel and cargo.

Nothing could be more extreme than that. It was five hundred years ago, and in that policy Great Britain continued for three hundred years.

Now, let me give the Senate an instance of what Great Britain did at a time when her situation was nearly analogous to ours. After the wars of the great rebellion of 1640 and the European wars that succeeded, in the stagnation that resulted from the preoccupation of the English mind and the wasting of English strength in internecine conflict other nations had come to the front and had secured largely the control of commerce on the seas. In 1650 the Dutch as a mercantile and marine power were at their height. They had secured the advantage, and Great Britain's trade and commerce were prostrate as ours is to-day. Her share in the carrying trade of the world had dwindled as ours has to-day, and competition was against her, and a clamor arose for a readjustment of her navigation laws.

When we are in like situation the Senator from Missouri stands up in this Chamber and with all the force of his vehement eloquence urges the passage of a measure that will sound the death-knell to American shipyards in the face of the example of Great Britain, which is just the other way. Let me tell him what Great Britain did at that time instead of such a measure as he urges. This is the law that was put on the statute-book of Great Britain when her situation was like ours, when she could not compete in building ships with the Dutch and other people. Let me read it to the Senator, and see if he can find in it any similarity on the part of Great Britain that he seeks to imitate with his measure that he is clamoring for. See what Great Britain enacted at that time instead of a "free-ships" law.

Mr. VEST. What date was that?

Mr. HALE. Immediately after the great rebellion, in 1651.

Mr. VEST. Oh.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Missouri says "oh" derisively. Commerce is not a thing that had its day and birth one hundred years or two hundred years ago. Great Britain was proud of her commerce and her mercantile marine and her prowess on the sea hundreds of years before the date to which I allude. It is not a thing compared with the history of commerce and English navigation that is in the dim and misty past, but it stands amidships in the career of Great Britain when she had a hope to have a greater mercantile interest. Let us see what she enacted.

No goods or commodities whatever of the growth, production, or manufacture of Asia, Africa, or America, including our own plantations—shall be imported into England or Ireland or any of the plantations, except in English-built ships, owned by English subjects, navigated by English commanders, and with three-fourths of the sailors Englishmen.

All the colonies—

It is the spirit that actuated that enactment; it is the sturdy spirit of patriotism and enterprise combined, and a love of the home flag that made England what she became afterward as the exemplar of mercantile people. In her emergency, situated as we are now, no "free-ships" clause allowing English capital to go abroad and buy Dutch ships was thought of by English statesmen, but they hemmed around and guarded their own labor and their own manufactures and their own ship-yards, and with an iron-clad provision such as was rarely incorporated into any statute law, for it is ingenious in its exclusion, they made the policy that England lived and sailed under and prospered and grew under for two hundred years; and never until the agitations of 1848 and 1849, culminating in 1850, when it was demonstrated that under the chart laid down by that enactment England had become the cheapest producing nation in the world of ships and could compete with the world, did she throw open her shipping laws and let ships be purchased abroad.

The Senator says that it was done for the purpose of purchasing ships abroad. The purchasing of foreign ships after the act of 1850 was bagatelle. Of all the great commercial marine and of all the great navy with which England has thundered on the seas since, not one ship in a hundred was built or finished or repaired in a foreign port; but when England had reached the condition where she could compete with all the world and had more to gain than to lose, then she threw open her laws, and never until then, and she has lived under it for thirty years', while under the old enactments she lived as a naval and commercial power for more than five hundred years. I commend the example of Great Britain in emergency to the distinguished Senator from Missouri. I commend it to him for his study, and improvement, and admonition.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if it does not interrupt him.

Mr. HALE. Certainly not.

Mr. VEST. Does he mean to say that Great Britain did not purchase any ships from the United States?

Mr. HALE. I do not say she did not, but I say the purchase that she made was so small in amount, and it continued for so short a time, compared with what she has built since and furnished to her own people and to the world, that it is bagatelle; it is not worth mentioning.

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator will settle that with Mr. John Roach, who says they put $20,000,000 in gold into this country in a very few months.

Mr. HALE. What is that in comparison with what England has put into her mercantile marine in the last thirty years? It only continued as an experiment for a few months.

The Senator advances a paradox. When he is cornered, when he is driven to the wall, when he is asked by the Senator from Kansas how it is that he expects free ships and the right of buying an entire built ship abroad and bringing it under our flag will help our ship-yards; when he is asked that question, that seriously troublesome question, he is obliged to take the bull by the horns and declare that it will build up American ship-yards. Does the Senator know that if you throw open these laws, that if you let in an English ship built with English labor competing with our labor, built to-day under the stagnation which exists through all English ship-yards; where even their labor has been cut down; where they have overproduced, and where it is shown that not simply under a protective policy is there overproduction but that a free-trade policy in a little time is just as likely to result in overproduction; where to-day the rate of wages is lower than it has been for years—does the Senator believe that a single American iron ship would be constructed during the next year or five years in an American yard? Does he not know that just as certainly as tides and sun rise the great capital that is invested at Chester, or in the great yard of the Cramps, or Harlan & Hollingsworth at Wilmington, would either have to be withdrawn and the yards closed and the proprietors live upon what have been their hard earnings heretofore, or that they would be obliged to transport that capital abroad and employ foreign labor? Or does he not know that one other inevitable thing would come about, and that is that the workmen would be summoned and told that unless they were willing to depart without work and see the yards closed they must take the rates of pay that their English competitors get in the yards on the Clyde.

Mr. FRYE. A dollar and eight cents a day.

Mr. HALE. A dollar and eight cents a day. This is nothing but school-boy's logic that everybody can understand. It is simply an operation of the mind that no man can contradict. Does the Senator seek by his amendment to produce this condition of things? I am not sanguine in the belief that within one, two, or three years we shall gain back 60 per cent. of the carrying trade of the world; but let the American Congress stand to-day as did the British Parliament when they were in a like emergency, and encourage and uphold the hands of our American iron-ship builders, and with the attention that is drawn to-day to that enterprise, with the fact that Western investments are growing less and less profitable, and, more than that, with the fact that interest is becoming smaller and smaller in its rate, so that the average that the Government pays is but little more than 3 per cent.—with all these favoring conditions, and with the stimulus that ship-building has got, we may expect much. Witness the enterprise across the Potomac River, where a million dollars is to-day seeking to be put into an iron-ship yard to build American ships, and not the sound of a hammer will be heard if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri passes. Not one of the gentlemen embarking capital in that enterprise right at our doors would ever cross the Potomac River again with the idea of going on with it if their death-knell was sounded by the passage of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It seems to me strange that the Senator does not realize that as well as I do. No, sir, nothing of the kind will happen

Let this crusade for free trade, which never rode a wilder horse than on the subject of "free ships," gain possession of this branch as it has of the other, and, Mr. President, you may bid farewell in your lifetime and mine to seeing the American people build and maintain a fleet of ships to carry the commerce of the globe; but encourage this manufacture, and by gradual steps it will rise, it will advance, it will grow, and the men who have maintained it all these years will be the very men, with others who will join, to increase it and make it a respectable element in our business and in our trade; and that I hope to see.

There is one other thing that weighs very strongly in my mind. If we were asked by our great commercial rival, Great Britain, to select a measure that would in itself in terms suit her, not only with reference to trade now, but with reference to emergencies and exigencies in the future, the reply would be "a free-ship law." Why? Look at the situation of Great Britain and the other European powers. Great Britain is the commercial mercantile power of the world to-day. Her capital is invested in ships, in the returns that they bring, and when you strike her commerce, and when you strike her carrying trade and the ships that do it you strike her in a vital part. There is no one thing that to-day keeps the peace of Europe and keeps the peace between Europe and America like the sensitive condition of Great Britain as to her mercantile marine.

Let me tell the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky what will happen if this amendment passes. The very first time that war breaks out in Europe, the very first time that European complications involve Great Britain and she is drawn irresistibly into conflict (and if her marine is safe she is drawn more easily into conflict), what would happen? Her whole sailing force, her whole mercantile marine would at once in the name of factors and agents and partners be put under the American flag, and while the war continued would be kept under the American flag, and the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky would behold this amazing spectacle, that the carrying trade of the world would continue to be done by British ships under the American flag, owned by British subjects, who would be really the controlling power in the name of citizens here as partners and agents and factors, and all the earnings of this great trade would be absorbed by the owners of that carrying trade and expended in Great Britain and not a dollar derived by us from the emergency. The opportunity that would more than any other give us the chance to revive our trade and our carrying of the commerce of the world would be good for nothing. Would the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Kentucky like to see that? But as sure as they live and these things come about, and they may, they will see it.

On the other hand, if we pursue the policy that Great Britain did as I have tried to state it, then when European trouble comes—and wars have not ceased and will not in his day nor mine—and when Great Britain is involved in war and her carrying trade is in peril and the merchants of all the ports of the world are seeking a neutral ship to carry their products, then the demand will come for American bottoms to carry the trade of the world as it came in 1861 for British bottoms to carry the trade of the world, the American merchant marine at once leaps into new life and magnitude and gains a hold and power that will never from that moment cease.

The Senator from Missouri in his ardor for free trade, run wild on free ships, seeks to take away from America that chance, and it is not a small chance. It is not a chance that is not worth reckoning. It is the one distinctive thing that in the end and perhaps in the near future will again restore the American carrying trade. I can fancy under these conditions the amazement with which such a proposition as that of the Senator from Missouri is looked upon abroad except by those who would benefit by it the most.

No, sir, such is not the path to be pursued by the American Congress. We ought to build our own ships and not present the lamentable spectacle to the world of passing an act that says to the world outside that a great people, with a seacoast of 6,000 miles, which twenty years ago was second in the commerce of the globe, deliberately lays down all hope for the future and declares to the world outside that it shall build our ships and we can not build our own. Sir, there never was a great commercial and a great naval people which carried the trade of the world that did not build its own ships. The Senators may hunt in all the analogies and in all the illustrations and in all the examples that are afforded by the past and the proposition that can never be found to vary is that the people who carry the merchandise of the world, who control its commerce, are the people who build the ships with which to do it; and when the national spirit dies with reference to one it will die out with reference to another. I can not, it is intolerable to me, for a moment to imagine the condition of the American people after they have said to the world, "We can not build our ships; we will try no longer; furnish them to us and make us pay a tribute to you." No, sir, I do not believe that the American Congress is going to pass any such measure.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 2, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask permission to introduce some reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. We are loaded down with reports made by that committee, and it will take but a few moments to dispose of them.

Mr. MORRISON. I must insist upon the motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 12.

Mr. MORRILL. Unless I can have unanimous consent to make these reports from the committee I shall be compelled to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. MORRISON and Mr. MORRILL were appointed tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought there was an agreement in the House on yesterday that we were to dispense with private business to-day.

The SPEAKER. That was to dispense with private business on the Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. But the reports to-day would be only of a private nature.

The SPEAKER. There was only unanimous consent to dispense with the consideration of the Private Calendar. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. MORRILL (before the count had been completed). I withdraw the demand for a quorum.

So (no further count being demanded) the morning hour was dispensed with—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. NUTTING. I recognize, Mr. Chairman, in this bill before the House one of great importance to the people of the country at this time. In fact, I recognize in any bill that is brought before the House in the usual way a measure of importance. I think that every measure that comes from the hands of a committee after it has been properly investigated should receive the careful attention and consideration of the House. That is what we are here for.

I am sorry to see one thing, Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this bill—in fact, I am sorry to see the same thing occur in regard to the discussion of almost every bill that comes before the House—that is, I am sorry to see a great many men discuss bills which come up here in the light of the political action of parties in the future. I do not believe this is right. I do not believe that it is safe. While I believe that politics and political parties are as necessary to good government and to good management in the government as is motion to the purity of the air or water, still I believe when we come into a body like this we should attempt to legislate without an idea as to how our legislation is going to affect political parties or persons or political policies in the future. I do not believe that it is right to do so. One of the great dangers to-day of this country is that men when they come together in legislative bodies talk and write and vote with a view to giving political advantage to one or the other political party in the future. That is the great danger of the American people and the American form of government to-day.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is one to reform and reduce the tariff law which is upon our statute-books. The Democratic party has set itself to the task of making the country believe that in fact and in reality free trade is the true principle, is the true theory, is the true policy of management which we should enter upon for the future. This is not a bill which asks for entire free trade, but it points in that direction, and almost every speaker who has spoken in its favor from the commencement of the debate until now has announced principles and announced himself as standing upon principles which in the end would result in free trade in this country. Well, Mr. Chairman, if I could look far enough into the future to see this country what I believe it will be fifty or a hundred years from now, then I should agree with the gentleman from Connecticut who talked yesterday [Mr. EATON], and say that possibly at some time in the future, when we are great enough, when we are balanced enough in our trade, in our commerce, and in our manufacturing establishments so that they equalize themselves and create an equilibrium as to trade, exchange, and commerce, then perhaps I might be in favor of free trade. But that time has not come. It has not come yet.

There are three or four elements which enter into the discussion of this bill, or which ought to enter into the discussion of it. We should take into consideration all of the industries of this country; we should take into consideration the capital of the country, the manufacturing interests, the commerce, and the labor of the country. I am very happy to see such a unanimity of feeling, if I am to judge the feeling by what is said upon the floor of this House, in making the great element of labor in this country what it ought to be, and what it doubtless will be in the future if the policy we have entered upon in the past is carried through as it ought to be. I am one, Mr. Chairman, to believe that labor is capital. It is the finest, the grandest, and the noblest capital of all that we have. Why, sir, you may take a pile of gold, which we say in the ordinary sense is capital, and it amounts in itself to mere rubbish—nothing more nor less than rubbish. But you touch that pile of gold with the magic wand of labor and obtain what it will produce with the help of labor, and then we have the greatest, the grandest, in fact all of the results which are achieved in this country. You must have a unanimity of feeling, a unanimity of purpose, a grand, open-hearted, and broad policy as to the workings of labor and capital together to achieve good results and government, and especially to achieve good results and government upon the principles we live under, and by which we attempt to manage our affairs at this time.

Take labor, Mr. Chairman, and send it to the mountains and the forest. It will hew from the mountain-side the rough stones and from the timber fresh from nature's hand, and from the result erect the mansions in which we live, erect buildings for the keeping of our poor, erect railroad bridges, school-houses, docks, and other structures. It is labor that does this, and when labor has accomplished this it takes useless and inert material and from it creates something of value and use. So it is with the iron in the mountain. So it is with the minerals in the depths of the earth. And did I believe that the Democratic party was sincere upon this subject of labor I would go with them to any length, and indeed I will go with them to any length on this subject when they are fair, open, and sincere.

There was one thing I desired to speak of which came to my notice the other day; and in speaking of this, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire in heart or by word to cast any aspersions upon the gentleman to whose action I wish at this time to advert. We have heard, as I have said, from every man who has spoken on this subject of labor on the other side burning words, eloquent words, words sound in philosophy and fact, which indicated a desire to lift up and to help the laboring men of this country.

The other day when we were considering in this House the shipping bill we had under consideration a clause of our statutes—and, thank God, the only one of the kind that exists in this country—by which a direct tax is placed on the labor of men. I refer now to that section which imposes a tax of 40 cents a month upon the wages of the sailor of the seas, lakes, and inland waters of this country in order that he may be provided with some place to be taken care of in times of sickness and poverty. It was proposed by an amendment to remove the tax on labor which that statute imposed. We then heard one of the leaders of the Democratic party on the other side—I refer respectfully to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], a man who has talked as loud and long and often on the rights of the laboring man and the poor man as anybody on this floor—we heard his voice in opposition to the repeal of that statute, and he carried that opposition so far as to call for a division of the House upon the vote being taken in favor of its repeal. This is not fair, this is not consistent, and shows that talk in favor of labor is plenty, but the votes not so plenty.

As I have said, that law is the only one on the statute-books of the United States which taxes labor directly. Under that law the labor of the sailor is taxed 40 cents a month in order that he may be supported when sick or disabled. By the laws of the several States and the United States places are provided for persons who can not support themselves. Yet we found this man who has talked so eloquently about labor and about the laborer and the poor man standing up here and opposing the proposition to repeal that unjust law, and even coming forward to act as a teller in counting the votes of the House in order to defeat that proposition. All the liberal-minded men of the House on either side asked that this statute tax on labor be wiped out, and that the Government itself, which in fact receives directly and indirectly the benefits of commerce and of the services of these men, should pay the expenses of such institutions. But objection was made to it, and made from a source which I was very sorry to see, because it showed me that fine talk in favor of helping the condition of the laborer was one thing and votes upon the same subject was another thing.

I am in favor of doing everything we can to assist and elevate the labor of this land. Not only that, but whenever a proposition to that end is before the House, if I am here and do not vote in the direction in which I now speak, then I hope some gentleman will call my attention to it and throw in my face the remarks I now make, as he may well do. I shall do this because it is in the line for the elevation of humanity, because it is true statesmanship, and because I believe and know that the labor of this country is the foundation of all our success.

It has been said here that the tariff builds up manufacturing industries at the expense of the laborer and at the expense of the farmer. While my constituents are not all farmers, not all laborers, not all mechanics, but are people engaged in all of the various industries of the country, I stand here to-day and say that I do not believe a single word of that assertion. I know this assertion is incorrect and will combat it as long as I have power to be heard here or elsewhere.

The policy of this nation, and of all nations that have been successful in their careers, has been in the past based upon a tariff, and a tariff for protection. It is true that England, after she had arrived at that point in her career where she had become solely a manufacturing and commercial nation, saw fit to resort to free trade, and this change in policy was because she desired to reap the benefit of selling in this and other countries the products of her various manufacturing establishments. That is the truth of the matter, and the time will come when the actual facts will be demonstrated, if they are not fully known and understood now.

If it can be shown to be true that the farmer or the laborer is injured by the tariff, then I will vote for this bill, and so will any man who thinks rightly upon this subject. Let us see about this. A little more than a hundred years ago the people of this country wrested by force this land from the grasp of England herself.

And right here, lest I forget it, let me say that it makes me tremble when I hear men stand up here on this floor and advocate the principles of government which England has established. I am actually afraid of any policy or principle which the English Government advocates and asks us to adopt. We can well be afraid of it. The English Government is the enemy of labor and of our form of government and has been such enemy from time immemorial.

It is only necessary in confirmation of that statement to point to Ireland. England now has Ireland in her grasp, and has had for many years. The people of that unfortunate country are the most downtrodden and seemingly God-forsaken people in the world. They are not, however, forsaken by God, nor by the people of this land, nor by liberty-loving people all over the world. But England by its grasping, contemptible, and selfish policy has degraded Ireland to the lowest depths. The time will come, and I believe and hope it is not far distant, when Ireland, with the assistance of other nations, will have the power to rise up and shake off the odious yoke and assert her right to be a free nation. I am afraid of a country and of a people which will do such things as these, and I have a right to be afraid.

But let us see about the manufacturing establishments. As I said before, our people wrested this country from England when it was a wilderness, and with plains and prairies which then were unknown and were thought to be valueless. But the same skill, the same ambition, the same determination, and the same bravery which under great difficulties took this country from the grasp of England has made it to-day a garden. It is really a garden at this time in comparison with other portions of the world, although but a little time has elapsed since our childhood as a nation.

Our people swept the forests from the land in the Eastern States and in the Middle States and in some portions of the Southern States, and have made them fields of grain fit for the reaper's hook and the skilled machinery of the age. They have penetrated to the plains of the West, which were supposed to be valueless, and lo and behold! it has been discovered that those plains are most fertile and responsive and sympathetic to the farmer's manipulation; they are grain fields supplying the staple cereals for our people, and beyond this a large amount for the hungry of other nations. The rivers and streams were converted into power and bordered with manufacturing industries. The mountains were made to give forth of their inexhaustible stores of mineral and coal and other substances. The face of the land was made to blossom as a garden.

Now, when we have built up our manufacturing establishments all over this country, when we have made this country a farming country so that none like it exists in the world, when we have developed manufacturing capacity wonderful for the age, then England comes in again and says that she wants our markets, and that she wants them upon the same basis that we have them, without tax, without let or hinderance.

Why, Mr. Chairman, a nation is but a great family. A nation is but an aggregation of individuals. When you see a man who is not ambitious and determined enough to provide properly for the wants of himself and those who are dependent upon him, when he is not willing to work for their protection and advancement, he is unworthy of the name. When you see a family that does not work as a family for the mutual welfare of all its members you can safely say that family can not prosper. Now, I say that our nation is but a great, a grand, and a noble family. No more and no less.

Now, what does England want? After we have built our railroads, after we have erected our manufacturing establishments, after we have created by the sweat of our brows and by our mental superiority our great industrial establishments as well as our great agricultural facilities, she wants to come in and take away from us the trade that we have in this way built up. And she seeks this upon what basis? She does not propose to pay anything for this advantage. We must raise taxes from some source; we must have revenue from somewhere. If we do not take it from other nations who seek to trade with us we must take it directly from the citizens of our country.

But some gentlemen on the other side have said, "We are having too much taxation; we are raising too much money; our Treasury is full and overflowing." Why, sir, what mere talk this is; it is senseless gabble and without foundation in fact. I can not see, Mr. Chairman, that we have a right to talk in this way so long as we have upon our hands a debt of $1,500,000,000. "But," say some gentlemen, "let us fund that debt and hand it down to the future." I say no; you have no more right to transmit the national debt to the future for payment by your sons and your daughters and their successors in life than you have to leave upon your farm or other property incumbrances to be paid by your sons and your daughters which you had the ability to pay in your lifetime. Such a thing is simply an injustice upon the future generations. It is an attempt to ingraft into the financial management of this country the principle that the Government of England adopts in regard to its national debt. I am against such a thing from first to last, and shall be in all the future.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of having a market at home. I am in favor of raising our own agricultural products and making our own manufacturing products, so that we may have a market at home for both, and that there may be an equilibrium in the exchange of agricultural products and manufactured products. We have already come pretty near doing this, so far as the agricultural products of this country are concerned. Last year, with the exception of tobacco and cotton, we used in this country 92 per cent. of our agricultural products, and exported only 8 per cent. Now, if the manufacturing establishments of this country were sufficient to create a home market for the other 8 per cent. we would have a perfect equilibrium as to these two great branches of industry; and that is what we ought to have. For this purpose I am in favor of keeping up the taxes which we now receive. The greatest tax upon the products of the farmer and the manufacturer today in this country is the cost of getting the products to market. The time has come when all men of broad views, all men who think as they ought, regardless of political influence, should put their ability to the task of legislating in the direction of creating a commerce that shall carry abroad all the products we have for foreign nations. It is a shame to us that our products for exportation are obliged to go abroad in foreign bottoms and under the protection of foreign flags and pay large sums to Englishmen as freight upon it.

The present tariff law was passed only a year ago. It was passed after a long and toilsome fight, during which the people all over the country almost held their breath awaiting the result of the discussion and the vote upon it. And now, within even less than a year after the passage of that act, this body enters again upon a discussion of the tariff. The people all over this country are agitated and fearful. They are waiting to see what the result of our action may be. They know that the Democratic party has committed itself to the doctrine of free trade. Our manufacturing establishments have been erected, the money put into them has been invested upon the basis of the laws now in force, and while it may not be entirely accurate in a legal sense to say that a law passed under such circumstances is a contract between the lawmaker and those who go into business upon the faith of such legislation, it is almost true. I charge, and no man in this House can honestly deny the declaration, that the agitation of the tariff question at this time is purely for political purposes and nothing else. This, I say again, is the great danger of this country. Men should be broad enough to lift themselves above partisanship when they legislate here. While I have the right to be a Republican and my fellow-member has a right to be a Democrat I denounce the partisanship which prompts men to legislate on this floor presumably for the whole nation and yet in fact for the advancement and success of their political party.

You may take up and talk about the past acts of the political parties as much as you have a mind to, but you have no right to stand here on this floor and attempt to legislate and vote simply for the future advancement of your party. You have no right to do it, and any party that does it does it at its peril. You must understand that the people in this country can see, and they not only see but they see sharply. The laboring class, the voting communities of this country, are not ignorant and downtrodden like the voting and laboring classes of Europe. They are not that class of people; they see and think and know, and any party or any set of men who may come here and from day to day legislate in the interest of their party will be called to an account for it at the ballot-box in the future. and in the near future, too.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that wherever you find a manufacturing establishment you find thrift. I have in my own vicinity several that were erected but a little time ago, only a few years ago, and they are now the pride of our people and the foundation of our prosperity.

These manufacturing establishments employ at least 5,000 men and women. These men and women have houses, neat, comfortable, and clean; their families attend school and are being educated. They attend churches and Sabbath-schools; they are intelligent, high-minded people. All this was brought about by these manufacturing establishments in our midst.

But what more do we have? Well, these 5,000 people and more are laboring and receiving good wages. It is fair to say each one of them represents a family of at least three persons more, making 20,000 people in all who are supported by these industries. Well, what more? The farmers who compose the farming community around there on the shores of that beautiful lake find a home market for their produce with these 20,000 people who are gathered together in carrying on these manufacturing establishments. Twenty thousand people are there who furnish a home market for these farmers for nearly or quite all they raise. The value of lands around about Oswego, Fulton, and Auburn, where these manufacturing establishments are situated, have advanced rapidly on the basis of this market made at their very doors. The farmers are not obliged to rely on a distant market and pay heavy freights to get produce to New York or anywhere else. They hitch up their teams in the morning and drive into town and sell the produce of their farms to those people who are being employed and paid reasonable and proper wages. Now, Mr. Chairman, you can see here how these manufacturing establishments benefit the farmers in the vicinity.

But you say the tariff law upholds manufacturing establishments, and that the profits which they make are taken from labor and from the farm. I say it is not true. I say the facts do not show it. I have heard it stated on the floor of this House that the pay of the laborers of this country is not equivalent or equal to the pay given to the laborers in England. I say that is not true. I want to state one thing here, and a man ought not to be obliged to state anything else in order to refute that statement, so that it would not be again resurrected at any time or any place, and that is that last year 383,000 people came across the ocean from foreign lands and passed through Castle Garden in the city of New York. Will some gentleman whose opinion is not prejudiced tell me why it was those 383,000 people came over here and spread out all over this beautiful country of ours? If he answers truthfully, and he will when he is not excited, he will when he desires to speak the truth and is unprejudiced, say it is because the laboring man receives better wages in this country. And this fact alone is enough for me to state as a complete refutation of the statement that labor is better paid in Europe than here.

But, sir, we can go further upon this subject. Some men may say that these immigrants, these poor people, had heard of our liberty; that they had heard of our free Government. Thank God that is so. Thank God for the liberty of this country, and that the benefits and blessings which flow from this grand Government of ours not only go over our own land, which is broad and large, but the reputation of it goes all over the world. Every people in every enlightened land in the universe has heard of this grand Government of ours. But, Mr. Chairman, when people leave their homes and come to our land there are other considerations than our free Government which influence them. These considerations are that they are to be benefited by the change in more ways than this. They are to have better wages and better homes, better food, better clothing; their children are to have better opportunities for education and refinement here than under the governments of the Old World. They are influenced by all these and more.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, the love of country is inborn in a man, and like the spring on the mountain-side it bubbles and flows over and gives blessings and life to all around. We can see this principle in the people of Ireland, that down-trodden and oppressed people whose rights and liberties have all been taken away by grasping England. Here is a country and people that can not protect themselves from the greed of their oppressor, and her children are scattered all over the face of the earth seeking homes more congenial and governments more liberal. They come to our land and make new homes in this country, not because they dislike Ireland; not because the love for Ireland has died out in their hearts; but they left their old homes with that love, strong and vigorous, clinging to them, although it was a home in a shanty or sod house, and they came to this country because their children, because their people, because their wives and families would have better homes, schools, and a better chance in the race and struggle of life.

It is the hope of improving their condition that brings them; and they know that the child of a man who comes to this country and becomes a citizen of our Republic may become the highest and the best; that the possibilities are before him for grand achievement. If he stays in Ireland he will be but a serf in fact just so long as the iron hand of England can be kept upon him with safety.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact that my time is almost expended and that I must finish my remarks. However, I wish by a few extracts and a few remarks to show that our fathers in the past were in favor of a protective tariff.

It is very evident that our fathers when they laid the foundation of our Government laid it with the firm conviction that a protective policy was the true one for us to pursue.

We find in the Constitution this clause:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Now, what legislation followed this constitutional clause? What was done in regard to tariff legislation? We find that the second bill framed under it was a protective bill, and had the following heading or preamble:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement of protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

The doctrine of protection to our industries was fully recognized by Jefferson in his eighth annual message, wherein he said:

We must apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. Little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming will, under the freedom of labor from taxation, under protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent.

Thus Jefferson even sanctioned prohibitions. Tammany Hall from 1784 to 1824 repeatedly adopted high protective-tariff resolutions and bound its members by solemn pledges to wear no goods and use no implements or furniture which were not of domestic manufacture if the domestic article could at any price be procured.

Washington delivered his first inaugural clad in homespun, in order to emphasize the American doctrine of protection. Jefferson did the same.

This is what the fathers of the past said, and we see also that Tammany Hall, the hot-bed and nest-egg of Democracy, advocated for many years of the past the same sound doctrine.

If you will allow me a few moments I will show by actual and living tables and facts that our laborers are better paid here than in the Old World, and for this purpose I read from a table which showed the actual facts in this regard in 1883:

Weekly wages.

Occupation.	Newark, N.J.	Paisley, Scotland.
Cop-winders	$8 00	$3 50
Finishers	5 00	2 50
Rulers	8 00	4 25
Spoolers	8 00	3 25
Foremen	20 00	7 00
Pickers	7 00	4 12
Hank-winders	7 00	3 75

And now I will read to you the facts in regard to the wages paid to laborers in the ship-yards of the Clyde and the ship-yards of the United States in 1883. Robert B. Porter writes the New York Tribune that he found that the pay-roll of one of the leading Clyde ship-yards contained the names of 1,600 men during the last two weeks of November, 1883, including foremen and apprentices, and that the amount of the pay-roll for these two weeks was £4,000, or £2,000 per week. This gave an average for each man of $6.25 per week. The census of the United States for 1880 shows that there was paid out for wages in all kinds of ship-building in the United States in 1880 $12,800,000, which was divided among 21,330 hands employed, giving each about $600 per year, or nearly twice as much as is paid in the ship-yard on the Clyde.

I will also read an extract from the London Times to show what estimate the people put upon the effort in this country to inaugurate a system of free trade. This extract was printed in the paper named in July, 1880:

The United States do not approach the question from the same point of view as ourselves. The object of their statesmen is not to secure the greatest amount of wealth for the country generally, but to keep up by whatever means the standard of comfort among the laboring classes.

Here is an admission from free-trade England that the free-trade policy of its country is in the main intended to enrich the country, and at the same time that journal by inference admits that our protective policy is kept in force to lift up and keep up the laboring classes.

In order now to show by figures and not by talk merely that our farmers have been benefited by the present system of tariff, let us go back a little and examine the prices of farm produce. In 1816 our country so far as production was concerned was little more than a farming community, and as manufacturing grew up we will see by the following table how the value of farm products increased. As our home market increased by the building up of manufactories our farmer received an increase for his farm products and the laborer obtained a better price for his work.

Market price.

Wheat ..... bushel	$0 25 to $0 44	$1 42
Corn ..... bushel	12½ to 20	60

Sheep ..... per head	50 to 75	1 50 to 2 50
Farm labor ..... per month	3 00 to 8 00	12 00 to 25 00

Now, Mr. Chairman, from all this I say in conclusion that our protective policy is correct, and that the free-trade policy of the Democratic party is but the echo of English ideas, intended to break down our manufacturers and farmers and to cripple our laboring classes in their struggle for a higher life. I am in favor also of keeping up our present system, internal taxation on whisky and tobacco, until at least our national debt is paid.

If our country was like England in all its conditions, then free trade would be more reasonable; but it is not, and I hope never will be. Therefore I shall vote against the Morrison bill and any attempt at free trade or an approach to free trade.

The English system is the contrary of ours. It does not aim to protect labor, but to protect capital as distinguished from labor. It does not distribute wealth to the many, but to the few at the expense of the many. Its effect has been to accumulate wealth in the hands of capitalists, to make the rich man richer and the poor man still more poor, until they have arrived in England at a condition of society which quite justified one of her most able and gifted statesmen, when speaking of her people, in saying that "they had on the one hand a grand and magnificent aristocracy and on the other hand a double-headed pauperism."

Life is a struggle for a higher place, for a higher and a better existence. Each man, each family, and each nation struggles by itself. Each nation has its own principles for its foundation. Our nation is a free nation and it is getting to be a wise nation. We are happy and contented in knowing that the poor and oppressed of all lands, even to the furthermost part of the earth, have heard of and recognized our better government, and we are happy and proud that they come to our shores to seek the benefits of our form of government; and, Mr. Chairman, I feel it to be my duty to raise my voice and cast my vote against any policy or proposed law which shall mark us as having entered upon a career like that of England. We separated ourselves from England by force more than a hundred years ago because we did not like her form of government, and it is now our duty to keep the principles of English government and English policy from dragging us down to the level from which we extricated ourselves then. The American people will look with suspicion upon anything in the way of government principles which are recommended by England.

Let free trade remain on the banners of England, but let our policy be in all the years to come what it has been in the past. Let us seek to make a market here for all our products. Let us adhere to the policy of paying fair wages to the laborer, and let us stand by the idea that America is a government for Americans and for American ideas and principles. [Applause.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DUESTER].

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire herewith to give notice that after the pending bill shall have been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union I will offer the following amendment to it:

SEC. 3. And on and after the 1st day of July, 1884, no duty or rate of duty shall be levied, collected, or paid on any kind of raw material which may in any manner be consumed by the people or by the factories of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment for free raw materials deserves, I think, the full attention of this House as a serious step in the direction of a judicious and effective effacement of the incongruities of that part of our system of indirect taxation which touches our foreign commerce. It is beyond gainsay that at present our foreign commercial relations are in no manner satisfactory; they are, on the contrary, in such a precarious condition that, were it not for the export of our cereals and some other staples, the balance of trade would be overwhelmingly against us. With comparatively few exceptions, our manufactures, superior in their finish and quality to most of the manufactures of foreign nations, are yet by reason of their cost excluded from the foreign markets, and stagnation of business, as a consequence of fierce domestic competition and overproduction, stares us in the face. Our factories are closed only too frequently and for too great a length of time, and upon our workmen is thus thrown the burden and misery of involuntary idleness. They and their families are reduced to penury for the want of steady and remunerative employment, and however much they look about for relief, they are unable to obtain it. Not even in strikes can they find it. For in times of commercial stagnation strikes are more of a Godsend than of an injury to the manufacturer; they relieve him in part of his difficulties and make his struggle for the maintenance of his enterprises easier, by furnishing him a convenient occasion and pretext for the complete cessation of all unprofitable production. The assertion is of course out of the question that by an extended depression of trade the manufacturer is not injuriously affected. Yet it is undeniable that the injury which he suffers in times of commercial disturbance counts but slightly in comparison with that which falls upon his workmen. The recuperative power and tenacity of capital outlast the periods of commercial adversity, while on the other hand the laborer is confronted with beggary and starvation when once a great reduction or an entire stoppage of his wages takes place. But in spite of the fact that by the temporary loss of a market, and the consequent diminution of his sales, the manufacturer is less affected than his workmen, the damage which he must inevitably thereby sustain is sufficiently great to make to a considerable degree his interests akin to those of the workman, and thus both, as it were, by a common impulse look about for a cure of the evil which at this juncture presses upon them jointly. How they are to obtain this cure it is in the end, however, less for them than for us to determine; and appearances indicate, indeed, that their own opinions and wishes in respect to the choice of the proper remedy for their joint complaints are in no manner homogeneous. But whatsoever be the cure which in our wisdom we may apply to our present economic disorders, it will forever prove unavailing and inoperative, if it be not primarily directed to a judicious modification of the present tariff and to the destruction of the deleterious influence which this tariff exercises upon our foreign commerce, and as a friend of the workman as well as of the manufacturer I shall now strive to demonstrate this assertion.

A FEW WORDS ON BOUNTIES.

Our schedule of customs duties, as it stands at present and as it has stood since 1861, is based upon the irrational idea that our manufacturers deserve high bounties in the indirect form of high duties for the permanent maintenance of a domestic control of the domestic consumption, regardless of their ability or inability to enter foreign markets as competitors with the manufacturers of rival countries. For the purpose of creating a profitable and exclusive home market for our own manufacturers we are foolish enough to tax our people annually, indirectly, to an extent of $800,000,000, or to an amount of $16 a year for every man, woman, and child of our population, and by the imposition of exorbitant duties on raw materials we deprive at the same time even our protected manufacturers of every opportunity of successful competition outside of our own markets. Our customs legislation is so shortsighted that it protects everybody and everything for the sake of the mere maintenance of the principle of protection, and owing to its want of due discrimination it inflicts in reality a heavy damage upon the greater part of our industries and upon our people in general. By holding out to manufacturers the prospect of immense bounties and profits it has caused a disproportionately rapid and unhealthy spread of factories, and has thereby produced the glutting of our markets with a great excess of products, thus working out in part the very end which it was instituted to prevent—the lowering of the prices of our commodities to the level of the foreign quotations. In spite of all drawbacks it manifests, indeed, as its ultimate sequence, an odd but steady inclination toward reductions, not, however, toward reductions which harmonize with the conditions under which a healthy industrial production takes place, but rather toward forced reductions, which obtain their origin through the instrumentality of a wild and daring competition. It hurts in a twofold respect—it hurts the consumers in general by increasing unjustly the price of their commodities, and it hurts again the manufacturers, whom it allures into reckless enterprises by the deceptive prospect of large profits.

THE POSITION OF OUR MANUFACTURERS.

It is unfortunately true that we have among us manufacturers who are so wedded to the idea of commercial isolation that they will never think the effects of our tariff other than beneficial, but without exception this class of manufacturers represents the most heavily protected interests. It fears the loss of bounties varying from 100 to 150 per cent. of the value of its protected products. Such manufacturers, among whom figure prominently those of chemicals and of the steel industry, find it hard to surrender their golden monopolies, and instead of losing their bounties, they prefer rather that, by mutual accord, their factories be closed for months, in order that thus their production might be accommodated to the demands and needs of the home markets. It matters little to them if through their selfishness they throw out of employment thousands of workmen. Their workmen may seek other employment or starve. Work is plentiful and cheap, but privileges are hard to acquire and precious, and therefore they cling to their privileges.

But there is a larger class of manufacturers which looks upon our tariff from a different point of view and which commands enough sense and experience to comprehend the advantages of a foreign market, and this class consists principally of those whose profits are lessened by heavy domestic competition. These manufacturers perceive that our tariff policy involves simply an inhibition to them to export the surplus of their products, that it lays, in fact, an embargo upon their export trade in home manufactures. They recognize the necessity and desirability of a full and free competition with the factories of other countries, and in order to gain an access to the foreign markets they hold themselves in readiness to accept from the hands of the American Congress the liberation of raw materials from duty, knowing quite well that, if once in the possession of this privilege, they will be able to control the foreign markets by the superiority of their products. They see that bounties furnish no safeguard against domestic competition, and to save themselves and their workmen from ruin, they are willing to surrender whatever advantages they now enjoy under our tariff in exchange for the full and unrestricted privilege of free raw materials.

THE CONDITIO SINE QUA NON.

Cheap raw materials are the first prerequisite of cheap production and successful competition. High-priced raw materials will inevitably limit our manufactures to the outlets which we possess in this country; whereas with cheap raw materials we would be able to compete in foreign markets with every other commercial nation. With high-priced raw materials we have either to stop production until a reviving demand sets our works into renewed motion, or we must continue it with the prospect of bankruptcy. To compete successfully with the manufacturing industries of Europe, it is but requisite that our manufacturers be enabled to acquire all kinds of raw materials upon terms equally favorable with those upon which Great Britain, Germany, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Switzerland obtain theirs. The superiority of our means of production is such that our industries need no protection to enable them to profitably compete with those of Europe, if they share once with the European industries the joint advantage of cheap raw materials. Our exports in cotton goods are sufficient evidence of this fact, and the same also holds good of all articles in which the skill and the inventive genius of the American workman come into play. In fact, wherever the value of the work bears a high relation to the value of the raw material, there we can even at this moment freely compete with foreign nations. Especially is this so in the case of machinery, tools, hardware, and fire-arms. Though they are protected by rates varying from 50 to 175 per cent., the superiority of American workmanship is yet able to overcome these burdens. Wherever labor largely preponderates in the combined value of labor and materials, there we excel.

A CASE IN POINT.

The manufacture of woolen goods is one of our most important industries, and if we are in search of a striking display of the injurious effect of a tax on raw materials, we need merely study its present condition.

The tariff charges on fine woolen goods are from 45 to 75 per cent.; on low goods from 100 to almost 150 per cent. Yet this high rate of duty on certain classes of woolens hardly enables their manufacturers to save themselves from bankruptcy. Certain goods of Berlin fabrication undersell American goods which are protected by a duty of more than 90 per cent. Cloth which costs in Berlin 75 to 80 cents meets the American article at double the price, and this because it is made of wool which costs here on the average about 35 cents in the grease, while the Berlin manufacturer can use colonial wools at a little over half that cost. This sufficiently explains why we can not compete. If we were to abolish the tariff on wool, and if we were to provide other cheap untaxed mill supplies, we should be amply protected by a tariff on woolens of from 25 to 35 per cent. As the matter stands, we find, however, no protection at 90 per cent., and our pernicious taxation of raw wool results merely in the gradual crippling of the woolen manufacture.

By the exclusion of a sufficiently cheap supply of foreign wools our manufacturers are in fact already compelled to make nearly all one line of goods, from cheap to middling. Had we, however, cheap foreign wools, the case would be different; then we could readily manufacture a variety of cloths and woolen goods, and all of our woolen factories would find useful occupation. But as nearly all of our factories are now obliged to make the same class of goods and to use the same class of wool, competition becomes well-nigh destructive of our woolen industry.

Fine goods are admitted into our ports at much lower rates than the coarser woolens, because the specific rate is the same on the finest woolens as on the commonest shoddy and cotton fabric. Against such a discrimination in favor of foreign goods fine woolen goods can of course not be manufactured in our factories, and we are therefore now annually importing them to the extent of $40,000,000—a sum which, if brought to the valuation of American woolen goods, will be about equal to $75,000,000 (adding duty, commission, freight, and the importer's profit), or to nearly 30 per cent. of the value of the entire production of our woolen mills. That we should be confronted by such a condition of things, is certainly strong evidence of the hurtful character of our tariff; but even if we were audaciously to disregard it and to attempt now the manufacture of fine woolen goods as a mere experiment, we would soon be compelled by this very tariff to desist from it.

THE TARIFF ON WOOL AND ITS BENEFICIARY.

The question may fairly be raised whether it is the farmer who is protected by the wool tariff. But the answer is an emphatic "no." The farmer and the sheep-raiser by no means represent the same interest, and a correct view of the case must convince the farmer that he is the loser in the game. We raised in the year of the last census 35,000,000 sheep, distributed among 4,000,000 of farmers, and if we make an even distribution, each American farmer will have to be credited with the raising of nine sheep. These nine sheep give about fifty-five pounds of raw wool, and at a protection of twelve cents the farmer receives a bounty of $6.60. But his clothing and woolen-wear cost him on the average $50, or twice as much as he would need under a reign of free wool. In woolen goods he pays, therefore, a tax of $25 from his earnings, while his supposed gains from sheep-raising average only $6.60. The large wool-growers, whose interest is concentrated in comparatively few localities, where land costs but little, use the millions of farmers who produce little wool merely as convenient instruments for procuring their own chestnuts safely from the fire. The burdens which every farmer has to carry as a consumer of woolen goods are at least four times as high as the amount of the bounty which he would obtain from the tariff for his wool if all sheep raised in the United States were equally divided among all the farmers. This kind of protection to the farmer is like saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung-hole.

FOREIGN WOOL IN ITS RELATION TO DOMESTIC WOOL.

For sheep-farming our climate is by no means more inclement than the climate of Great Britain and Germany; yet, in the absence of any protection for wool, Great Britain raises annually 30,000,000 of sheep and Germany 24,000,000. Besides, both these countries let in the cheap wools of Australia, the Cape, and South America, and they use them with their more costly domestic wools to the advantage of their woolen industry as well as of their wool-growers. Indeed, the number of sheep of Great Britain varied but little during the ten years previous to 1880, though the imports of wool into that country have increased nearly 50 per cent. Of late, however, a slight decrease in sheep-raising has taken place in England, owing to a change in the style of ladies' dress goods. So long as the desire for worsteds kept up a large demand for British fleeces, the price of British wool was far above that of foreign wool, and the same, too, would be the case with those of our wools which are materially different from colonial wools. With a good and cheap supply of them for mixing, they would only add to the demand for our domestic wool and they would keep up its price rather than diminish it. The multiplied means of rapid locomotion have brought the vast pasture-lands of transoceanic continents almost to the very door of the English wool-spinner. Still, the British wool prices take no violent jumps like those of our own wool. The unknown quantity of a foreign supply acts in the British markets invariably as a safety-valve against the high-pressure power of the speculator; while our own wool prices, on the contrary, show the natural influence which a protective tariff must forever exercise on inland prices—violent fluctuations, with a tendency toward the maximum line, that is, to the foreign price at the place of export, besides duties and charges.

A HINT AS TO THE PROPORTIONS OF A TAX ON RAW MATERIALS.

The wool clip of the United States, taking the highest estimate, amounts to about 280,000,000 pounds, and averaging the whole, high and low grades, at 30 cents a pound, we obtain for it an aggregate value of $85,000,000. Our woolen industry, on the other hand, represents, if we include in it the manufacture of ready-made clothing, woolen shirts, cloaks, and the like, an aggregate value of over $500,000,000, and its very existence is based on the liberal supply of cheap raw wool. Our woolen factories employ 167,000 persons, and in the manufacture of ready-made clothing and other kindred industries there is besides an additional number of fully 250,000 persons employed. Thus manufacturing interests of a value of over $500,000,000 and the daily bread of nearly half a million of working people depend alone upon this single staple. A tax of 10 cents a pound on raw wool amounts for our entire clip to only $28,000,000, and were we to change it into a bounty of 10 cents a pound on raw wool and to admit wool and its substitutes free, we would at once give a new impetus to our woolen industry and to our commerce. A tax on raw materials is not like a tax on finished goods; it is equal to its own amount, plus the usual percentage of gross profit, multiplied by the number of procedures through which the raw material has to pass until it reaches the consumer in the finished state. A protection of $28,000,000 on wool keeps swelling and swelling at each intermediate stage until the protected wool reaches the consumer, and when it reaches him in its most finished state this protection will not fall far below $100,000,000, without giving any adequate advantage to manufacturer, workman, and consumer. On the contrary, it sacrifices their joint interests to those of the producer of the raw material—of the very person to whom it is always given to easily keep his product within the limits of the general demand.

WAGES IN THE WOOLEN INDUSTRY.

In woolens wages on the average are now about 30 per cent. higher in the United States than in England, and in England about 20 to 35 per cent. higher than in France and fully 50 per cent. higher than in Germany. The actual difference between the wages of the operatives of the British and those of our own woolen mills can, however, best be ascertained from the following table:

SOME FIGURES ON THE TRADE IN WOOLENS.

As regards the export of woolens, it is a significant fact that England, having the advantage of free wool, is far ahead of her rivals, and especially so much so of the United States that our own export to the pitiable amount of $400,000 appears like the most cutting sarcasm on our tariff. But let the actual figures of the export and import of woolen goods and yarns for the year 1881 speak for themselves:

	Imports.	Exports.
England	$35,000,000	$103,000,000
Germany	25,000,000	64,000,000
France	19,500,000	82,000,000
United States	38,000,000	400,000

The English woolen exports in 1865 were still higher; for that year they reached the value of $122,000,000 as against a value of $103,000,000 in 1881. But though they exceed very considerably those of France and Germany, they have experienced latterly a marked decline, and this mainly through a change in fashion, by which hard lustrous goods, in which the English woolen mills excelled those of all other mills, were temporarily set aside. Compared with the utter insignificance of our own export figures, the British woolen export is, however, still simply gigantic, and it will likely retain its present volume indefinitely, if we should not now conclude to undermine it by the very force through which it obtained its wonderful growth and development—free raw materials. Through their agency alone it was enabled to take possession of the markets of the world, and there is no reason why this supremacy may not permanently be wrested from it by American rivalry, if to the American woolen mills the privilege of free raw wool be but once given.

LABOR AND THE TARIFF.

On the part of the highly protected class of our manufacturers the argument is frequently used that through the tariff the condition of the American laborer is elevated far above that of his European competitor; that by virtue of the protective system he enjoys the enviable privilege of high wages, and consequently ease and comfort. But nothing of the kind happens in reality. The last person whom the tariff laws protect or ever were intended to protect is in reality the laborer; for they fail to protect him against injurious competition, and through unbounded competition his wages are lowered to almost the level of the European labor market. The men and women employed in the protected industries can not close their eyes to the circumstance that their wages are lower than those paid in the non-protected industries, and they are apt to draw their own conclusions from this significant fact.

Thus, on the basis of the last census, the average annual wages per hand in the protected industries are as follows:

Iron, steel, and iron-ore mining	$376 40
Woolen manufactures	293 05

Our workmen can not but see in the face of such figures that the protected manufacturer alone reaps the bounties of the tariff; that he alone pockets the money which the people lose. Owing to the tariff the mine-owner of Pennsylvania amasses riches, but not the miner. The monkey uses the cat's paw to get the chestnuts out of the fire and kindly gives to the victim the shells.

In farming, which is an unprotected industry, the laborer receives about twice as much, board included, in Wisconsin as in England. In several of the protected industries, on the contrary, it is otherwise; there the wages of our operatives are lower than those of the British workmen. Thus the American consul at Manchester (September, 1882) reported the average wages in English cotton-mills at $251 per year, for fifty-six hours a week; while, on the contrary, the average wages of American cotton-mills amounted, according to the census of 1880, to but 80 cents per day, or to $248 for 310 days—less money for more hours; and there has since been a reduction of fully ten per cent. And similar facts are to an equal extent also shown by the American and British woolen and iron industries.

Were we, therefore, but materially to modify our tariff by the free admission of raw materials, our wages could not fail to experience, in consequence of increased production, rather a decided increase than a diminution. They could not then, as now, remain comparatively stationary. In Great Britain there has been in the course of the last thirty years an increase in wages to the sum of nearly 70 per cent., but with us this same increase has only amounted to 28 per cent. In 1850 our average annual earnings in all manufactures amounted to $245; after ten years of low duties they rose then to $289 in 1860, or 17 per cent.; in 1870 they stood further at $302; and in 1880 they were at the highest point, $346. Since then, however, they have again fallen 20 per cent., and it is even questionable whether they now exceed much the average of $300.

Wages ought, moreover, to be judged by their purchasing power. To compute them by the dollar sign is as erroneous and as difficult as it is to calculate the Copernican from the Ptolemaic system. Our dollar has been a changeable value, buying more at one time than at another, and it is by no means a true measure for a fixed value—that of the cost of the living of the workman. But making allowances for its commercial fluctuations during the various periods of protection, it had, when received by the laborer in the form of wages, nevertheless an indestructible value according to which it could buy:

The value of the dollar, as will be readily perceived, is changed all through this list, and it does not buy the same amount of goods, board, or rent at any two of the above periods.

WAGES AND CONSUMPTION.

Poor business presses down prices, and wages are reduced. Good times, on the other hand, raise prices. Nevertheless wages are seldom raised with the rise of the price of commodities. In most cases their rise has to be forced, and the consequence is less consumption and strikes. The year 1860 is a year of a low tariff, but in 1861 prices are beginning to rise greatly, in consequence of tariff charges. See, therefore, the result in consumption per capita:

Years.	Tea.	Coffee.	Sugar.	Cereals.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Bushels.
1860	0.84	5.8	29.6	38.68

1865	0.48	2.8	16.8	31.43
1866	1.16	4.7	27.6	36.67

These few figures tell more than volumes of argument against the fallacy of the attempt to raise the condition of the workman by raising prices through tariff legislation. The slightest change in the value of money falls most severely on the working classes. A rise in prices pinches them to that extent that they at once are compelled to reduce their daily rations in tea, coffee, sugar, and bread.

A tax on raw materials in wool, iron, coal, dye-stuffs and the like is, besides, apt to increase the prices of manufactures disproportionately, and it makes, in consequence, the dollar of the workman less valuable. This may be seen from the following table, in which a pound of scoured wool is followed up until it goes into the possession of the workman:

UNDER FREE RAW MATERIALS.

UNDER OUR PRESENT TARIFF ON RAW MATERIALS.

Clothing manufacturer	2 35	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	50	2 85
Clothing dealer	2 85	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	70	3 55

Under both systems I allow the same percentage of profits to the manufacturers and dealers, and still under a protection of raw materials the workman has to pay out of his wages for every pound of wool and other protected raw materials which enter into the process of turning the wool into cloth, $1.43 more than he would pay if raw materials were not taxed. The 50 cents' worth of wool and 25 cents' worth of chemicals, coal, &c., cost him $2.18 instead of the original price of 75 cents. The tariff charges of 55 cents grow to $1.30 in a single yard of cloth.

EXTREME CHARGES.

The tariff rates on many manufactures, especially in the woolen line, seem extreme. Knit-goods, for instance, composed wholly or in part of wool or worsted, pay at present a specific and an ad valorem duty averaging 70 per cent.—an exorbitant tax on so necessary an article of clothing as an undershirt, a cardigan jacket, a knitted shawl, or the like. Surely, the manufacturer of knit-goods must roll in wealth. But even the yarns used in these goods have exactly the same rate of duty to pay; 70 per cent. on yarns wholly or in part of wool or worsted. There are three parts falling to the material and one part to the labor in the composition of the value of these woolens, and it may, therefore, be imagined what great margin of profit is left to the manufacturer and what margin of profit and protection to the workman after all these exorbitant charges have been paid—charges which are heaped upon American manufacture over and above the price which foreign competition has to pay. Yarn comes next in importance to raw wool, and we tax it with 70 per cent. a pound, while protective Germany has a tariff of but 2½ cents (24 marks per 100 kilograms) on a pound of full worsted yarn, or a duty of a little over 4 per cent. (against our 70 per cent.), if we take 60 cents (the average value for 1880 of British exports of woolen yarns) as a basis of comparison. Nevertheless German manufacturers are little pleased with a taxation of their yarn, however slight, and energetic complaints are found in the reports of various German chambers of commerce. They ought to feel comforted, however, when they look upon the 70 per cent. tax which rests now on the raw material of our manufactures of worsteds, knit-goods, gimps, and trimmings of all kinds.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF OUR COMMERCE.

The present stagnation of our commerce, Mr. Chairman, is too eloquent a monitor of reform to go unheeded by us. It presses upon us the necessity of a new industrial development, and tends to remind us that we must henceforth have free raw materials and go abroad and study the wants, the tastes, the modes of business of foreign countries and adapt ourselves to them. The opening of new markets for the surplus which can not be consumed at home is obviously our most pressing need. And almost at our doors exist markets which only our own folly and stupidity have prevented us from monopolizing; they stand prepared to take our surplus cotton, woolen and glass manufactures, our iron and steel raw and wrought, our leather and paper. A possible market of $250,000,000 exists in South America, but at present we occupy only one-tenth of it. The West Indies import more than $115,000,000, but they take only $31,000,000 from this country. Canada obtains only one-third of her purchases from us, and the same proportion holds in Mexico and the Central-American States. On the American continent alone, then, in the aggregate lies open to us a market for our manufactures of at least $500,000,000. And none of the nations included in this survey, save perhaps Canada, are manufacturing nations; therefore they would not under a reign of freer trade compete with our domestic industries. They would take our manufactured products, if only we would take from them their raw materials. But this our tariff forbids foolishly and blindly. We refuse the cheap raw materials which would enable us through a low cost of production to monopolize these markets.

THE JUGGLE OF THE LAST REVISION.

It is claimed by the protectionists that the last revision of the tariff involves reductions which ought to satisfy the country for some years. How far, however, this claim is justified may appear from a review of the schedule relating to metals.

The value of metal and of the products of the industries in which metals are supplies of chief value amounted in the year of the recent census to $943,000,000. Of a total production to the value of $3,700,000,000 of actual manufactures the metal industries covered just 25.5 per cent., and employed besides 535,000 hands, or 23¼ per cent. of all the hands employed in the various manufacturing industries of the country. Thus out of every hundred dollars' worth of our manufactures twenty-five dollars' worth is principally composed of metals, and out of every hundred persons employed in manufactures twenty-three find a livelihood in metal works of some kind, and I can therefore appropriately single out this industry in illustration of the inadequate tariff reductions of the last year. A look at the old and new schedule puts the case as follows:

1. The old tariff lays a tax of 20 per cent. on iron ore, and this tax is about equivalent to 57 cents a ton. The new tariff, on the contrary, raises this tax to 75 cents. The average invoice value of foreign ore in 1872 was $2.08, duty (20 per cent.) 41¾ cents; in 1873, $2.25, duty (20 per cent.) 45 cents; in 1875, $2.57, duty (20 per cent.) 51½ cents; in 1878, $2.14, duty (20 per cent.) 43 cents; in 1882, $2.86, duty (20 per cent.) 57 cents. A duty of 41¾ cents was thus sufficient in 1872 to protect the great industrial skill required in ore-digging; ten years later, however, under an advance of foreign-ore prices, 57 cents did not protect, and the duty had to be raised to 75 cents.

2. Pig-iron, $6.72 a ton—old tariff, $7; a reduction of 28 cents.

3. Steel rails, $17 a ton—old tariff, $28; a reduction of $11.

The foreign price of steel rails in December last was from £5 to £5.55, or $25. Considering that the English price ten years ago was $80, a tariff of $28 was less out of proportion than a duty of $17 is on a cost price of $25.

4. Bar-iron, sheet-iron, and boiler-iron show small reductions from the old specific rate. But these reductions are hardly worth mentioning in the face of the fact that since the fixing of the old rates a great decline in foreign prices has taken place. The new rates average fully 75 per cent.

5. Manufactures of iron are raised from 35 per cent. to 45 per cent.

6. Manufactures of copper and steel remain stationary.

7. Manufactures of lead, tin, and zinc are raised from 35 per cent. to 45 per cent. ad valorem.

8. Manufactures of gold, silver, and platina are finally again raised from 40 per cent. to 45 per cent. ad valorem.

So far as metals are concerned these figures can not but clearly make it apparent that there is not the faintest trace of a reform to be discovered in the tariff act of March 3, 1883; and if its other schedules, especially that of woolens, were subjected to a like analysis, a similar condition of things would also be further laid bare. If, indeed, the present tariff embodies any reforms, they are certainly all in favor of a limited class of manufacturers. Otherwise it could not in the single item of pig-iron give now an annual bounty of $16,000,000 to the iron-masters of Pennsylvania, while at the same time it gives to the Government from the same article but a revenue of $613,000. The bounty of the iron-master and the revenue of the Government appear now in the ratio of $26 to $1, but still the Pennsylvania iron-master is not yet fully satisfied.

THE GROWTH AND THE TENACITY OF THE EVIL.

Our first tariff was enacted in 1789, and it granted on the average a protection of 3½ per cent., as against a present average protection of 43 per cent. Steadily the monopoly of the tariff has been gaining ground in this country, and with its increasing strength its burdens have become more onerous and oppressive. In 1789 the manufacturers of Pennsylvania declared that their iron and steel industries were on the point of a permanent establishment and that they needed only a slight encouragement for a brief time. They received then this encouragement in the form of a duty of 7½ per cent. on iron and of about $11 a ton on steel, and they grew rich on that. But their very prosperity was soon an incentive to them to seek a continuance of their bounty, and regardless of its originally temporary character, they have, by the exercise of as much ingenuity as effrontery, managed to maintain it up to the present time, and even at highly increased figures, so that they enjoy now duties running from 20 to 100 per cent. Cotton manufacture originally only needed to be protected by a duty of 5 per cent.; to-day, however, it is, oddly enough, standing in need of duties which run from 35 to 55 per cent. The woolen manufacture was said to be firmly established in 1810; it only desired then a protection of from 5 to 22½ per cent. "for a year or two longer." But that time lies now far behind us, and seventy years besides, and still this same industry requires a protection of from 40 to nearly 150 per cent.; and so on to the end of the chapter. The monopoly of the tariff has fastened itself so strongly upon us that it will ever resist the least attempt at its dislodgment. It has too long fattened at the expense of the bone and sinew of the country, at the expense of our producing population, ever to be suspected of the least inclination for the voluntary surrender of its prey. It will cling to its traditions and it will forever resist reductions.

THE NEED OF THE HOUR.

But these reductions will nevertheless have to be made, although it would be unwise to effect them with one sweeping stroke of the pen. The time has come for a sound discrimination in our customs legislation between necessities and luxuries and between a necessary and an unnecessary protection of manufactures. Our people will no longer submit to a duty of only 10 per cent. on diamonds as against one of 100 per cent. on blankets. They will no longer submit to a duty of but 35 per cent. on laces, as against a duty of 60 per cent. on fine sugar. They rather desire a reversion of this order of things, and a removal of duties from all the commodities which enter largely into the consumption of the household. They care not though a duty of 150 per cent. be levied on the diamonds which go to enhance the attractions of the wife and the daughters of the millionaire; in view of the fiscal requirements of the Treasury, they would, on the contrary, consider such a duty but just, and they would in no manner demur were it increased to that figure. But when they are asked to sacrifice two-fifths of their yearly earnings in the form of duties on their clothing, their salt, their sugar, their rice, their coal, and other necessities, they show signs of revolt and disgust. Now that the coffers of the Government are full, our consumers begin to incline to the opinion that they should obtain relief from the heavy taxation of the past, and while they have no desire that Congress should suddenly so change the tariff as to affect thereby in any wise the prosperous existence of any manufacturing industry, they insist upon a swift abolition of all legal provisions which tend at present to give life and support to monopolies. The people will no longer tolerate a system of customs duties which enables a single knit-goods factory, as has recently been the case in Connecticut, to declare for one year a dividend of 86 per cent. on its shares, while at the same time it apportions to its workmen in wages but the pittance of $1.25 a day.

WHAT FREE RAW MATERIALS WILL DO FOR US.

Not the workman is to be hurt by a judicious revision of the tariff, but merely that class of manufacturers which now enjoys bounties running to 100 and 200 per cent. If the modification of our tariff could only extend as far as I would wish that it should reach, were it once and for all to establish the exemption of raw materials from taxation, I doubt not that in that case a new era in our industrial activity would be opened—an era of prosperity, not alone for the manufacturer but much more for the workman. Were our manufacturers but enabled to procure the cheap raw materials which Great Britain puts at the door of her manufacturers, they would thereby at once obtain an entrance to the rich field of foreign competition, and by the great possibilities which this field offers to them their factories would become sources of ever-flowing wealth and remunerative earnings to themselves as well as to their workmen.

The entire American continent ought surely to be tributary to the factories of the United States, and it ought not to be within the province of human power to prevent such a dependence; for the closer proximity of the United States to the entrepôts of the Central and South American trade gives our manufacturers an immense advantage in time and in the cost of transportation. But in spite of this high natural advantage, the trade of those sections of the American continent is now diverted to European channels. Through the agency of our own injudicious tariff, which by its taxation of raw materials annihilates every advantage that might accrue to us from our geographical position, all our enterprise in those regions is now hopelessly stifled, and our merchants are thus debarred from an active participation in the trade of more than one-half of the American continent. They can not use to advantage the wool and other raw materials of South and Central America, and neither can they undersell their British and German competitors, who are at home possessed of the privilege of free, or nominally free, raw materials, and who are by this means put ahead of all American competition.

Unpalatable as the fact is, we must attribute to our tariff alone the commercial conquest of an immense portion of this continent by European nations, and unless we are now ready to change this tariff so that it will let in free of duty every species of raw material, we will have to continue indefinitely our acknowledgment of a foreign commercial supremacy in a hemisphere where none but an American political and commercial predominance ought to be tolerated. Under such an emergency it would seem that there can be but one course open to us, and whether we view it from an optimistic standpoint or not, it will leave us no alternative but that of a judicious modification of our present tariff. And the means of this modification I present, I think, in my amendment, which aims to bring about not only a just, but also a simple, solution of the tariff problem and of the economic disorders to which our present system of customs duties has given rise. If my proposition be but accepted by the House, I have no doubt that it will prove a real boon not only to the workman and the manufacturer, but also to the merchant and the consumer, and, on the whole, it involves perhaps the only efficacious means for the extension and revival of our commerce and our manufacturing industries.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now yield a minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. I only desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that by some mistake on yesterday I was unintentionally deprived of ten minutes of my time, which I wish now to reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the exact time of which the gentleman from Georgia was deprived is nine minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to reserve that time.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] yielded me the ten minutes of his hour which he did not occupy. I desire to yield that time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I have asked the attention of the House because I desire to place myself clearly on the record in support of the bill now under consideration.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing more certain in the political situation than that we are fast approaching a low tariff period in our history. War tariffs will be relegated to the past as surely as there are intelligence and patriotism in the land. Many of the more clear-sighted and independent of the Republican leaders have recognized the fact and are already showing signs of a change of front upon this question. There are members, however, of the minority upon this floor who from long association, and perhaps conviction, are faithfully engaged in an endeavor to uphold and perpetuate a war system of taxes which, with all due respect to them, is plainly unsuited to the changed condition of the country.

But if they are consistent protectionists, what will those gentlemen say to the declared policy of the administration of President Arthur—a policy which it has been compelled to adopt in deference to the demand of the country for freer commerce and foreign markets? A policy abating the principle of protection, one which will affect the revenues accruing from customs duties, and it is in harmony, so far as the treaty-making power goes, with the legislation proposed in this bill by the Democratic party in the House.

The reciprocity treaty already negotiated with Mexico and the commercial agreements foreshadowed with Spain and other powers are in accord with the policy of this bill. The effect of these reciprocity treaties is to reduce the revenues arising from duties on imports and to open new markets for our products and manufactures. And the Mexican treaty, in certain respects, goes further than this bill, by admitting articles free which enter into competition with our own products, a list of which articles I submit in an appendix.

The prosperity of commercial nations, Mr. Chairman, depends upon reciprocity, and to this end is directed the tariff policy of the Democrats of the House. Those opposing this policy stand in the way of the commercial progress of the United States; and it will be curious to note the attitude of Republican members upon the subject of the proposed treaties should any of them require the legislation of this Congress.

And what will be said of the messages of President Arthur? In 1881 the President declared—

> In view, however, of the heavy load of taxation which our people have already borne we may well consider whether it is not the part of wisdom to reduce the revenues, even if we delay a little the payment of the debt. It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden, and that by due economy in the various branches of the public service this may be readily afforded.

In 1882 the President said:

> I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed. And though there have always been among our people wide differences of sentiment as to the best methods of raising the national revenues, and indeed as to the principles upon which taxation should be based, there has been substantial accord in the doctrine that only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government. Of late the public revenues have far exceeded that limit, and unless checked by appropriate legislation such excesses will continue to increase from year to year. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, the surplus revenue amounted to $100,000,000; for the fiscal year ended 30th of June last the surplus was more than $145,000,000. The report of the Secretary shows what disposition has been made of these moneys. They have not only answered the requirements of the sinking fund, but have afforded a large balance applicable to other reductions of the public debt.
> It was made apparent in the course of the animated discussions which this question aroused at the last session of Congress that the policy of diminishing the revenue by reducing taxation commanded the general approval of the members of both Houses. I regret that because of conflicting views as to the best methods by which that policy should be made operative none of its benefits have as yet been reaped.

What will gentlemen on the other side say to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, which demonstrate that the surplus revenues are too great and that the taxes are too high and ought to be reduced?

This bill is but the direct answer to the information coming from the Treasury. It was so stated at the outset of this debate by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when the measure was introduced to the House, and during this long discussion I have not heard that statement questioned.

No one on either side undertakes openly to quarrel with the proposition that taxation should be reduced, but some of the objectors to this measure declare for a reduction of taxes only upon spirits and tobacco—taxes voluntarily paid upon articles which are in the nature of luxuries. Others would go so far as to postpone any attempt at reduction as inopportune owing to alleged political considerations of a Presidential year. The best politics assuredly is a faithful performance of duty to the people at all times. There is now upon us a time of business adversity, during which industry and labor are made to suffer. It is now, if ever, that overtaxation bears heavily and demands the attention of the representatives of the people. Eleven years ago came the paper-money panic and the depression which continued till the resumption of specie payments in 1879. Then trade began to revive. In 1880 the pendulum swung back, and about the middle of 1881 the country reached the highest point of business prosperity; but during the year 1882 and 1883 the depression in commercial, financial, and manufacturing business steadily increased. Imports decreased, and so did immigration. Production has now in 1884 overtaken consumption, trade languishes, the least favored mills begin to show signs of distress—hence lower wages. And is it at such a time as this that Congress will refuse to reduce unnecessary taxes?

And have gentlemen noticed the recent communication of the Secretary of State in relation to the bill for the support of the diplomatic and consular services, in which he says among other things:

> With a production greater than we can consume, which must seek foreign markets, it is vitally important to sustain a sufficient and well-compensated diplomatic and consular service.

A Republican Secretary of State says, "With a production greater than we can consume, which must seek foreign markets." This, Mr. Chairman, is indeed a concession coming from a Republican State Department.

Which section of the Republican party more properly represents the needs of the country? Is it the administration, speaking through its President and Secretary of the Treasury, and now through the Secretary of State, or the minority in this House?

It is apparent to the country to-day that the only branch of the Government in the hands of the opposite party and having relation to commercial regulations—I mean the treaty-making power—is now undertaking a revenue reform by treaty, while the House, the only branch of the Government now in the hands of the Democratic party, is proposing a similar and more effective reform by legislation. This means, Mr. Chairman, that the spirit of tariff reform has gone beyond the control of either party, and can only be repressed for a time by combinations of minorities.

THE EFFECT UPON WAGES.

The alleged harmful effect of tariff reform upon wages has been a political argument long in use, and I suppose will continue to be employed by politicians. It is in fact a political argument merely, having no foundation either in common experience or the teachings of political economy. Suppose, however, it be true—which it is not—that American wages are to be injuriously affected by the reduction of duties or the admission of articles free of duty, why, then, does the Republican party undertake to accomplish that very thing by treaty?

The truth is that the rate of wages can not be raised or lowered by legislation any more than by treaties. The American rate of wages was higher than the European rate under the Walker revenue-tariff period between 1847 and 1860, just as it has remained comparatively higher under the Morrill war tariff between 1861 and 1884. England's rate of wages under the most absolute free trade has remained higher than the rates on the continent of Europe. There is no system of taxation, whether protective, low tariff, or free trade even, that will ever reduce the American wages to the level of the English or continental rates. This is not a matter to be regulated by customs laws.

In every country an infinite variety of causes contributes to fix the rate of wages, the character of its institutions, as well as the conditions, customs, and requirements of the people, and above all the power of organization and association among workingmen. But we have a familiar example constantly before us which emphatically contradicts the statement that tariffs establish the rates of wages. It is this: Under a uniform system of tariff duties applying to every port of entry in the country, and although articles are admitted at the same rate of duty in New Orleans and in New York, and Boston as in San Francisco, there are in each of these places different rates of wages, varying in each case with the cost of living in the locality.

Cheaper cost of living, resulting from freer commerce and foreign markets, diversifying the employment of labor, stimulating national industries, would indeed be beneficial to wages throughout the country.

REVENUE REFORM BY LEGISLATION PREFERABLE TO REFORM BY TREATIES OF RECIPROCITY.

It is with a certain satisfaction that Democrats are witnessing the Department of State return to the policy of Democratic Presidents and Secretaries of State and undertake the negotiation of reciprocity treaties; but it must be remembered that those treaties were negotiated when tariffs were low, and now it is important that general legislation reducing duties should precede any such treaty stipulations.

To carry out the policy of reciprocity treaties under our present system of high protective duties would only produce inequalities, discriminations, and wars of tariffs. The benefits expected from such a policy are not to be looked for unless there shall be legislation in harmony with it.

Better still than the hard and fast lines established by international commercial agreements is the natural reciprocity founded upon the laws of trade. The American trader and merchant may be trusted to make his own reciprocity treaties if only his Government will remove the present restrictions upon commerce. But how long are these restrictions to continue? Are we forever to be shut out by war tariffs from competition with our commercial rivals? Are we forever to surrender to England—the greatest of these—the share of the world's commerce which rightfully belongs to us?

It remains to a Democratic administration, acting in full accord with a Democratic Congress, to accomplish the great reformation, and to give to the country what it is now generally admitted it must have—a relief from burdensome and unnecessary taxes, tariff reform, and freer commerce with the rest of the world.

APPENDIX.

Schedule of Mexican articles to be admitted free of duty into the United States of America.

(2) 1. Animals, alive, specially imported for breeding purposes.
(9) 2. Barley, not pearl.
(8) 3. Beef.
(6) 4. Coffee.
(17) 5. Eggs.
(13) 6. Esparto and other grasses, and pulp of, for the manufacture of paper.
(14) 7. Flowers, natural, of all kinds.
(15) 8. Fruits. All kinds of fresh fruits, such as oranges, lemons, pine-apples, limes, bananas, plantains, mangoes, &c.
(26) 9. Goat-skins, raw.
(16) 10. Henequen, sisal, hemp, and other like substitutes for hemp.
(10) 11. Hide-ropes.
(11, 27) 12. Hides, raw or uncured, whether dry-salted or pickled, and skins, except sheep-skins with wool on, Angora goat skins, raw, without the wool, and asses' skins.
(18) 13. India-rubber, crude, and milk of.
(3, 19) 14. Indigo.
(20) 15. Ixtle or Tampico fiber.
(21) 16. Jalap.
(12) 17. Leather, old scrap.
(24) 18. Logwood, berries, nuts, archil, and vegetables for dyeing or used for composing dyes.
(23) 19. Molasses.
(1) 20. Palm or cocoanut oil.
(4) 21. Quicksilver.
(30) 22. Sarsaparilla, crude.
(7) 23. Shrimps and all other shell-fish.
(25) 24. Straw, unmanufactured.
(5) 25. Sugar, not above number sixteen Dutch standard in color.
(28) 26. Tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured.
(29) 27. Vegetables, fresh, of all kinds.
(22) 28. Wood and timber of all kinds, unmanufactured, including ship timber.

Schedule of United States articles to be admitted free of duty into Mexico.

(1) 1. Accordeons and harmonicas.
(74) 2. Anvils.
(8) 3. Asbestus for roofs.
(12) 4. Bars of steel for mines, round or octagonal.
(22) 5. Barrows and hand trucks with one or two wheels.
(36) 6. Bricks, refractory, and all kinds of bricks.
(38) 7. Books, printed, unbound or bound in whole or in the greater part with paper or cloth.
(73) 8. Beams, small, and rafters of iron for roofs, provided that they can not be made use of for other objects in which iron is employed.
(19) 9. Coal of all kinds.
(21) 10. Cars and carts with springs.
(23) 11. Coaches and cars for railways.
(24) 12. Crucibles and melting-pots of all materials and sizes.
(25) 13. Cane-knives.
(63) 14. Clocks, mantel or wall.
(26) 15. Diligences and road-carriages of all kinds and dimensions.
(27) 16. Dynamite.
(14) 17. Fire-pumps, engines, and ordinary pumps for irrigation and other purposes.
(40) 18. Faucets.
(47) 19. Fuse and wick for mines.
(53) 20. Feed, dry, and straw.
(29) 21. Fruits, fresh.
(37) 22. Fire-wood.
(54) 23. Fish, fresh.
(30) 24. Guano.
(6) 25. Hoes, mattocks and their handles.
(16) 26. Houses of wood or iron, complete.
(17) 27. Hoes, common agricultural knives without their sheaths, scythes, sickles, harrows, rakes, shovels, pick-axes, spades, and mattocks for agriculture.
(66) 28. Henequen bags, on condition that they be used for subsequent exportation with Mexican products.
(31) 29. Ice.
(32) 30. Iron and steel made into rails for railways.
(34) 31. Instruments, scientific.
(68) 32. Ink, printing.
(72) 33. Iron beams.
(15) 34. Lime, hydraulic.
(39) 35. Locomotives.
(56) 36. Lithographic stones.
(7.46) 37. Masts and anchors, for vessels large or small.
(41) 38. Marble in blocks.
(42) 39. Marble in flags for pavements not exceeding forty centimeters in square and polished only on one side.
(45) 40. Machines and apparatus of all kinds for industrial, agricultural, and mining purposes, sciences and arts, and any separate extra parts and pieces pertaining thereto.

The extra or separate parts of machinery and the apparatus that may come united or separately with the machinery are included in this provision, comprehending in this the bands of leather or rubber that serve to communicate movement, but only when imported at the same time with the machinery to which they are adapted.

(48) 41. Metals, precious, in bullion or in powder.
(50) 42. Money, legal, of silver or gold, of the United States.
(49) 43. Molds and patterns for the arts.
(51) 44. Naphtha.
(9) 45. Oats in grain or straw.
(64) 46. Oars for small vessels.
(5) 47. Plows and plowshares.
(52) 48. Paper, tarred, for roofs.
(57) 49. Plants and seeds of any kind, not growing in the country, for cultivation.
(58) 50. Pens of any metal not silver or gold.
(59) 51. Petroleum, crude.
(60) 52. Petroleum or coal-oil and its products for illuminating purposes.
(62) 53. Powder, common, for mines.
(10) 54. Quicksilver.
(70) 55. Rags or cloth for the manufacture of paper.
(67) 56. Roof tiles of clay or other material.
(11) 57. Sulphur.
(13) 58. Stoves of iron for cooking and other purposes.
(28) 59. Staves and headings for barrels.
(33) 60. Soda, hyposulphite of.
(43) 61. Steam-engines.
(44) 62. Sewing-machines.
(61) 63. Slates for roofs and pavements.
(65) 64. Sausages, large or small.
(20) 65. Teasels of wire, mounted on bands for machinery, or vegetable teasels.
(35) 66. Tools and instruments of steel, iron, brass, or wood, or composed of these materials, for artisans.
(69) 67. Types, coats of arms, spaces, rules, vignettes, and accessories for printing of all kinds.
(71) 68. Vegetables, fresh.
(2) 69. Wire, telegraph, the destination of which will be proven at the respective custom-houses by the parties interested.
(3) 70. Wire of iron or steel for carding, from No. 26 and upward.
(4) 71. Wire, barbed, for fences, and the hooks and nails to fasten the same.
(18) 72. Water-pipes of all classes, materials, and dimensions, not considering as comprehended among them tubes of copper or other metal that do not come closed or soldered with seam or with riveting in all their length.
(55) 73. Window-blinds, painted or not painted.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I yield now, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] in his remarks on this question used the following language:

> In a town in Rhode Island not long ago three hundred people—whole families—were in danger of starvation and had to be supported by public charity.

I am informed by the gentleman since that time that his authority for the statement was what purports to be an Associated Press dispatch published in the Gazette, a paper published in Washington, January 20, 1884.

At the time he made the remark I misunderstood the force of it. I understood him to state as a fact there were three hundred people in the town of Quidneck, in Rhode Island, in a state of starvation, but upon examining his language as obtained from the Official Reporter I find that they were simply in danger of starvation. Well, all the industries of the country are in the same danger if the Democratic party are successful in carrying out their policy. For the same reason these people were in danger if they were in danger at all. The whole danger of these three hundred people arose from the fact that this mill at Quidneck was stopped. It had ceased operation. If you are successful, gentlemen, you will stop a great many more mills. I suppose that is your object.

But practically the facts of the case are these: This mill was a part of the great Sprague estate, which is insolvent, and has been in litigation for years. By order of the court Governor Sprague was ousted from the possession of the mill and it had to be stopped in order to be sold. But there was no starvation, and there was no danger of starvation. This village is surrounded by a number of villages within a short distance where there are half a dozen of mills in successful operation. If they chose, these people might have obtained employment there, but they preferred to remain where they were in order to save the expense and trouble of removal and be ready to go into the same employment when the mill started again.

I have a letter from the president of the company which purchased this property. He is a gentleman of high standing in Rhode Island. He says:

While the mills at Quidneck were stopped the owner allowed the operatives to occupy the tenements without charging any rent. They did this of their own accord and without any request from the tenants. Any family or person who chose to leave found ready employment at other mills in the vicinity, but most of the families preferred to remain, feeling confident the mills would soon be in operation. There was no starvation and no calls for charity.

I have also a dispatch from a prominent firm in that neighborhood which runs in this wise:

Quidneck is in Coventry, near us. We are unaware of any destitution or distress at any time, and if any existed we should know it.

I have similar dispatches, but I will not detain the House by reading them.

The fact is the whole thing is an entire mistake. I do not attempt to impugn the gentleman's integrity. I have no doubt that having read this in the public papers he believed it to be true, but it is an entire mistake. I might go on and explain how this story got into circulation, but it is not germane to this question.

Mr. HURD. Be kind enough to allow me to send to the Clerk's desk to be read the dispatch upon which I based my statement.

Mr. CHACE. It is a mere newspaper account.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HURD. I hope there will be no objection to having the dispatch read.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Not to come out of my time.

Mr. HURD. It will not take but a single moment to have it read, as it is only three or four lines.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Very well; let it be read.

Mr. HURD. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the statement to which I refer, and which is to be found in the Washington Gazette of January 30, 1884.

The Clerk read as follows:

DESTITUTE OPERATIVES.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., January 19.

The report comes from Quidneck to-day that mill operatives are in very destitute circumstances, and that about three hundred people are likely to become charged upon the town. The destitute condition of the people was not discovered until late Wednesday night, when some of the villagers went from house to house, soliciting bread from those who could spare it to their less fortunate neighbors. Yesterday and to-day subscription papers were started in behalf of the destitute ones.

A gentleman who resides in Quidneck says that the people are without food or fuel. Yesterday, he says, one of the people in the street was picking up pieces of coal which had fallen from wagons, while one man was observed chopping from the ice and frozen ground a few sticks of wood which had been left back of one of the sleds last fall. As fast as the heads of the families can get funds enough from other places they will move their households to other manufacturing towns.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island one minute further.

Mr. CHACE. I want to say further that that statement is absolutely untrue and without foundation, and that it was a story put in circulation by a litigant who was desirous of continuing in possession of the property and hoped in that manner to influence that result. I am informed and believe that to be true.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Will the chairman be kind enough to inform me how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the expressions of sympathy that we have heard upon this floor from gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber for the agricultural, manufacturing, and mining industries of the country. I have listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who stated that the manufacturing interests were in a very unfortunate and bad situation. I listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], who thought that the agricultural interests were in a most depressed condition, and that the agriculturists and those who labor upon the farms were in a sorry and serious plight. I listened with peculiar interest to the alleged condition of the mining industries as viewed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], who the other day in a most serious manner sympathized with the people who worked in our manufacturing establishments and in our mines, and he told a harrowing tale of how the people in the mines that he visited somewhere last summer, possibly one of his own, were working for the pitiable wages of 62 cents a day and living in hovels unfit for the beasts of the field. Now, it may be, sir, that the remarks of the gentleman from New York apply to his own employés who work in his mines, and who have aided by working at this low rate to gather the millions of dollars which he enjoys. It may be that they worked for 62 cents for him.

It may be that his employés live in hovels such as he graphically described; but speaking for my constituency, a constituency employed in mining, a constituency employed in manufacturing, a constituency employed in agriculture, I must emphatically assert that that parallel does not exist in any one of the three counties of the district I represent on this floor. The statistics of the district which I represent exhibit in round numbers the following as the total value of agricultural and manufactured products for the census year 1880:

Counties.	Products of farm.	Manufactures.
Butler	$2,244,838	$1,080,290
Crawford	3,274,800	4,373,854
Mercer	2,342,200	7,952,874
Total	7,861,838	13,407,018

Sir, in my home county, which contains the bulk of the manufacturing interests in the district, and where the greatest amount of coal is mined in the district, the men who work in the mills and who work in the mines are as well housed, as well fed, and as well educated as the men who work on the farms; and in intelligence and morality they are the peers of any constituency that is represented by any gentleman on this floor. They are supplied with facilities for education enjoyed only by the people of a portion of our country and excelled by none. In the mining and manufacturing towns of Sharon, Sharpsville, Middlesex, Stoneboro', and Grove City, in Mercer County, they enjoy nine to ten months public schools per year, and are taught by teachers who have no superiors in the country. The same is true of the mining districts outside of the towns, although the term of school in some places is but eight months and in others but nine. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that no Hungarians imported under the contract system mine coal in the county of Mercer; and whether a statute is passed to prevent such importations or not, I believe, sir, that not only the people engaged in mining and maufacturing, but that the people engaged in agriculture as well, will, with one voice, unite to prevent such a calamity.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to go into a dissertation relative to the tariff. I do not propose to attempt to enlighten the House upon that subject. But living in a district such as I represent, where all branches of industries flourish, where the surface of the land for agricultural pursuits is worth from $50 to $100 per acre and the minerals under the surface are worth $200 per acre and over more, I simply propose to give my observations as to what tariff legislation has done, not only for the whole people in the district I represent, but for the State of Pennsylvania and for the country at large.

But before I proceed I desire to call the attention of gentlemen upon this floor to the wages that are paid in the locality where I live. I read, sir, from the report of the superintendent of the bureau of statistics of Pennsylvania for the year 1882, as follows:

An exhibit of the average daily wages paid to employés in the various occupations hereinafter named in Pennsylvania for the years specified, as computed by the bureau of industrial statistics of Pennsylvania for 1883.

Mr. Chairman, when we contemplate the growth and development of our country during the past twenty years, we are astounded equally by the progress in every department, whether it be in agriculture, manufacturing, mining, or means of transportation. In no other twenty years of our national existence have we made such rapid and substantial advancement in every material interest. To-day the United States is recognized as the most prosperous country in the family of nations. From every other country the common and skilled workmen have sought our workshops, mines, and boundless prairies, and by their industry and skill have aided to enrich the nation and to give an additional impetus to our growth. During the last decade alone more than 7,000,000 immigrants have been welcomed to our shores, and by their capital and labor have assisted in enlarging our agricultural area, in opening up our mines and developing our mineral resources, and in erecting, equipping, and keeping in successful operation our manifold industries.

PROGRESS IN AGRICULTURE.

The increase in our agricultural productions from 1860 to 1880 is unparalleled, as is illustrated by the statistics of the following leading commodities:

Commodities.	1860.	1880.
Corn.....bushels...	838,792,742	1,754,861,535
Wheat.....bushels...	173,104,924	459,479,505
Oats.....bushels...	172,643,185	407,858,999
Barley.....bushels...	15,825,898	44,113,495
Wool.....pounds...	60,264,913	155,681,751

It was asserted in this discussion by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that the value of the agricultural crop of 1880 was not as great in value as that of 1860 by $300,000,000. He admitted that the quantity had largely increased, but claimed that this decrease in value was the result of the fall in the price of farm products, caused by the high-tariff obstructions thrown in the channels of commerce in 1861, and which obstructions still remain. As stated by him, the quantities of all farm products of 1860 are given in the census but the values are not given. This is true in part. This much, however, we find in the censuses of the two decades—

	1860.	1880.
Number of farms	2,044,077	4,008,907
Improved land, acres	163,110,720	284,771,042
Number of men engaged in agriculture (estimated in 1860)	3,800,000	7,670,493
Value of farms	$6,645,045,007	$10,197,096,776
Value of farming implements	246,118,141	406,520,055
Value of orchard products	19,991,885	50,876,154
Value of live-stock	1,089,329,915	1,500,464,609
Value of all other farming products	Not stated.	2,213,402,564

As above indicated, the value of all farm products, other than orchard products and live-stock, is not stated in 1860, but at most it is an estimate. We have the quantities, which are as nearly correct as such statistics can be obtained, and by a reference to the current prices of commodities in New York for the years stated a nearly correct result can be obtained. By such an examination we find the following values for the five principal productions for said years:

Commodities.	Quantities.		Value.
	1860.	1880.	1860.	1880.
Corn.....bush...	838,792,742	1,754,861,535	$536,827,354	$851,107,844
Wheat.....bush...	173,104,924	459,479,505	233,691,647	473,263,890
Oats.....bush...	172,643,185	407,858,999	63,878,976	146,829,239
Wool.....lbs...	60,264,913	155,681,751	22,297,317	54,488,612
Cotton.....lbs...	2,054,698,800	2,533,254,680	205,469,880	278,258,014
Total value...	.....	.....	1,062,165,174	1,804,347,599

EXPORT OF LEADING AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The history of the growth of our agricultural products is better shown by the export of our surplus for the same years of the following leading commodities:

Commodities.	1860.	1880.
Grain and breadstuffs	$24,422,320	$288,036,835
Provisions	16,612,443	127,043,242
Animals, living	1,855,091	15,882,120
Tallow	1,598,176	7,689,232
Oil-cake	1,609,328	6,259,827
Vegetable oils	26,799	3,476,240
Seeds	600,729	2,776,823

Mr. Chairman, while we admit that many farm commodities are lower in price than in 1860, and that the prime necessities of life are cheaper than in most foreign countries, we deny that the American farmer is not as well remunerated for his labor to-day as he was in 1860 and prior. Statistics disprove it. Our own observations disprove it. The well-kept farms, the modern farm-houses and farm buildings which greet the eye on every hand, the improved farm machinery and farm implements, the easy-riding carriage, the well-dressed, educated, and intelligent people who till the soil, all disprove it. In short, the American farmer of to-day is better housed, better fed, better clothed, better educated, and enjoys more of the comforts and luxuries of life than did those of 1860 and prior.

PROGRESS IN MANUFACTURES.

Wonderful as has been the growth in agriculture, the progress in manufactures has been equally rapid, as is evidenced by the following statistics for the years 1850, 1860, and 1880:

STATISTICS OF MANUFACTURES IN THE UNITED STATES.

	1850.	1860.	1880.
Establishments	123,025	140,433	253,852

a Obtained by adding the total wages paid men, women, boys, and girls together, and dividing the product by the total number of employés. This largely reduces the average wages paid the adult male laborers.

It is a noticeable fact that the average wages of the employés has steadily increased during the past thirty years, notwithstanding that the price of every manufactured article and of almost every article on the American breakfast-table has decreased in price year by year. Thus the interests of the farmer and of the industrial laborer are equally benefited, each receiving a better remuneration for his capital and labor.

As further illustrating the rapid strides made in our manufacturing industries in thirty years, I submit the statistics of the following manufactures, which largely enter into daily consumption. The magnitude of the increase from 1850 to 1880 is suggestive. If it be true that the growth of the industries of a nation are best marked by the amount of coal and iron it consumes, then surely our growth has been phenomenal!

INCREASE IN RAILROAD MILEAGE.

Another feature marking the growth of our industries is the rapid extension of our railway system. From 9,000 miles in 1850 it had increased to 30,000 miles in 1860 and to 92,000 miles in 1880, with a capital and bonded debt of nearly $5,000,000,000, and gross earnings of over $600,000,000 in 1880. While the whole world had but 260,000 miles of rail in 1882, the United States had 120,000 miles—nearly one-half.

THE RESULTING BENEFITS TO THE PEOPLE.

It is with equal pride that we turn from this record of our industrial growth to contemplate the progress of our people. In no other country has man been so nearly estimated at his true worth or been so well rewarded for his labor. While our farms have grown in number, in beauty, and in fertility, the owners and occupiers have increased in wealth and intelligence. While our manufacturers have increased in number and extent, they have aided largely in building up towns and cities, drawn from the Old World her most skillful artisans, given employment, directly and indirectly, to more than one-half the adult population of the United States, and created a home market for the greater portion of our annually increasing agricultural products. Conceding that the common or unskilled labor of the country is underpaid, it is still true that in no other nation is labor paid so well. From every land the constant stream of immigration centers at our shores, and once here no other can win them away.

PROTECTION THE HOPE AND THE STAY OF THE TOILING MILLIONS.

And now for a moment let us turn aside and answer the rising inquiry: "What causes have contributed to the rapid growth of our manufacturing and agricultural interests in the past twenty years?" While admitting that nature has done much to make these phenomenal results possible, wise legislation has been the motive power. To my mind no other legislation has exerted so great an influence as that which inaugurated the American doctrine of protection to home industry. Forty-two years ago that distinguished political economist and humanitarian Horace Greeley wrote these words:

Enlightened protection is emphatically the hope and stay of the toiling millions over the whole face of the earth. Wherever a hammer is lifted, a plow held, a shuttle thrown, over the globe there is one whose direct interest it is that labor should be efficiently protected not merely in his own but in all countries, and that the excessive and fatal competition of capital with capital, sinew with sinew, privation with privation, to excel in cheapness of production—that is, cheapness in money-price—should be checked and bounded. Let labor therefore with one mighty voice demand adequate, stable protection, and a wider, deeper prosperity will soon irradiate the land, carrying independence, comfort, and joy to the dwelling alike of the farmer and artisan in every section of the country.

Nearly twenty years elapsed from the time these words were written until Congress, by proper legislation, gave the policy outlined above a fair trial. For twenty-two years the policy of protection has been enforced, and it has confirmed the truth of Mr. Greeley's prophecy. Under this policy I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that no other continuous twenty years of our national existence has witnessed such progress. In no other continuous twenty years has the farmer received such remunerative prices and had so good a market for his products. In no other continuous twenty years has the common and skilled laborer received better wages and enjoyed more of the comforts and luxuries of life. During that period our exports of domestic products have excited the admiration not only of our own people but of the civilized world. Our national revenue has been so abundant that our wisest statesmen have been at a loss to find proper objects to absorb the surplus. The investigations of our financiers and of our Ways and Means Committee have been directed to find the means of reducing rather than to raise revenue. What other period of our national history presents such an anomaly? Where in our history is there another period of equal duration where our Treasury was so full and the rate of interest so low? In what other period has so much of our soil been reclaimed and adorned by the habitations of its industrious and thrifty cultivators? In what other period has our cities grown so rapidly in population, wealth, and culture? In what other portion of the habitable globe has man advanced so rapidly or accomplished so much in the same period? In what country has labor been better paid? Is it in the British Isles? The emmigration from them to this country has been over half a million people in the last three years. Is it in Germany? Six hundred and fifty thousand emigrants have come from Germany in the same three years. Is it in Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Italy, Russia, France, or other portions of America? Over 700,000 emmigrants have come from these countries to the United States in the same three years. Look where you will, go where you may, the United States is the most inviting point on the globe for the man whose only capital is his labor, whose only stock in trade is his muscle.

WHO IS IT THAT WANTS A CHANGE?

The Democratic party, however, as represented on this floor, tell us the people want a change in the tariff legislation. They tell us that this protection policy is a false pretense; that we must reduce our tariff duties so as to reduce the cost of production and thereby cheapen the price of our manufactured articles. Do the manufacturers ask this? Do the laborers of the country ask this? Do the farmers ask this? When? Where? Is there any individual, class, or organization which asks this but the Democratic party? This is no new departure for that party. It has been stated in this discussion by a Democratic Representative [Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee] that the Democratic party has at all times been opposed to the protective policy, and he cited the declarations of the party in its national conventions from the year 1838 to 1880, inclusive, to prove it. There is no doubt as to this point. As a party it has opposed the passage of every protective-tariff act, and it has never let the opportunity pass without repealing such as were in force when it came into power. The action of the party at this time is in perfect accord with its traditions.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE TARIFF ISSUE.

Forty-two years ago the great body of the people of the United States believed that the question of protection to home industry had been settled in favor of a fair protective policy. The law known as "the tariff of forty-two" had just gone into operation. The two great political organizations of the country avowedly accepted it as a settlement of the question. Two years later one of the political organizations had nominated as its standard-bearer in the Presidential campaign of that year the great advocate of protection of that time, Henry Clay. The other adopted a revenue plank which could be read either for or against protection as occasion should require, but inscribed on its campaign banners in the great industrial centers, "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of forty-two!" Lulled into security by the pledges of the Democratic party leaders and of the Democratic candidate for Vice-President, a citizen of Pennsylvania, which State then as now was unqualifiedly in favor of the protective policy, the people elected the Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President. Scarcely, however, had the new administration entered upon its duties until the Democracy, flushed with victory, set to work to repeal the tariff law of "forty-two," which it finally accomplished, Mr. Dallas casting the decisive vote as presiding officer of the United States Senate. Since then the two great parties have occupied no uncertain position on this question. For forty years the Democratic party has been the advocate of free trade. In 1848 the Democratic national convention, the first held after the repeal of the tariff of 1842, made the following declaration:

Resolved, That the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844 have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union, in the noble impulse given to the cause of free trade by the repeal of the tariff of 1842, and the creation of the more equal, honest, and protective tariff of 1846, and that in our opinion it would be a fatal error to weaken the bands of a political organization by which these great reforms have been achieved and risk them in the hands of their known adversaries, with whatever delusive appeals they may solicit our surrender of that vigilance which is the only safeguard of liberty.

In 1852 the Democratic national convention made the following declaration:

Resolved, That in view of the condition of popular institutions in the Old World a high and sacred duty is devolved with increased responsibility upon the Democracy of this country, as the party of the people, to uphold and maintain the rights of every State, and thereby the Union of States, and to sustain and advance among them constitutional liberty, by continuing to resist all monopolies and exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many.

In 1856 the Democratic national convention made the following declaration:

Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion of our common country at the expense of another.

Resolved finally, That there are questions connected with the foreign policy of this country which are inferior to no domestic questions whatever. The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world, and by solemn manifestations to place their moral influence at the side of their successful example.

In 1860 both the Douglas and Breckinridge platforms reaffirmed the resolutions of 1856 quoted above.

In 1864 the great majority of the Democratic party was not represented at the Democratic national convention held at Chicago, and for reasons not relative to this discussion the question of raising revenue was not a matter of prime importance to the convention, and the usual tariff plank was doubtless inadvertently omitted.

In 1868 the Northern Democracy were still in the control of the affairs of the party and the national convention made the following declaration:

6. * * * A tariff for revenue upon foreign imports and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

In 1872 the Democratic convention which nominated Horace Greeley contained the following declaration:

We remit the discussion of the subject—

Protection and free-trade—

to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free from executive interference or dictation.

As has been remarked by a prominent Democrat in this discussion:

This is the only hiatus in the chain of assertions by the Democratic party of the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only.

In 1876 the Democratic national convention made the following declaration:

We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly 4,000 articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufacturers at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture—an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five timesmore than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

In 1880 the Democratic national convention made the following declaration:

Home rule, honest money, consisting of gold, silver, and paper convertible on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and national, and a tariff for revenue only.

Since this declaration Congress has enacted the tariff law of 1883, and, although it reduced the duties on manufactures which were imported in competition with American-made goods, the manufacturing interests were willing to accept it as a settlement. By one of those political miscarriages which can not be accounted for by ordinary rules the Democratic party came into power in this Congress. Its first official act was the election of the ablest advocate of free trade in its organization as Speaker of the House, and the overwhelming defeat of its ablest political leader [Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania], for the sole reason that he was in favor of "incidental protection," the latter gentleman receiving but 55 votes in caucus out of 191 Democratic members. The bill before the House is the natural outcome of this party. As frankly stated by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. MORRISON, of Illinois:

It is not claimed that the bill reported by the committee will afford all the relief demanded of the people's representatives. It is but an advance toward and a promise of more complete revenue reform, to attain which a general revision of the tariff and a more equitable adjustment of rates on its long list of dutiable articles is essential. Such a revision and adjustment were believed to be unattainable at the present session of Congress.

"It is but an advance toward and a promise of more complete revenue reform," providing the Democratic party gain ascendency in the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, who lives in a State so overwhelmingly Democratic that there is no necessity of concealing his real views, said in this discussion:

A tariff for revenue, as contradistinguished from a tariff for protection, represents the theory and principle of the Democratic party, as I understand them, upon tariff taxation, and is the only constitutional and just mode of raising revenue by impost duties.

The bill under consideration is a conservative approach toward a tariff for revenue.

It is believed by some that the amount of revenue that will be realized under its provisions, in case it becomes a law, will be thirty millions less per annum than the amount usually collected under the existing tariff; but I do not concur in that opinion. On the contrary, I believe the revenue will be increased, and I am supported in that opinion by the uniform operation of tariff taxation. Every reduction in the rates of the tariff from high protection toward a revenue basis increases importations, and consequently the amount of revenue; but such result will present no objection to the bill, to my mind, for the reasons I shall hereafter give.

If I so desired, I could quote columns of such assertions from the remarks of Democratic Representatives who support this bill in this debate, but there is no necessity for such action on my part. On the vote to take up this bill every vote but five were cast by Democratic Representatives. During the campaign of 1882 I had occasion to remark in political discussions that if the Democratic party gained ascendency in this House by the elections then pending Mr. RANDALL would be Speaker of the House, and a Democrat who was in favor of a "tariff for revenue only" would be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. I little thought then that both positions would be occupied by two of the most conspicuous advocates of a "tariff for revenue only" that have sat in Congress for twenty years.

While no alarmist, the bill under consideration, to my mind, bodes evil to our country. As remarked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], an avowed free-trader, nearly nine-tenths of all dutiable goods imported into the United States compete with similar products manufactured here for a market.

An examination of the imports for the year ending June 30, 1883, fully demonstrates this, a statement of which I will publish in an appendix to my remarks. In this connection, however, I desire to call the attention of this House to a few dutiable articles imported into the United States under the tariff of 1883, and for the eight months ending February 29, 1884, two-thirds of which come into competition directly or indirectly with the productions of our farms. They are as follows:

DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE IMPORTED FOR THE EIGHT MONTHS ENDING FEBRUARY 29, 1884.

Bituminous coal	$1,885,939
Cotton, manufactures of	20,606,536
Earthen, stone, and china ware	3,383,837
Flax, hemp, jute, and manufactures of	22,252,172
Glass and glassware	5,216,902
Iron and steel, and manufactures of	27,851,657
Rice	1,245,491
Salt	1,179,219
Sawed lumber	5,426,168
Wool	7,487,788
Wool, manufactures of	30,800,983
Hats, bonnets, and hoods	2,043,398
Total	129,380,090
Value of other dutiable merchandise imported same time	175,564,488
Grand total	304,944,578

Mr. Chairman, it is asserted by the advocates of this bill that our manufacturing interests are not in a healthy or satisfactory condition, and yet this bill proposes to lower the duties 20 per cent. and still further encourage the importations of goods that come into competition with similar goods manufactured here. It is asserted by the friends of this bill that labor is not sufficiently well employed or sufficiently well paid in this country, and yet this bill, by encouraging still larger importations of goods produced here, must necessarily displace still further American labor.

FOREWARNED IS FOREARMED.

What answer will the people of the country give to this Congress and to Mr. CARLISLE'S Ways and Means Committee? This question of protection is of vital importance "wherever a hammer is lifted, a shuttle thrown, or a plow held." It is tenfold more important to-day than it was forty years ago that "the excessive and fatal competition of capital with capital, sinew with sinew, privation with privation, to excel in cheapness of production should be checked and bounded."

We are in favor of the protective policy for what it has done for us in our individual and aggregate capacity in the past. We are in favor of the protective policy because we believe it is calculated to promote the interests of our whole country. We are in favor of the protective policy because we believe experience has demonstrated that it advances alike the prosperity of the agriculturist, the manufacturer, and the common and skilled laborers of the country. It has been tried and not found wanting. It has stood the test of investigation. It demands the most cordial support of every man whose heart sympathizes with the toiling millions. Let us stand by it and maintain it, and a "still wider, deeper prosperity will irradiate our land, carrying independence, comfort, and joy to the dwellings alike of the farmer and artisan in every section of the country." [Applause.]

The aggregate amount of duties collected on the seven commodities and classes of commodities just mentioned was $134,557,435.69, and constituted 64.18 per cent. of the total amount of duties collected on imported merchandise entered for consumption.

Mr. SPRINGER here took the chair as chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX, of New York, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The chair of the Committee of the Whole was here resumed by Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. VANCE Mr. Chairman, although in this debate a great deal has been said, and it may seem that the ground has been very well covered, I desire to add to the discussion a few observations on the pending bill.

Mr. TURNER (to Mr. VANCE, who was speaking from the rear of the Democratic annex on the Republican side of the House). Come over here to the right of the Chair, where we can hear you.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to speak from this side, so that I can fire into the rear of my friends who sit in front of me. [Laughter.] I think gentlemen will hear me well enough. I hope it will not be considered strange that there shall be a voice for tariff reform from this side of the House. Since I have drawn my seat on this side I am in good company, being at the side of General Washington.

A MEMBER. How does he stand on this question?

Mr. VANCE. He is for tariff reform.

I expect, Mr. Chairman, to support the Morrison bill. I do so because it is a moderate bill. It is not one, in my opinion, that need cause alarm in the country. It does not disturb the industries of the country. It does not produce a sudden shock. I would be opposed myself to giving a sudden shock to business or to damaging any industry in any section. I think that a tariff ought to be settled from a business standpoint.

I might prefer to take up the tariff in detail and settle it item by item to see which was the best duty on each article, how much ought to be paid upon this item and how much upon that. I might prefer that way, but I will say I shall vote for the Morrison bill because it reduces taxation, and, as I understand it, the Democratic party is committed to the idea of reduction of taxation. The Democrats have proclaimed it in their platforms; they have proclaimed it on the stump. We made the fight down in North Carolina almost entirely on that line at the last election—on the reduction of taxes under the tariff, and also the internal revenue. We told the people that there ought to be certain things placed on the free-list, such as salt, coal, and articles of that kind, so that we really stand committed, Mr. Chairman, to the doctrine of reduction of taxation, and this bill proposes to reduce the taxes.

I said I thought it need not cause alarm and that it was not the object of the Democratic party to damage the great business interests or the industries of this country. Such an idea as that is not one that has entered into the composition of the great Democratic party. But I do resist the doctrine of taxing one man for the benefit of another. I believe that that is unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has itself decided that a tax can not be laid for protection's sake alone; that a tax can not be laid upon one citizen in order to benefit another citizen in his business. I think that the fathers who established the Constitution never for a moment entertained the idea that A should be taxed for the benefit of B, to help him in his business. I hold that to be unconstitutional.

The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to lay a tax to support the Government for the common defense and the general welfare. Will it be argued that under that clause, under the general-welfare clause, people are to be protected in their business? If a man undertakes a particular kind of business it seems to me that he ought to be governed in carrying it on by the fact as to whether it paid him, whether it was a good business, whether it was a profitable business for him to engage in, and that he ought not to call upon the Government of the United States to come forward and lay a tax upon the purchaser of his wares in order to help him. That is the way in which I view it.

I look at this matter from another point of view. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is a crime to tax the poor for the benefit of the rich. I think it is a wrong in the sight of Heaven to lay a tax on the humble laborer, on the humble poor, to help the great monopolies of the country. My sympathies are always with the humble, with the laborer, with the man who earns his bread in the sweat of his brow.

There is a tax on coal, on the fuel that is used by the poor. Take the case of the humble sewing woman who makes a cotton shirt for 12½ cents, and often in the dead hours of the night is engaged in striving to obtain that poor return for her labor. She has to pay a tax on the handful of coal which is burning upon the hearth to keep her children warm. Hood has left some verses which are immortal:

With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat, in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread;
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch,
She sang the "Song of the Shirt."

Work! work! work!
While the cock is crowing aloof!
And work—work—work!
Till the stars shine through the roof!
It's oh! to be a slave
Along with the barbarous Turk,
Where woman has never a soul to save,
If THIS is Christian work!

Oh! men! with sisters dear!
Oh! men, with mothers and wives!
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives!
Stitch—stitch—stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
Sewing at once, with a double thread,
A SHROUD as well as a shirt.

It is surely wrong to tax the absolute necessaries of life in that way, to tax that which the poor consume. Therefore I think it would be well to put articles of that kind on the free-list.

The pending bill if enacted into law will reduce the surplus now in the Treasury. We have there a great surplus, and the people of the country are asking why it is that this Government of ours has such an immense surplus in the Treasury and yet taxes are not reduced. Why shall we not reduce the taxes? If that great surplus was used to pay off the public debt, it would not be so bad; but that is not done, and the surplus remains in the Treasury.

In my judgment a high tariff is not in the interest of the producer. We must necessarily have markets in foreign countries to consume the surplus products of this country. This is a great producing country; great in its productions of corn, wheat, pork, and all things that are necessary to sustain human life. It is necessary to have an outlet in foreign countries for the surplus in these products. If we put up here a tariff so high that goods can not come in from foreign countries, it will of necessity cut off our markets there for our products, cut off our opportunity of supplying foreign nations with our overproductions. Therefore from that standpoint I think such a tariff would be unwise.

At any rate I believe that that system which enables the few to amass immense fortunes instead of being a blessing to a country is a curse. It is in my judgment a curse to a country to have immense farms. I hold it also to be against the interest of the common people, against the interest of the masses of our people, that there should be great overgrown fortunes. What we want is plenty, and to have the laws so adjusted that they will bear alike on the poor and on the rich. We want plenty and freedom and peace, for they always bring prosperity.

In the better days of this country these stalwart fortunes were unknown to the people. In early times a man if he had a hundred thousand dollars' worth of property was thought to be a wealthy man, but now that is but a drop in the bucket. Men now count their estates by millions, and that is not in the interest of the poor, of the masses. It seems to me that it would have been a wiser thing for us to have laid a tax on United States bonds than to have laid a tax on coal and on salt and other necessaries of life which are used by the masses, by the millions.

Salt enters into every household in the land. It enters into the cabins of the poor, into the hut of the humble colored man, in my own sunny land; it goes there as well as it goes into the palaces of the rich. Our laws are more unjust than the laws of the great God who made us all. The great Father of all has put salt into the oceans and into the salines, and yet we have taxed it. I say let us tax the millionaires, the great bondholder, and let the salt and the coal of the poor go free; that is my doctrine. I have often on the stump illustrated this point by a circumstance which happened on Broadway, New York, in 1865.

I was a prisoner of war in the city of New York. One day, going down the street, I saw a vehicle with six horses attached to it. There was an outrider behind and an outrider before, who were dressed in livery and had high hats on their heads and brass buttons on their coats. The man sitting in the carriage between them was worth his millions in bonds; yet he did not pay a tax into the coffers of this great Government on the great bulk of his wealth, because he was a bondholder.

I was a confederate; I had on the confederate gray, being a prisoner of war, but I saw with pain on the sidewalk a man who had had both legs shot off in battle in defense of his Government, a Union soldier. He was taxed from top to bottom. His coat was taxed, his socks were taxed, the peculiar pair of shoes which he had on the stumps of his legs were taxed; everything he had on was taxed, including his coarse hat. I thought to myself, what a country is this which allows a man with his six-horse team to go sweeping down the street untaxed, because he is a bondholder, and yet here is a soldier who had lost both his legs fighting for his country and he must pay a tax even on the salt which he keeps in the gourd in his humble home. Is that right, my friends? God deliver the country from such a state of affairs as that. Amen.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill comes before the House for amendment there will be offered a proposition to modify in some particulars the internal-revenue taxation—to reduce the tax on brandy and to remove the tax on tobacco. I hold in my hand resolutions of the State of North Carolina on this subject; and I will ask the Clerk to read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the present tariff is unjust, unfair, and burdensome to the people of North Carolina, and has proven a heavy embargo laid upon Southern commerce to support monopolies, proscribing Southern toil and checking the natural development of Southern industry; and

Whereas the present system of internal-revenue laws is oppressive and inquisitorial, centralizing in its tendencies and inconsistent with the genius of a free people, legalizing unequal, expensive, and iniquitous taxation; and, as enforced in this State, is a fraud upon the sacred rights of our people, and subversive of honest government, prostituted in many instances to a system of political patronage which is odious and outrageous, corrupting public virtue and jeopardizing public liberty, and sustained by intimidation and bribery on the part of revenue officials to debauch the elective franchise:

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of North Carolina—

1. That the internal-revenue taxes of the United States ought to be repealed at once, with such provisions, by rebate of taxes or otherwise, as will be just to those who hold for sale articles for which taxes have been paid.

2. That the collection from imports, unaided by internal taxation, of the large revenue now necessary for the administration of the Federal Government, would give incidental protection to home manufactures amply sufficient for their healthy development.

3. That, though Congress has power to lay and collect duties, yet to lay duties higher than the percentage at which they would raise the greatest revenue, is, as to the excess above that percentage, to lay duties so as to prevent their collection, and is, therefore, without warrant in the Constitution, and that it is unjust and oppressive.

4. That within that percentage Congress may, in its discretion, select and determine the articles on which duties are laid, and the rates of the duties on them.

5. That this discretion ought to be exercised so as to raise a revenue not greater than is sufficient for the strictly economical administration of the Federal Government and the gradual reduction of the Federal debt, and so as to distribute the burdens of the tariff and the incidental protection given by it, as justly and equally as possible to every part of the country, and to all classes of the people.

6. That these resolutions are not intended to interfere with the application of the principle that it is just and wise to tax articles that are intended to be consumed as luxuries higher than the necessaries of life, and the materials, implements, and machinery consumed or used in producing, manufacturing, and transportation.

7. That the tariff of the United States ought to be reformed so as to make it conform to the principles set forth in the foregoing resolutions.

8. If Congress should deem it impracticable to modify the present tariff and at the same time abolish the internal-revenue taxes, as the lesser of the two evils, we prefer the retention of the former and the abolition of the latter.

9. That the secretary of state is instructed to transmit copies of these resolutions to the Senators in Congress from North Carolina as an expression of the voice of the State on the issues to which they relate, and to the Representatives in Congress from North Carolina for their respectful consideration.

Mr. VANCE. That is the voice of North Carolina in regard to these matters.

The following bill was introduced the first bill day of the present session of Congress with a view to repeal these objectionable laws:

A bill to repeal all laws of the United States providing for the internal revenue.

Whereas the act of the 30th of June, 1864, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," was passed to meet the emergencies of war and to supply the urgent demands of the Government at that particular period; and

Whereas a long period of peace and the recuperative prosperity of the United States has made such an extraordinary mode of raising revenue unnecessary; and

Whereas also the burdens imposed by the system of internal taxation are unequal, discriminating, and oppressive to a great portion of the people; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States empowers Congress to provide for the support of the Government by the raising of a revenue from imports; and

Whereas the raising of such a vast sum on imports protects, to a legitimate extent, all the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," passed the 30th of June, 1864, chapter 173, and all acts amendatory thereto and in addition thereof, including chapters 1 to 11, inclusive, of title 35 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from and after the 1st day of May, 1884.

The excise laws were first tried in England in 1626. Blackstone says of the excise tax:

From its first origin to the present time it has been odious to the people of England.

Johnson, in his dictionary, speaks of it as

A hateful tax levied upon commodities and adjudged not by the common judges of property, but wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid.

Another writer, Levi, says:

The excise was always exceedingly unpopular. Parliament ventured to renew the tax in 1641, during the civil war.

The same writer declares "the excise tax as peculiarly obnoxious to the spirit and principles of the Constitution," and adds:

The unpopularity of the tax never abated. The severity of the execution of the laws, in order to prevent frauds, made it still more objectionable, as it began to encroach on private property.

So, Mr. Chairman, we find that two hundred years ago there existed in England such a system as we have now in the United States—a system of gaugers and gougers and storekeepers and deputy marshals to collect the excises from a free people. The system was odious then. It is odious still. The very system itself is odious to a great and free people like ours and like the people of England.

Gentlemen in this discussion have made remarks derogatory to the people of England on account of their notions on the tariff, and have said that we had to separate ourselves from them in the Revolution. Well, we are glad we did so; but it ought not to be forgotten that the English people are a free people; they have a free government; they have a Parliament. And it was from England our fathers brought the grand and imperishable doctrine that every man, however humble and poor, has a right, when accused of crime, to be tried by a jury of his fellow-citizens; and this right can not be set aside. So we have borrowed some good things from England. The writ of habeas corpus is held so sacred there that the Queen can not set it aside.

But as to this excise system, it is to be regretted that it was ever introduced into this country. The word excise is derived from the Latin word excidere, meaning "to cut off;" and a tax of this kind is "cut off"—it is "cut off" from almost everything that is good in the world. What has this excise system brought into this country? It has been fruitful of many evil things.

This system of internal revenue was introduced during the late war. That war has now been over, we might say, for twenty years. Nearly twenty years have elapsed since the last gun was fired. Thank God that the contest was not longer continued! No doubt gentlemen on both sides will recall the pleasure they felt when gentle peace returned and "war's wild blast was blown away." We trust it is hushed forever. The high tariff laws, the internal-revenue taxation arose, we may say, out of the necessities of the Government during the war. The war is now over, and we have a surplus in the Treasury.

I do not object, my people do not object, to a reasonable tax on whisky and brandy; but we do object to the present method of its collection—this iniquitous system that is fastened upon the vitals of the people. We say that the effect of this system has been to foster in the minds of the people in many places a spirit of disobedience to law. For, sir, under this system a man is not only tied up by bond, but he is watched by hired spies and informers—a body of officials not relished by the descendants of the men who fought at King's Mountain, at Saratoga, at Yorktown, and on other historic battle-fields.

Sir, I am opposed to distilling. In my very heart I abhor the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drink. I have told my people on every stump that I wished they would feed their corn to the hogs rather than manufacture it into whisky. But at the same time it is bad policy to have laws upon the statute-book which are so odious that they are objected to even by good people, by religious people.

I imagine a deputy marshal, with pistols buckled all around him, riding through the country preparing to arrest suspected people, and even taking advantage of people by pretending that he was ill and in need of spirits, going so far as to leave the price on the gate-post, and then going away to have an indictment drawn up and the man who from motives of humanity let him have the spirits arrested and carried to jail. There are plenty of such cases. Now, sir, you can not make a law popular that is carried out by pistols and shotguns, and by arresting men and carrying them off sometimes hundreds of miles. I say, sir, it has been the cause and source of corruption. The following is extracted from a report made by a man sent down into the western district of North Carolina to look into these things. This agent says:

15. Of the thirty-one deputy marshals in the district three-fourths of them are guilty of rendering fraudulent accounts, ranging from 10 to 90 per cent. fraud, which has been a common practice with them for the last three years.

16. In addition to malfeasance and fraud the moral conduct of a majority of the deputy marshals is intolerable. Houses are broken into and searched without warrant, women frightened and insulted, the dogs of unoffending citizens shot down, and trespasses committed at will.

Drunkenness, insolence, and profanity mark their course, making them a terror to peaceable citizens and a disgrace to the Government they represent.

The report from which this extract is taken is a long one, embracing many charges of a grave character, which might be read. Perhaps it is unnecessary. It should be borne in mind that this is Republican authority.

Beyond question this is a corrupt system. It is one that is calculated to undermine the integrity of the young men of the country. It is known to every observing man that the agents of the Internal Revenue Department went round the country with blank commissions in their pockets. They would appoint a man to a position to influence his politics. A system that corrupts the young men of the country is one that is to be deprecated, because the perpetuity of this Government, with all its great principles of freedom, of religious and civil liberty, depend upon the virtue and integrity of its citizens, and particularly of the young men of the country, and a system that destroys that virtue is one in my judgment that ought to be repealed as quickly as possible.

I appeal this day to this House; I appeal not from any standpoint of prejudice, not as a politician, but as one who loves his country, to this Congress so to modify the system of collecting the internal revenue as, while it produces a reasonable tax, it will not be in the power of its agents to corrupt the young men of the country by the means which have been designated. Good citizens everywhere trust that this will be done, and that it will be done quickly; that the system will be so modified that it will be looked upon with favor even by the best men in the community, because when the law is so modified that it can be administered without injury to our rights or our liberties the whole community will insist upon punishing all who violate it. That is the point where our safety comes in, the point when the people, because of the justice of the law, are ready and willing to support it.

An anecdote is related of a worthy preacher who was praying for a revival, and he prayed for a certain neighborhood over there, and then he prayed for a certain neighborhood over here, and next he prayed for individuals, and at last he came to this: "Oh, Lord! if possible bless these dirty little internal-revenue officers." [Laughter and applause.] So then good men are opposed to the present system of collecting the internal revenue, because it is oppressive, corrupting, and degrading in its character and administration. While willing to tax intoxicating liquors, the real sentiment of the people of North Carolina (except it may be those who fatten on the spoils) is to repeal the whole internal-revenue system, and relegate the subject of collecting taxes from the sale of spirits to the States, which ought to be done.

But they talk about this being in the interest of temperance. Why, sir, the proposition is ridiculous. The Government authorizes the making and distilling of whisky and brandy for the purpose of raising revenue. I hold to the idea that it is not the best plan of raising revenue, because I believe candidly, conscientiously, where there is one dollar of revenue collected a great deal more will be paid out in taxation for infractions of the law and in losses to the people, so the whole system is undoubtedly wrong; but I will vote to keep a tax on whisky. I wish to God there was not a drop of it in the world beyond what was necessary for economical and mechanical purposes. I will vote to keep a tax on it, but I wish to simplify the manner of collecting it.

It is a ridiculous proposition to say internal-revenue laws are in the interest of temperance when we have the fact staring us in the face that under the operations of the internal-revenue laws there has been an overproduction of whisky in the country and when we have the distillers of whisky clamoring at the halls of Congress for relief and that the period of bonded extension of three years shall be still further extended to five years.

No, sir; it is not in the interest of temperance. Imagine an old distiller, a so-called temperance man, going into his distillery and kneeling down by the casks of whisky and praying. What would be the character of his prayer? It would probably be something like this: "O Lord, raise the price of whisky and lower the price of corn; give us a good run this year; make it bead well; and bless us in all other pertinent things." [Laughter and applause.] That would be about the way of it.

I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, what I would like to see. I would like to see everything relating to the war forgotten, buried forever, passed away. I know there will be throughout the country the remains of earthworks where the spade has done its work in order to protect the men against the charge of the enemy. They will be for a while yet; but our bountiful mother, Nature, will ere long cause the forest growth to spring up, and even these earthworks soon will be as things that never were. If we can only have all recollection of the war taken from the minds of men there will be no longer any unjust bias and prejudice.

A gentleman on the floor of the House [Mr. PETTIBONE] asked me the other day if I thought North Carolina was out of the Union or in the Union when the war closed? I answered promptly she was in the Union. She was in the Union, and in the Union to stay.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, if we had carried out our plan of revolution—and the right of revolution remains—it would have been done. But our people have abandoned the idea of secession. Well, surely if we have abandoned the idea then those who were opposed to us ought to do so. If we could not secede, if we could not get out of the Union, we certainly were in. But I say if we had succeeded in our revolution we would have been out. We did not succeed; therefore we were in.

Mr. Chairman, it is no doubt best as it is. I think the great and good God who is above us ordered it. That is my faith; that these people should not be separated, that they should be one, one and inseparable; one flag, one government, one people, one common and glorious destiny. [Applause.] That is what I believe, sir.

Now, let us do away with all that remains of the war. One finds in reading the history of Russia that Catharine the Great, after a rebellion and the loss of many lives in her dominions, directed her parliament to pass an act that no man should even refer to the rebellion. Well, we do not ask you to pass an act to that effect; but we ask you to do this: we ask you, when gentlemen on this floor or elsewhere say that these men of the South who came up here and took their places in this House came with a view of cutting down the tariff or any other measure because the confederate constitution directed this or that or the other, to say it is unjust to them—the men of the South—and it is unkind and unworthy of those who make the charge. A more loyal people never lived than the people of the old Tarheel State to which I have the honor to belong; and I say here in the presence of this House and of the country that if they saw trouble coming upon this great Government, our Government, at the very first sound of alarm, at the first roll of the drum, you would see the men of the South coming to the rescue—

> Till every tuft of broom gives life
> To plaided warrior, armed for strife.

[Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, why should we not banish these feelings of the war? And why should we not abolish at the same time or reduce war taxation, since we do not need it as we did then? Why not take the surplus and educate the children of this country? I hope to live and stand here and advocate the passage of a bill which sends out a portion of our surplus money to educate the children of this country, white and black, all over the land. [Applause.] I hope it will be done; I want to see it done.

A writer has beautifully said: "Look not mournfully into the past; it is gone." But, sir, we sometimes do look into the past when we see the vacant chairs around our firesides and call to mind how many brave boys that left their homes, left the influence of their mothers and all, and upon the red field of battle laid down their young lives for what they thought was right. We look back upon that with mournful sadness. But we will not always look back.

The same writer has said: "Wisely improve the present; it is thine." Let us wisely improve the present by adjusting taxation and all our laws properly with a view of helping each other and of helping everybody. I would to God that this was the real principle and the rule that was practiced all the world over, and that it was the constant effort of all mankind to lift up everybody, to make everybody better, purer, and happier financially, morally, and in every other way. I say that I wish that was the rule of the world to-day, and especially in this country that I love with all of my heart. And I trust that the time is not so far distant, sir, when we will have wise laws, when all odious features will be done away, that on every hilltop where it is needed a schoolhouse will be found; that the tall spires of the church, pointing upward, in every section will be a precious reminder to the weary traveler of rest in the land of the leal; and the happy children coming and going "with shining morning faces" may enjoy the blessings of a pure education, peace, and plenty. Then we shall feel that "another morn has risen on midday." [Applause.]

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Mr. Chairman, the tidal wave of two years ago gave the Republican party a splendid opportunity to redeem itself from the low estate into which it had fallen with the people before they surrendered their baton of power, which they willfully disregarded. As one of the majority of this House I voted in caucus against its present organization, meaning to emphasize a judgment that could see no wisdom in agitating a tariff policy we were powerless to establish into law, fearing that very disunion and discord in our party which has since obtained, placing us in the condition of the helpless Actæon, torn to pieces by his own hounds. But, sir, the Morrison bill is here for consideration, the agitation has begun, and I shall only attempt to cast a drop of oil upon the troubled waters.

A TRUE TARIFF POLICY FOR REVENUE ONLY.

I apprehend, sir, that the true doctrine for any policy of our Government, whether of finance or tariff, must find warrant in the Constitution, and Democrats of this body should be willing to stand by that construction of the organic law plainly evidenced in the policy of past Democratic administrations constituting their practices. I denounce in advance, as unwarranted by that Constitution, the practices of the Republican party in the assertion of the principle of "protection for the sake of protection," whether its results are designed to be in aid of manufactures and their development, agriculture and its development, or in the building up of commercial interests, or of all combined, for the simple reason that a free people should be left untrammeled by governmental interposition in the investment of their capital and the development of their material interest, in that ceaseless, tireless struggle hourly progressing between energy, intelligence, and skill, enforcing the survival of the fittest instead of leaving their prosperity to depend upon the favoritism and fostering bounty comprising the practices under laws assertive of principles inevitably leading to monopoly. Capital and labor, the twin powers of wealth development in all that comprises the material progress of any country, ordinarily of slow growth in new countries, in this grand and glorious America of ours have attained conditions fabulous!

The secrets of this marvelous growth of wealth and development of resources have puzzled the wisest and best statesmen and publicists, not only of our country but the world, and it will continue to do so, I fear, until the end of time. No common judgment can be expected upon so intricate and complex a subject. The result, however, stands out in the history of that progress, and, to paraphrase the lines of the poet Pope—

For policies of government let fools contest;
Whate'er is best administer'd is best.

Mr. Chairman, in the provision of the Constitution granting powers to raise revenue by taxation lies our duty to legislate as to the kind of tax, the rate of tax, and the selection of the objects to be taxed, or in other words the selection of the proper sources of revenue constituting a lawful policy of government. Certain principles of economy, grown into maxims, should be carefully applied in the adoption of any measure having for its object the raising of revenue by taxation of the people.

1. The subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support of the government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue they enjoy under the protection of the state. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation.

2. Every tax should be levied at the time or in the manner which is most likely to be convenient to the contributor to pay it.

3. Every tax ought to be so contrived as to take out and keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the treasury of the state.

4. The heaviest taxes should be imposed on those commodities the consumption of which is especially prejudicial to the interests of the people.

These principles, announced by Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations, have met the approval of all the great thinking men of the world who have studied economic questions influencing the welfare and development of the whole people of a country, the object of government being to maintain the field of material conflict in the struggle for wealth free to all its people, so as to permit the largest growth of that wealth out of their productions over and above consumption. In the consideration of any system of revenues, however, we must keep constantly in view the pregnant fact that whatever the sources of revenue at last taxation is met out of the purses of the people, and taxation becomes onerous and burdensome not only when it consumes the margin constituting the ordinary savings of frugality, but taxation is equally so when the sources of revenue selected require a mode of collection inquisitorial and personal, or when the proportion exacted of the citizen is disproportionate to the revenue he enjoys under the protection of the government, or when it produces an amount of revenue in excess of the economical wants of the government.

DEMOCRATIC POLICY NOT AN UNDEVIATING ONE.

Mr. Chairman, in no sense can the history of Democratic administrations of the past in their selection of the sources of revenue be said to have developed an undeviating policy of that party upon this vexed question of tariff to justify the view that it is a party of free trade or a party whose faith is indissolubly bound up in a low rate of tariff duties. True, sir, in the domain of individual liberty and freedom of action represented by our constitutional Government the doctrine of free trade is logically evolved, expressive of that largest liberty of action in all those matters affecting the material interest of the people individually speaking, and is therefore the outgrowth of Democratic spirit; but this broad assertion of individual freedom with reference to the subject of trade, as in many other directions, is exercised by the individual citizen in subjection to the rights and powers of the Government under the provisions of the Constitution imposing the duty "to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare," implied and expressed in the grant of power to lay and collect taxes to this end to meet honest and lawful expenditures. Economy has been the undeviating doctrine and practice of the Democratic party, in order to reduce to its minimum the burdens of the people and to reduce the minimum of its impingement or prohibition upon the liberty and freedom of action of the individual citizen in all those matters affecting his material interests involved in the operations of trade and business. And so, considered in this view of economical expenditure, whatever that may be in the aggregate, great or small, is created the necessity for revenue, and the necessity of a high or low rate of duty to meet it, limited only by the principle of taxation for revenue, which never permits the rate of duty to exceed the maximum revenue-producing power of rate of duty, so as to amount in any instance to prohibition of importations.

That history, fairly treated, simply demonstrates an honest endeavor to exercise the powers of taxation within the Constitution, both in determining the sources of revenues and the rate of duty imposed. In the discharge of that imperative constitutional obligation, guided by approved principles of political economy, the system they evolved under their several administrations as the wisest and best for our country was that of revenue by imposts, supplying as it did the wants of the Government by an indirect tax upon the people through their consumption and offering at the same time by judicious discriminations incidental aid and encouragement to home capital and home labor when the duty imposed was upon articles produced within our borders by the industry, skill, and capital of our own people, which entered as an incident of the cost of its production.

THE EARLIEST TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Mr. Chairman, the first tariff measure passed by Congress was introduced by Madison, April 8, 1789, and it recited the necessity of laying duties on imported goods, wares, and merchandise, "for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures." Madison was the father of the Constitution, and the highest authority upon its meaning and intent, and with this preamble he outlined a simple measure, requiring a few articles to pay specific duties, and all or nearly all other imported articles a low rate of duty ad valorem, his object being to raise an immediate revenue to supply the wants of the new government. Pennsylvania, through her representatives, by amendments sought to add to the specific-duty-paying articles all the leading manufactures of the country, which led to extended discussion, during which Madison uttered the judgment, as pertinent now as then, "that any system of impost must be founded on the basis of mutual concession." The power of taxation to secure revenues was a concession made by the more populous Eastern States engaged in manufactures by their adoption of the Federal Constitution, surrendering as they did by that act both the right and the power to lay duties in their aid, encouragement, and protection. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, when we go back to the floor of that historic convention sitting in judgment upon this feature of our organic law, and behold the patriotism of those States engaged in manufactures sacrificing upon the altar of a common country so unselfishly their right and their power to lay duties upon imposts, intrusting the protection of their valuable local interests to the justice of Congress in the execution of the taxing power by a judicious discrimination in the laying of impost duties, it affords a striking contrast to the spirit of our agricultural sections to-day in their support of a horizontal reduction of imposts, who thereby willfully ignore that patriotic sacrifice and are ready to destroy in the enforcement of their ideas of reform of the tariff system that principle of mutual concession constituting the groundwork and security of our whole constitutional system.

Mr. Madison, in giving his views, said:

We must consider the general interest of the Union as much as the local or State influence. My general principle is that commerce ought to be free, and labor and industry left at large to find their proper object. But the interests of the States which are ripe for manufactures ought to have attention, as the power of protecting and cherishing them has by the present Constitution been taken from the States and its exercise thrown into other hands. Regulations in some of the States have produced establishments which ought not to be allowed to perish from the alteration which has taken place, while some manufactures, being once formed, can advance toward perfection without adventitious aid. Some of the propositions may be productive of revenue and some may protect our domestic manufactures, though the latter subject ought not to be too confusedly blended with the former.

Cautious statesman as Madison undoubtedly was, we are justified in inferring that under certain circumstances the duty even to protect belonged to and should be exercised by Congress.

This first revenue act was advocated by representatives from all the States of the Union, Federalist and Republican, the only question of difference being as to the rate of duty, and such continued the policy of our Government with few alterations throughout the administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison. When Jefferson found a large surplus of revenue receipts over expenditures, what recommendations did he make to Congress? A horizontal reduction of imposts, while he maintained odious excise taxes? No, sir. Under his administration the first appeal to this source of revenue was abandoned. Salt was placed upon the free-list, but the impost system was upheld and maintained in the interest of home development. In a message to Congress he gave a clear exposition of his faith and the true Democratic doctrine on the vital subject. He said:

The suspension of our foreign commerce by the injustice of belligerent powers (Great Britain and France) and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens are subjects of great concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper material and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protective duties and prohibitions, become permanent.

A prophecy which has had such a splended fulfillment it would amaze Jefferson were he alive to witness it! In another message to Congress, setting forth the large surplus of receipts over the expenditures and economical needs of the Government, he asks the pertinent question: "Shall we suppress the imposts and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?" Jefferson answers no! He proposed an amendment to the Constitution to authorize the use of this surplus for the great purposes of education and internal improvement, a course our Republican opponents are pursuing without such grant of authority.

THE HISTORY OF TARIFF OF 1816 AND 1828.

Mr. Speaker, the tariff of 1816 constitutes another important era in the history of encouragement to home capital and home labor, largely extending and increasing, as it did, the specific duties on foreign goods and in the adoption of the minimum principle of valuation in estimating imposts for the encouragement and protection of manufactures. The principles and provisions of this act laid the foundation practically of the great industrial system of the United States upon which rests our present national wealth; and it was accomplished by votes from the South and West under the distinguished leadership of the eloquent South Carolina statesman, Calhoun, New England, then a commercial people, generally opposing it under the leadership of the immortal Webster.

A renewal of the tariff controversy took place in the consideration of the measure of 1820, but in 1823–'24 the memorable discussion began of the measure of Clay known as the "American system," avowedly and openly declaring for the protection of home industry. In the earlier tariff acts revenue was the object sought with protection as the incident, but the reversal of this principle was aimed at, so that protection was to constitute the object of the law and revenue the incident. This measure was passed by Congress, and that careful statesman and strict constructionist of the Constitution, Monroe, approved the law. Tariff legislation for the first time in its history took both a sectional and partisan aspect, and the tariff of 1828 found Webster sustaining the policy and Calhoun and his friends antagonizing it. Such in brief is the record of the progress of this economic struggle, ending in a victory for the "Clay system," and with some modifications such it continues to be down to the present day.

The success of the American system in my judgment was a misfortune befallen our manufactures. And Van Buren is quoted as making a sagacious speech to some representatives of this class, "that if the interests of manufactures was suffered to become identified with a political party, any one, it must share the fate of such organization and go down whenever it sunk." And, Mr. Chairman, that hour is fast approaching, unless the spirit of antagonism aroused in the agricultural interests of the South and West shall be tempered with conservatism and patriotism in the maintenance of a principle of mutual concession, instead of being moved and seduced by a desire for vengeance in the Mede and Persian application of the law of retaliation. I raise the voice of a conservative State, Democratic to the core, in the interest of harmony in our party actions, in the interest of a patriotic treatment of these great industries in obedience to a spirit of mutual concession—the granite base of this most glorious superstructure of human right and human liberties.

THE EVIL OF SURPLUS REVENUES TRACED TO ITS SOURCE.

Mr. Chairman, a present surplus of $133,000,000, which must be largely magnified by an estimated annual surplus of $85,000,000 per year, presents a condition in our revenues that is simply alarming, and it is not remarkable that our people are aroused and demand to know whence it comes and how it shall be prevented. Sir, if it shall prove to be no more than this sum, by the end of the fiscal year 1907 it would aggregate by more than $720,000,000 a sum sufficient to liquidate and pay the 3 per cent. bonds, amounting to $305,529,000, the 4½ per cent. bonds, amounting to $250,000,000, and the 4 percents, amounting to $739,946,550, the latter of which, and the last of that class, falling due that fiscal year.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the present condition of your revenues, the result of a mixed system composed of the two modes of taxation by way of imposts and excises, intrenching a political dragon of power in the very citadel of our Government, controlling its operations corruptly in the interest of a party and its maintenance therein indefinitely. Merciless as has been the tribute levied upon the people, and loud and deep their cry for relief from its heavy burdens, yet no relief comes from the party in power, notwithstanding the vote of the people changed the Republican majority of this House into a minority and set indelibly the seal of their condemnation upon this monstrous legalized robbery. Those of us who were members of the Forty-seventh Congress know that the Ways and Means Committee of that Congress, hearkening to the voice of the people, crystallized a measure of relief that would have produced a reduction of over seventy millions of these burdens, but when the hour for action came the dragon outside of this Chamber, enfolding this corrupt political organization, at the bidding of caucus dictation, breathed upon this righteous evidence of their plain duty to the people and in a single night their work shrunk and shriveled into insignificance at its poisoned touch.

Sir, driven from the legislative stronghold of this House by the scourge of popular disapproval, it is still able, however, to maintain itself by a partisan grip upon a majority in the Senate and through the veto of a partisan Executive, and the Democratic majority here, voicing that expression of popular sentiment, should counsel wisely and deliberately before they assume a position in this precious struggle of the people, retreat from which must bring ruin and disaster to all their cherished hopes. Powerless to perfect legislation to secure the needed reform of those inequalities of the tariff conceded to exist by all parties, or to effect reductions of the heavy burdens of taxation exacted by a system purely the handiwork of the Republican party, I saw no wisdom in agitating the subject by any general plan of reform of the system of imposts and reductions, thereby leading as it has to discord and dissension in the solid phalanx of our party, and creating uneasiness and distrust in the breast of both capital and labor. I am conscious, sir, that the vigorous-blooded and valiant-hearted statesmen on this floor, robed in a pre-emption claim to all the courage of our party, cry out, in response to these conservative sentiments, "Cowardice!" But I admonish them that an ounce of wisdom is worth a pound of valor; and he who seeks the bubble reputation at the cannon's mouth, when wisdom points a simpler and less martial road to victory, may reap destruction for the madness and folly of his rashness and dissipate even his fame for courage and valor.

HORIZONTAL REDUCTION WILL NOT PREVENT A SURPLUS.

Mr. Chairman, there is no principle in horizontal reduction, and no reform either; because it must inevitably render the inequalities, the incongruities, and anomalies of the present iniquitous system more unequal, more incongruous, and more anomalous. And as the direct result of the reduction is to throw open wide our ports to foreign products, importations must be largely increased, and I am advised that 25 per cent. of increase will produce an exact stand-off in the amount of revenues received equal to the per cent. of reduction fixed in the Morrison bill.

Now if the increase of imports should be no more, you receive as much revenue in the aggregate, and the distribution of benefits in the amount of taxes reduced to the individual is but an atom of relief. Who pays the taxes, if not the consumer? Here we are met by the class of aerial statesmen who will not deign to walk upon the solid earth of the practical, but poise their wisdom far up among the clouds of sophistry and mysticism, or break down imaginary Chinese walls in order to move out majestic upon a trackless ocean. They assert, and they assume that assertion is both fact and argument, that the tariff rate of duty attaches as an incident of cost to every article produced and consumed in the country. The truth is, that within the range of a minimum and a maximum producing rate of duty the Government receives its revenues in proportion to the volume of imports, while the incident of benefit to the producer and of cost to the consumer only remains as an element of its price up to the point where the home power to produce is equal to the home power to consume, graduating from the highest to the lowest degree of benefit to the producer and of burden to the consumer as you approach that condition of equality. Exceed that point, or in other words overproduce, and you fall below that scale, the very overproduction becoming a positive loss to the producer and a positive gain to the consumer by reason of the depreciation of the price of the overproduced articles as the natural and inevitable result of a violation of the eternal law of trade and business governing the supply and demand.

I confess that the glut of our markets, resulting in ruinous depreciation of prices to our manufacturers and of corresponding benefit to consumers, is the inevitable result of overproduction under the unnatural stimulant of excessive tariff rates, which tempted the large investment of capital in manufactures; but I submit, in the name of all that is just and honest, they are paying most dearly for their whistle. And, sir, so long as the law of supply and demand, in or out of America, continues to rule values in fixing prices of articles of consumption, so long will the oscillations of the pendulum be felt and so long will consumers and producers experience the benefits and evils of the operations of this unerring law within the bounds of the two extremes of a scarcity and a glut, producing a scale of high or low prices for products of consumption. Sir, it constitutes the rude bruising irons of a fate from whose logic there is no escape, and I do not choose to speculate upon the miseries either of the producer or the consumer who may find themselves in the toils of a foe of their own creation.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is pleaded in extenuation that this measure is a step in the right direction. What direction? Reduction? No; for the margin is too insignificant, and the probabilities are that the direct effect will be to lead to an appreciation rather than a depreciation in the aggregate revenue receipts by the increase in the volume of imported goods. Reformation? No; for it reforms none of the inequalities known to exist in the present system. Indeed, they will be worse rather than better if this bill is enacted into law. What is it then? Sir, the step in the right direction, though not declared by the terms of this measure, means a step forward in the domain of direct taxes and free trade, and the author of this bill for horizontal reduction, by his criticisms of the system of revenue by import duties, reveals his faith in direct taxes and free trade.

In the Forty-fourth Congress he declared that—

> Taxation by tariffs and duties on imported goods compels contribution to the support of the Government through the wants and necessities of life. And, as if distrusting the justice of its demands, it operates by indirection and too often does its oppressive work in violation of the most righteous law of equality. However unequal and unjust these taxes are they must be paid, because we must have the comforts and necessaries of life upon which they are levied. Cold, hunger, and thirst gather them in. Though impracticable now to resort to it, that system is best, because most equal, which takes from the tax-payer his due proportion in the most direct manner.

And while denouncing the whole impost system in these scathing terms, he condemned the act of 1872 that put coffee and tea on the free-list, and deemed a duty of 3 cents per pound on the former and 15 cents on the latter, both of which articles enter so universally into the consumption of the masses, as an equitably distributed tax. He tells us now that he is opposed to the impost system, and specially advocates that most vicious, pernicious, and undemocratic source of revenue, the excise taxes, in order to limit the necessity for revenue to be obtained by import duties, approved and used as it has been by every administration since the foundation of our Government, Democrat and opposition. Sir, you can not measure the wants, condition, and policy of our country by those of England. England is for free trade because England is a nation where social caste and orders of nobility divide her people into aristocrats and paupers; but in America, thank God, the sovereigns and masters are the people, and their public officials the servants. The nobility of that country reap the honors and emoluments of government, and the masses are the footballs and tools of power. Our people participate in the crowning and uncrowning of their official kings, who hold their tenure of power by the divine right of the freeman's ballot, and the American citizen is not only ready to volunteer his life and his sacred honor, but his property also in defense of the safety and integrity of his free institutions.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] says that "burdens of government should be borne in proportion to ability to bear them" he asserts a principle as old as government itself; but when he qualifies that principle in its applicability to the people of the United States by limiting it to the idea that "property alone should pay taxes, he who has much should pay much, he who has little should pay little, and he who has none, none," he trifles with words; for it is our proud boast that we are a nation of property-holders, in greater or less degree of value, and the pride of an American master of that lordly castle, his home, however humble it may be, swells his heart with emotions as great as move a king or an emperor. It is his Government, fed and supported by his contributions of taxes made under the system approved by the fathers of the Republic which he cheerfully makes, and his Government, defended and upheld by the power that sleeps in strong arms and stout hearts.

Do you hope to hoodwink the intelligence of the American people by a display of mirage in legislation? If you believe you can justify before the people of the country or before your party the doctrine of free trade and direct taxes, amend the title of your bill and let the battle be fought with visors up, not with visors down and by indirection.

ABOLITION OF EXCISE TAXES WILL PREVENT A SURPLUS.

Sir, I admonish the Democratic majority of this House that if they must formulate a measure to give an earnest to the people of a desire to reduce taxation and prevent the accumulation of the millions of their hard shekels in the vaults of the Treasury, turn the splendid genius of your statemanship and the power of your party against that undemocratic, that unrepublican monster, the internal-revenue system, and at one fell stroke lop off the receipts from the odious and infamous excise taxes; wipe out the expense of the millions it costs to maintain it and destroy the viperous official organization throughout the States, which constitutes a standing menace to the peace and liberty of the citizen and an insult to his manhood. I know, sir, there is a growing prejudice against the removal of taxes from tobacco and whisky—luxuries they are called, or luxuries of the masses—and the subject of whisky bristles with objections from the moral voice of the country as does the porcupine's back with quills; but when you treat the question from the standpoint of revenue, the only one from which as legislators we can justly view it, its abolition is commanded not only by the voice of past experience but by every reason of economy and sound finance.

HISTORY OF EXCISE TAXATION.

Mr. Chairman, the system of excise or internal-revenue taxation was the outgrowth of foreign soil and monarchical absolutism. It is undemocratic, unrepublican, and utterly repugnant to the spirit of our people and our free institutions. In England the imposition of such taxes was first made in 1643, having been extensively practiced in other portions of continental Europe before that period. In our country it was first invoked in 1791, just after the Revolutionary struggle had ended, and while our statesmen were striving to maintain the independence which they had won as the rich fruits of a bloody and memorable war. The highest tax imposed on distilled spirits under this policy was only 25 cents per gallon. Yet the student of history knows that the patriotism of our ancestors, just emerged from a sanguine conflict crowned with a glorious victory, was unequal to this call upon the spirit which had served them at Valley Forge and Trenton to satisfy the very obligations of that war for the rights and liberties of the Anglo-Saxon race, so detestable was it as an emblem of the monarchy they had battled against. The fair escutcheon of the young Republic, in the very presence of their magnificent triumph, was blurred with the stain of a whisky insurrection, notwithstanding the tax was paid by the consumer in or out of Pennsylvania. These taxes, odious in their inception, grew more and more odious each year of their exaction until the inauguration of President Jefferson, under whose wise and beneficent administration the whole system was uprooted and abolished.

Again, sir, after the war of 1812, when another great and pressing necessity for revenues was upon the country to enable the Government to meet the increased expenditures growing out of our conflict with Great Britain, a renewal of this system was recommended by President Madison, continuing in force, however, only a few years, being repealed in 1817 in obedience to the public sentiment, crystallizing the faith of the masses in the conviction that the power of taxation in this form should only be exercised upon extraordinary occasions, and the occasion ended, the system itself should end with the necessity creating it. And now we face the only remaining instance of our history afflicting us with this mode of taxation comprised in that portion of the internal-revenue system remaining upon our statute-books, constituting in part the policy of taxation sprung from the loins of the great war struggle of the States of the Union, justified in the perilous necessity and magnitude of that conflict. But, Mr. Speaker, submission to this mode of taxation in an hour of peril and danger, while illustrating in an eminent degree the patriotism of a free people, can not point an argument for its maintenance nor be construed into an approval of such a system as an ordinary means of providing revenues. On the contrary, the history of the adoption and the abolition of this system of taxation is a standing protest against its continuance after the emergency invoking it has passed away. The ordinary execution of the laws now enforcing this system of excise taxation requires over 4,000 officers, costs the people $5,000,000 per annum to collect this revenue, and, as I have said, it is wholly due to the receipts from this undemocratic source of revenue that the large surplus now in the vaults of the Treasury is at all possible.

AT LEAST ABOLISH THE SYSTEM IN PART.

But, sir, if you are not prepared to face the hue and cry of those who see this subject from the moral standpoint alone, and abolish this pernicious system in toto, at least abolish excise taxes upon tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, snuff, ale, lager-beer, and porter, and abolish also all special taxes; disband the army of office-holders employed in their collection, transfer the execution of the law for the tax remaining on distilled spirits to the customs machinery of the Treasury Department, in the interest of sound economy, and save the tax-ridden country the five millions annual expenditure which now feeds the stalwart adherents of the party in power and contributes so liberally to the huge corruption fund of that organization to pollute the ballot of a free people. This course will secure an absolute reduction estimated at over $60,000,000, more than double the sum (when you include the saving of this five millions in the cost of collection) of the mere speculative estimated reduction of this bill, ushered to the country by a flourish of trumpets that would be terrifying indeed if it were anything but trumpet-blowing. The mere statement of the case involved in the suggestions I offer should command Democratic support; but if reason and argument are required to satisfy the people that such repeal is both economy and sound finance, they abound as the rocks with limpets.

REFORM THE IMPOST SYSTEM THROUGH THE FREE-LIST.

Mr. Chairman, if the salvation of Representatives with their agricultural people hinges upon some legislative tinkering with the impost system, I suggest to such tariff reformers the importance of enlarging the free-list in the enforcement of an honest intent to relieve burdens already too grievous to be borne, and reduce revenues also. Make all articles entering into the consumption of the masses, in their food, their cotton and woolen clothing, their humbly-furnished homes, absolutely free, or figure them down to the lowest possible rate of duty. We know that the great volume of our population of wage-earners do not exceed in their average annual incomes more than three or four hundred dollars. Let your pruning-knife of reform strike at the evil of the present impost system right here where it bears the heaviest, and to the relief of a class least able to bear it; for it is notorious the higher you ascend the scale of ability to meet taxation the more abundant grow the favors of the law imposing rates of duty; and, instead of permitting such injustice, apply the corrective promptly, and as you ascend the scale of income of the classes advance the rate of duty upon the higher grade of articles entering into the consumption of such classes, always remembering to lay the highest duties upon articles consumed only by the rich and known as luxuries. These principles should be the touchstone of all legislation in determining the rate of duty upon articles of necessary as well as extraordinary consumption; never to exceed, however, in any instance the maximum rate of revenue-producing duty, and limited to the honest needs of Government. By doing this you execute that cardinal principle of just taxation—levying contributions from the people proportionate to their ability to pay and the protection they receive.

THE HORIZONTAL PLAN INJURIOUS TO REVENUES AND ILLOGICAL IN RESULTS.

Mr. Chairman, the horizontal plan proposed moves on a straight line, arbitrarily and without flexibility, and I am led to ask whence came this inspiration of horizontal reduction to the author of this bill? Was his conversion to that idea as sudden and positive as the conversion of Saul of Tarsus? During the discussion of the tariff-reform measure of the Forty-fourth Congress, fathered by this same distinguished gentleman, he said "that the horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. in 1872 made by the Republican party was injurious to the revenue and illogical in effect." It reduced the duty on bunting from 112 to 108 per cent.; on spool cotton from 76 to 69 per cent., and other like absurd reductions. And yet he finds himself struggling in the meshes of the same net of absurdities and illogical effects included in the terms of the measure whose paternity he now owns, and demands my support as a Democratic measure. I submit if 10 per cent. of horizontal reduction was injurious to the revenue he has magnified that injury just 100 per cent. by the advocacy of a 20 per cent. horizontal reduction, without eliminating the absurdities or correcting the illogical effects. And, I repeat, whence came this inspiration—when dropped the scales from his eyes?

This horizontal cut bestows a morsel of reduction in rate of duty to the vast body of consumers who are poor and need it, but its operations are equally bountiful and generous to a large class of rich consumers able to pay, and whose duty it is to contribute largely to the revenues of the country. I sample a few of the articles of the luxurious or higher kind of consumption in various schedules, such as lace window-curtains, embroideries, and cotton damask in Schedule I; linen laces, embroideries, Russia and other linen sheetings, of Schedule J; Saxony, Wilton, and Tourny velvet carpets, Aubusson, Axminster, Brussels, tapestry, and chenille carpets in Schedule K; manufactures of rosewood, ebony, and satinwood in Schedule D; china, parian, and bisque ware, looking-glasses, porcelain, and Bohemian glassware in Schedule B; and to cap the climax there is provided a reduction on Havana cigars and cigarettes in Schedule F, while the cotton and woolen goods, the hats, boots, blankets, wooden-ware, common glass and crockery ware, carpets, window-glass, medicines, and even the provisions included in the schedule of food consumption—all of which articles are consumed by the masses—receive no different treatment under this bill. I ask in all candor and frankness for some justification for this rose-colored scheme of reform.

DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLE NOT INVOLVED IN HORIZONTAL REDUCTION.

Democratic principle involved in horizontal reduction of the imposts in our present condition? I deny it, and the experience of the past repudiates it. I ask, Mr. Chairman, whence comes the voice daring to speak as the Delphian oracle of our Democratic faith? If the doctrine I utter be treason to the cardinal principles of that historic faith, summon from the shades of the past the spirits of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Wright, and a host of others upon whose lives rests the halo of an eternal fame. Dispel the illusions under which they acted and died, and then dispel the delusion of the people who cherish their memory with a kindred love. These great statesmen spake and acted in a spirit of patriotism as well as business, and at their magic touch the wilds of America blossomed like the rose. Will you in the nineteenth century reverse these principles and practices justified by the unbroken history of our Democratic administrative policy? In obedience to what principle of our faith shall I give my support to this bill?

I submit that the analysis of the tariff policy of every Democratic administration since the foundation of the Government demonstrates a close approach to the domain of protection while laying and collecting taxes for revenue, not I grant in the assertion of the principle of protection for the sake of protection, but as an expression of wise and patriotic statesmanship which always seeks to develop the power, wealth, and resources of the country when it can be accomplished within the authority of the Constitution by an intelligent and businesslike application of the taxing power for revenue in a spirit of judicious discrimination, in the selection of sources of revenue; recognizing the boundless wealth of our natural resources, of agriculture, of manufactures, of mining, and of commerce, and knowing that the exercise of this discrimination must inevitably result in the development of a home power of production which would render our country independent of foreign nations both in peace and in war.

LET US HAVE SUBSTANTIAL REFORM.

Sir, I am in favor of a reform of the impost system of tariff, but I want a substantial reform of its inequalities and the weeding out of odious monopolies wherever they exist. I favor a reduction of taxation through a wise and judicious modification of the rates of duty imposed, so as not to cripple our own industries at the expense of our laboring people, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, and I want this reduction of taxation to inure to the benefit of the masses of the people in the bestowal of the greatest good to the greatest number. And, finally, I favor a large reduction of revenue also, in order to remove from whatever party may be in power the standing temptation to extravagance, waste, and corruption.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I suggest the amendment of the bill under consideration which proposes a horizontal reduction of impost duties only, whose operations may prove speculative and illusory in the view of reducing revenues, by substituting a repeal of special taxes—taxes on tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, and snuff; taxes on lager beer, ale, and porter, producing a reduction of revenues patent to the humblest citizen and amounting to quite $60,000,000; the disbandment of the army of internal-revenue officers; the transfer of the collection of the tax on distilled spirits to the customs machinery of the Treasury Department; and the enlargement of the free-list, to include all articles entering into the consumption of the masses of wage-earners, in their food, their clothing, and their humble homes, as far as it can be judiciously done without too great an additional sacrifice of revenues—and by such a measure of legislation give an earnest to the suffering people of an honest intention to cut off the heavy burdens of useless taxation.

This is practical, this is substantial, this is real. Will you accept it and receive the approval of a grateful people, or will you reject it and enter a hopeless race for executive power? [Great applause.]

At the conclusion of Mr. HOBLITZELL'S remarks he yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. FINDLAY.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not propose to make a speech now, but I shall reserve what I have to say until to-morrow upon the subject of this bill. In the mean time I will send to the Clerk's desk certain resolutions which I ask to have read, and which I will make hereafter the basis of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it has been the fixed policy of this country in time of peace to raise its revenue by the indirect, and not by the direct system of taxation; and that, with the exception of the tax on distilled spirits, to be collected in some simpler way than that now existing, it would be wise to return to the ancient and traditionary methods of taxation recognized since the foundation of the Government.

Resolved, That the taxes on tobacco in all its manufactured forms, and the taxes on fermented liquors, together with all special taxes of whatever kind imposed in connection with either tobacco or fermented liquors, should be abolished, and all laws levying or imposing the same repealed.

Resolved, That the annual revenues of the country ought not to be allowed to exceed a just estimate of the wants of the Government, and as soon as it shall be ascertained what excess of revenue, if any, over and above expenditures, immediate and prospective, there will be from the duties levied on imports by the act of March 3, 1883, after allowing for the reduction in the revenues proposed by the repeal of certain internal-revenue taxes, as provided in the last preceding resolution, then provision ought to be made for the reduction of such excess to the level of the revenue actually required to carry on the Government; and in making this reduction just regard should be had to the various interests and opinions of different parts of the country, so as most effectually to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare; but,

Whereas it is certain that the diminution of the rates of duty on some articles would increase instead of reduce the aggregate amount of revenue on such articles; and

Whereas in regard to such articles as it has been the policy of the Government to protect, a slight reduction on one might produce essential injury and even distress to large classes of the community, while another might bear a large reduction without any such consequences; and

Whereas there are many articles the duties on which might be reduced or altogether abolished without producing any other effect than the reduction of revenue: Therefore,

Resolved, That in reducing the rates of duties on imports fixed by the act of March 3, 1883, it is not wise or judicious to proceed by way of an equal reduction per centum on all articles by what is popularly known as a horizontal cut, but due regard in each case should be had to the question whether the proposed reduction will affect revenue alone, or how far it will operate injuriously on those domestic manufactures hitherto protected, especially such as are essential in time of war, to such also as have been established on the faith of existing laws, and, above all, how far such proposed reduction will affect the rates of wages and the earnings of American manual labor.

Resolved, That whereas the people of the United States have deprived the State governments of all power of fostering manufactures by commercial regulations, or by laying duties on imports, and have transferred the whole jurisdiction upon this subject to the Government of the United States, any dereliction of this authority, or any exercise of it by Congress in the interest of what is popularly known as free trade, or in the rejection of incidental protection, would be unwise and injudicious, and an unjustifiable abandonment of a plain constitutional duty.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the extraordinary measures enacted during the late war for the raising of revenue to meet a great emergency, and those enacted since for the purpose of paying the great public debt which was contracted, have not only met all our obligations but have produced a vast surplus. Two years ago this month I had the honor to address this House on the bill to provide for the appointment of the Tariff Commission. At that time I referred to the fact that the surplus revenue amounted to about $150,000,000 a year.

Speaking of the onerous taxation borne by the people, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Folger, used the following language in his message to Congress December, 1881:

The result upon the public revenue is to embarrass this Department in disposing of the surplus in a lawful way and with regard to economy.

And further:

Meanwhile the daily receipts from the community by the Treasury continue, the surplus over its needs increases, and money lies idle. It seems that the plan most just for giving relief is to reduce taxation, and thereby diminish receipts and surplus. (Executive Document No. 2, page 18.)

How has this wise and timely recommendation of Secretary Folger been met by his party in Congress?

THE TARIFF COMMISSION.

At the first session of the last Congress, instead of proceeding at once to reduce the revenue, the Republican majority passed the bill creating the Tariff Commission. That commission was composed wholly of protectionists, although a minority of the commission were appointed as Democrats to represent the Democratic sentiment of the country. The commission, as stated by the honorable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in his able speech during this session, traveled over 7,000 miles, visited twenty-nine cities, and examined more than 600 witnesses, taking testimony seventy-eight days, which covers 2,625 printed pages, and reported to Congress that—

In the performance of the duty devolved upon them all the members of the commission have aimed, and as they believe with success, to divest themselves of all political bias, sectional prejudice, or considerations of personal interest. It is their desire that their recommendations shall serve no particular party, class, section, or school of political economy.

Actuated by this spirit of fairness, the commission reported in favor of a substantial reduction of tariff duties. Their conclusion on this point is thus forcibly expressed in their report:

Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by a mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country, including that which has in former times been most strenuous for the preservation of our national industrial defenses. Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers, but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction. No rates of defensive duties, except for the establishment of new industries, which more than equalize the conditions of labor and capital with those of foreign competitors can be justified. Excessive duties or those above such standard of equalization are positively injurious to the interests which they are supposed to benefit.

I heard a gentleman inquire to-day, with some apparent interest, who had recommended a reduction of the tariff? I will state in reply that this very Tariff Commission, composed entirely of protectionists, and organized to investigate that subject, after taking the testimony of six hundred witnesses, reported that it was demanded by the best conservative sentiment of the country, and by the protected industries themselves. They made a report as to the extent to which this reduction should go; and what was it?

One would suppose, from this language, that it had been uttered by some tariff reformer upon this side of the House during this debate.

We were not left in the dark as to what this substantial reduction of tariff duties thus recommended by this commission of protectionists ought to be. Their report contained the following specific language on this subject:

The average reduction in rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of the duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent. The reduction, slight in some cases, in others not attempted, is in many cases from 40 to 50 per cent.

A bill was prepared by the commission which purported to carry out this recommendation. At the last session of Congress that bill was considered, amended, and passed. No one knew just what the reductions would amount to. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] when the bill was on its final passage in this House said it was "a leap in the dark." And so it proved to be. The committee of conference, which gave it its finishing touches, may have known more about it than the other members of that Congress, but I am quite sure that committee did not fully comprehend its provisions. Time and practical experience have served to throw light upon its dark pages.

REDUCTION BY THE NEW TARIFF LAW.

Mr. Joseph Nimmo, jr., Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, has submitted a report to the Secretary of the Treasury on "the operations of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, for the six months ending December 31, 1883." This statement (page 5) shows that the actual reduction on "all dutiable merchandise" imported into this country for the first six months under the operation of the new tariff act was only 1.47 per cent., or, as Mr. Nimmo prefers to state the fact, there was "a fall of 1.47 in the ad valorem rate." This appears from the practical workings of the law. But he is of the opinion that the data upon which this result is based are subject to certain modifications, which he proceeded to explain. As I desire to give the friends of the new tariff law the benefit of the most favorable construction possible, I will give the result of Mr. Nimmo's "modifications." He claims the actual reductions to be as follows (page 10):

It appears, therefore, as nearly as can now be ascertained, that the act of March 3, 1883, of itself, and aside from the influence of other conditions, caused the following changes in ad valorem rates: on all dutiable merchandise, a fall of 5.63; on sugar and melada, a fall of 9.32; on iron and steel and manufactures thereof, a fall of 6.15; on clothing wool, a fall of 9.88; on combing wool, a fall of 11.27; on carpet wool, a fall of 6.01; on manufactures of wool, a fall of 4.52; on manufactures of cotton, an increase of 1.92; on manufactures of silk, a fall of 8.82; on earthen and china ware, an increase of 13.11; on glass and glassware, a rise of 1.09; on spirits and wines, an increase of 18.28; and on malt liquors, a fall of 0.59.

Thus it will be seen that, after allowing all claims of the friends of the law, the average reduction "on all dutiable merchandise" is less than 6 per cent., or exactly 5.63. But the Tariff Commission reported that the reduction, which was demanded by the best conservative opinion of the country, which would be conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and ultimately beneficial to the protected industries themselves, would amount to not less than 20 per cent.; and in the opinion of the commission the bill which they recommended would effect a reduction of 25 per cent. Contrast these promises and pledges with the actual results, the practical workings of the new law. The actual reduction was less than 1½ per cent., and the highest estimates of the Bureau of Statistics, under the most favorable circumstances that could be imagined, places the reduction at less than 6 per cent.

NECESSITY OF FURTHER REDUCTION.

The President, in his annual message to Congress, December, 1882, stated that the receipts from all sources for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882, were $403,525,250; and that the surplus, after paying all ordinary expenses of the Government, amounted to $166,281,505. In that message he said:

I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government.

The passage of the tariff act of 1883 was all that was done in this direction by the last Congress.

In the President's last annual message, December, 1883, at the beginning of this session, he reported the surplus revenue for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, to be $134,178,756, and the total revenue for that year $398,287,581. He estimated the amount of reduction of the revenues for the current year, under the operation of the new tariff law and the repeal of internal-revenue taxes, which that act effected, to be "at least fifty or sixty millions of dollars."

THE SURPLUS REVENUE.

The surplus for the year ending June 30, 1884, was estimated upon existing laws at $85,000,000, and for the year 1885 at $60,000,000. But these estimates were made before the practical workings of the new tariff law could be demonstrated. The surplus for the current year will probably reach $100,000,000, and if this House shall adhere to the wise measures of economy which have usually characterized Democratic Congresses, the surplus for the next year, ending June 30, 1885, will be even greater than that amount.

In view of the failure of Congress at its last session to reduce taxation to the extent required for an economical administration of the Government, it becomes the imperative duty of this Congress to make the necessary reduction. A reduction of the annual revenues to the extent of at least $50,000,000 is demanded by every consideration of the public welfare. It is little less than a crime to continue to impose war taxes in time of peace to the enormous amount which existing laws provide. How shall further reductions be secured? At the last session Congress reduced the internal-revenue tax on tobacco from 16 to 8 cents per pound, and on cigars from six to three dollars a thousand, and repealed the internal taxes on banks, matches, and all other articles except distilled spirits, beer, and tobacco, and dealers in these articles. It seems to me that Congress has gone quite far enough in the direction of repealing internal-revenue taxes. The people do not desire to be further relieved of such taxes until there has been a substantial reduction of the customs duties on the necessaries of life.

WAR TAXES.

The war tariffs still remain. On cotton goods the average tax is equivalent to 38 per cent., on wool and woolen goods 57, on sugar 43, on lumber and woodenware 33, and on earthenware and glassware 53, and the average on all dutiable merchandise is, under the new law, 40 per cent. These are high-protective, and in many cases prohibitory, tariffs. They create and foster monopolies and, except as to sugar and a few other articles, yield a subsidy to the manufacturers of domestic products not subjected to the tax which vastly exceeds the amount the Government actually receives.

THE TARIFF CREATES AND FOSTERS MONOPOLIES.

Under the operation of our tariff laws many of the leading industries of the country have been placed in the control of monopolies. The monopolists regulate the output and fix the prices of the products. The iron and steel manufacturers, the glass, pottery, coke, and other great interests, have organized societies for pooling their business and controlling prices and profits. The nail manufacturers have their national associations and absolutely control the business of the country. At the last session of Congress, by some mysterious jugglery, the duty on wrought-iron nails and wrought board-nails was increased from 2½ cents to 4 cents per pound. The tariff on nails is practically prohibitory. The importation for 1883 was valued at only $195.65, and the duty received was only $87.60. This was about 45 per cent. ad valorem. On other kinds of nails there was a nominal reduction of duties by the act of March 3, 1883. But the rates are still prohibitory. Hence the whole business has fallen into the hands of monopolists. The business is large and important. There are sixty-two establishments in the country, of which thirty-six are in Massachusetts. The capital invested is $3,877,805, and the product for 1880 was $5,629,240. The whole amount paid in wages was $1,255,171. The high tariff on nails enables the home manufactories to combine and control the market. The last Congress aided them in this by increasing the duties on one class of nails and making the reductions so slight on other classes as to still keep out the foreign product. With the foreign product excluded from our country the home manufacturers proceed to shut down their mills, limit production, and regulate the prices. Last December (1883) the newspapers contained the following information on this subject:

PITTSBURGH, PA., December 19.

The Western Nail Association, at a meeting here to-day, discussed the question of shutting down the mills and reducing production. The session lasted nearly all day. There was a diversity of opinion as to the necessity of suspending operations. Western members generally held that, as stocks were low and prices remunerative and firm, the mills should not be shut down. Those who held the opposite view said the only way to secure an advance in prices next spring was to suspend operations.

"We must convince dealers that manufacturers have power to regulate prices," said one.

It was finally agreed to suspend work at all the nail mills from December 29 to February 11. It was the largest meeting of the association ever held, all the mills being represented by delegates or letter.

Then in order to raise prices by limiting production, they shut down from December 29 to February 11 of this year.

During all this time the workingmen in the nail factories were thrown out of employment, and were compelled to seek wherever they could find it any employment to keep them from starvation. Having limited production and produced an artificial scarcity, the next step in the work of the monopolists was to fix the prices at which their nails will be sold. Spring has now arrived, and the next information we receive is contained in the following dispatch:

PITTSBURGH, April 10.

The Western Nail Association met again to-day to settle the details of the pool formed yesterday. A board of nine agents, composed of the president and two members from each of the four districts of the association, was appointed. The board will handle all nails manufactured by the association mills, instead of each firm selling their own product, and will regulate the output and prices. An advance in prices is anticipated.

The four districts will be as follows: First, Pittsburgh and vicinity; second, Wheeling; third, Ohio River factories; fourth, mills of Indiana, Wisconsin, and Saint Louis. The agreement was signed by all the manufacturers present, and as soon as the signatures of absent ones are obtained the pool will go into effect, and an advance in prices is likely to be ordered by the board.

"An advance in prices is likely to be ordered by the board." No longer, under our tariff laws, are prices to be governed by the laws of supply and demand. The board of managers of a legalized monopoly will regulate the output and prices in the future. And as the protective tariff excludes foreign nails, this gives the manufacturers full control of prices in the home market. This is only one of the results or incidents of the protective system, which the present bill seeks to do away with.

THE BURDEN OF TAXATION.

The revenue received by the Government from all sources during the last fiscal year amounted to nearly $400,000,000. This was equal to $8 a head for every man, woman, and child in the land. As these taxes are paid by consumers in the increased cost of commodities, it approximates nearly to a per capita tax. It bears equally upon all the people according to the amount of articles they buy and consume, and not according to their property or ability to pay. The poor man who works for a dollar a day and the poor woman who works in the factories of Massachusetts and Rhode Island eleven hours a day for 75 cents each pay the same tax per pound on the sugar and salt they consume and the clothing they wear that is paid by the millionaires of the country. The four hundred millions received by the Government amounts to $40 for an average family of five persons.

But this is not all the consumers have to pay by reason of the tariff. The duties on articles imported raises their price to the consumer to the extent of the duty. The average duty being 40 per cent., every hundred dollars' worth of goods imported must pay a tax of $40 in order to be exposed for sale in this country. The claim of protectionists that this tax does not increase the cost of the article to the consumer is too absurd for serious consideration. Could an importer afford to buy a cargo of goods in Europe for $100,000 and then pay $40,000 to land them in New York and then sell them for $100,000 in this country, adding only for freight and his commission perhaps 10 per cent. on original investment? Could he sell for $110,000 what had cost him $140,000? These questions need no answer. Yet protectionists continually assert that the import tax is not added to the price of the article to the consumer. Not only is it added, but more is added. The importer advances the tax, but immediately charges a commission on the tax itself as well as on the original cost of the goods. These commissions are repeated every time the goods change hands until they reach the consumer. But in case of products of home manufacture, which do not pay import duties, the price may or may not be enhanced to the amount of the tax on imported articles of like character, according to a variety of circumstances. In an article which I contributed to the North American Review for June, 1883, I endeavored to explain fully this subject and ask pardon for reproducing some extracts from it:

A discriminating duty is one which is imposed upon the importation of commodities of foreign production, unaccompanied by an equivalent tax upon the home product of like character. The imported article can only be sold in this country after payment of the Government duty. "A tax on any one article," says Mr. Mill, "will, as a general rule, raise the value and price of the commodity by at least the amount of the tax." This, of course, relates to the price of the commodity upon which the tax is actually laid and collected; but the rule as to the increased cost of other commodities not taxed, but incidentally affected by the tax, varies according to circumstances. If the home product of a given article is not equal to the home demand for consumption, and imports of like character come in to supply the deficiency, the whole amount of the tax on the imported article will be added to the price of the home product. For example, Bessemer pig-iron, which was imported during the last year to the amount of 500,000 tons, was worth in England in January last about $13.38 per ton. The duty was then $7 per ton, and that, with freights and other charges, would raise the cost in this country to about $22 per ton. At the same time, the selling price of the home product in this country was $22 to $22.50 per ton. Upon this article, at that time, the whole domestic product was increased in value to the full amount of the duty.

If the home product is equal to or exceeds the home demand, but can not be exported without loss to the producer or manufacturer, the increased cost of the home product will be measured by the cost of production, with such profits as may be permitted by domestic competition, and will always be less than the tax upon the foreign product. For example, English steel rails can be laid down in New York for about $25 per ton. Prior to the passage of the new tariff law the duty was $28 per ton. This would make the selling price of English rails in New York $53 per ton. But the home product was selling at the same time at $40 per ton, showing that the cost of American rails was only $15 per ton in excess of foreign rails, instead of $28, which was the amount of the duty. Hence, upon this article at that time the price of the home product of steel rails was enhanced only $15 per ton, and not to the extent of the duty. But this low price of the home product was the result of domestic competition, and has only been recently realized. During the years 1880 and 1881, for instance, prices were such that the whole amount of the duty was added to the cost of the domestic article.

If home products exceed the home demand for consumption and can be exported at a profit to the producer or manufacturer, the imposition of a duty on imported articles of like character will not affect the price of the home product. For example: There is a nominal duty of 10 cents a bushel on imported Indian corn, but the imports of that article for the last fiscal year were only 69,641 bushels, while the exports for the same year were 43,000,000 bushels, and for the preceding year 91,000,000 bushels. The same may be said generally of all breadstuffs and farm products. Although duties are levied upon the importation of similar articles, yet these are merely nominal and do not increase the price of the domestic products to consumers, except in a few cases. The exceptions are rice, sugar, oranges and lemons, barley, malt, potatoes at markets near the Eastern seaboard, and a few other articles which it is unnecessary to mention.

In these observations I do not wish to be understood as departing from the principle that prices are governed by the law of supply and demand. The Government, by the imposition of duties on imported articles, limits the supply of such articles in all cases where the home product is not equal to the demand for home consumption, and thus, by limiting the supply, increases the price of the product on hand.

In the same article I presented a carefully prepared statement, compiled from the reports of the Census Bureau and the tables of Treasury experts, in reference to the various commodities mentioned therein. Several gentlemen who have spoken during this debate have done me the honor to reproduce my statement in their speeches. I will also ask leave to print it.

The statement is as follows:

Statement showing the amount of incidental taxes annually imposed on the people of the United States in the increased cost of home products by reason of discriminating duties on imported articles of like character, together with the value of such home products, the amount of wages paid and number of hands employed, and the imports and duties received thereon, for the year 1882.

Articles affected by the tariff.	Merchandise imported during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1882.			Value of home products, census year, 1880.	Average number of hands employed. The following explanation of the statement accompanied the article as published in the North American Review:

It will be seen from an examination of the statement that the rate of increase in the cost of the home product by reason of the tariff has been estimated in each case at much below the duty itself. This is due to the fact that many of the articles are increased in price only to a limited extent by reason of the tariff. The statement embraces nearly all the industries of the United States which are materially affected by the tariff, and gives also the number of employés in such industries, the amount of wages paid to them, and the total value of the home product. The item of sundries embraces all protected industries not otherwise enumerated, except such as are mentioned below.

I am unable to obtain a reliable estimate of the amount of provisions and liquors which are increased in price by reason of the tariff. Very few provisions are increased in price. Rice is an exception. The total product of the United States for the census year was 110,131,373 pounds. The amount imported was nearly 64,000,000 pounds, and the duty was 2½ cents per pound, or 111 per cent. ad valorem. The price of the home product is doubtless increased to consumers to the extent of at least 2 cents a pound by reason of the tax, which would amount to an incidental tax burden of $2,200,000.

There are many other articles affected by the tariff which are not included in my statement, such as barley, malt, lemons, oranges, domestic wines, &c. But the amount of incidental taxes upon the chief articles of consumption is quite large enough to arrest public attention. I have based my estimates upon the rates of duty imposed by the tariff law of March 3, 1883. If I have erred in any way it is in placing the amount of incidental taxes too low. The people of the United States have been subjected to a burden of at least $556,000,000 every year for the past twenty years, making an aggregate of over $11,000,000,000, not one dollar of which went into the national Treasury. Since the war began we have paid more by incidental taxation to protect our "infant industries" than it cost to put down the rebellion and pay all the claims, bonded debt, interest, and damages incident thereto.

In view of the vast amount demanded and received by the Government, in view of the incidental taxes which are imposed upon the people in the increased cost of domestic products, and the vast burdens which all these impose in the shape of taxes direct and indirect, it seems to me that the representatives of the people in this Congress are required by every obligation of the public weal to proceed immediately to reduce taxation. The pending bill does no more than was recommended by the Tariff Commission. It is the completion of the work which that commission undertook. It goes no further in reductions than that commission said was demanded by the best interests of the country. Surely a Democratic Congress will not hesitate to enact such a measure as this and bring some relief to the people. The people are demanding it.

REVENUE REFORM IN BOSTON.

But recently I have seen the call for a meeting to be held in Boston for the purpose of organizing a league to promote a reduction of the tariff. The names of seven hundred and twenty-five of the leading merchants, bankers, business men, and statesmen of Massachusetts were signed to that paper, among them some of the wealthiest and the most influential citizens of that State of both political parties. The following is the text of the call:

The undersigned, believing that the present enormous surplus in the national revenues is demoralizing and dangerous; that it should be cut down without further delay, not by increasing the public expenditure, but by lessening the burden of taxation; that this burden should be removed from the necessaries of life, and not from whisky and tobacco; and that the policy of taxing imports, not for the purpose of raising revenue, but of obstructing trade, is unsound, and must ultimately be abandoned, invite all those who hold these views to meet at Young's Hotel, Boston, room 12, on Tuesday, April 29, at 4 p. m., for the purpose of forming a league for their advancement.

In one Congressional district in that State the Republican convention, when sending delegates to the Republican convention in Chicago, adopted a resolution favoring a reduction in the tariff on the necessaries of life.

WORKINGMEN AND THEIR WAGES.

The only pretext which is urged by gentlemen on the other side for not proceeding to reduce the revenue is that a reduction of the tariff will be injurious to the laboring classes. It would seem from their arguments that the more taxes laboring men pay the richer they will get, and that any effort to reduce taxation is an effort to destroy labor. Gentlemen have assumed in this debate that if you reduce these tariff duties you will destroy the manufacturing industries of the country and throw the laborers out of employment. I do not believe it. If it would do so I should not favor it. I am in favor of securing to the workingmen of this country all of the rights which it is possible for them to have under the law.

Their condition appeals directly to our sympathies and demands the highest consideration of enlightened statesmanship. The lawyer, the merchant, the professional man, and the manufacturer are generally so well-to-do that they do not need the aids of co-operation, of unions, of legislation in order to protect themselves from oppression and wrong. But the workingmen who depend upon their weekly wages for the support of themselves and families, and who must toil for eight or ten or more hours a day in order to supply their wants, deserve and should receive all the aid, all the assistance, all the protection, if you please, that wise and just laws can furnish.

The lot of the laborer is a hard one. Ten hours a day in manual labor leaves but little time for mental culture or for those fireside pleasures with the wife and little ones which make our homes happy and life desirable. How few of those who are well-to-do in the world can appreciate the hardships, the trials, the temptations of the laborers of the land. For myself, my sympathies have always been on the side of the toiling millions. When they strike for higher wages I scarcely take time to consider whether they are right or wrong, for my heart responds in sympathy before my head can solve the problem of the relation of capital to labor. When they organize for mutual aid and co-operation I feel as if I were enrolled with them to secure their rights and the just remuneration for their toil. When the factories are closed against them, and an effort is made to starve them into submission to lower wages or longer hours of labor, I go out in sympathy with them and raise my voice with theirs for justice and living pay. Hence, sympathizing as I do with labor in all its hardships, toils, and privations, I am disposed to concede to workingmen the best protection that the State or nation can furnish.

What protection can wise and just laws afford to labor? This is a question which demands the most serious thought and careful study of our wisest statesmen. Can a just law compel one workingman to contribute a portion of his time or a portion of his wages for the benefit of another person? That would be manifestly unjust. If the law permitted one man to appropriate all the time and labor of another to his own use, that would be human slavery. If it permitted one man to appropriate one-tenth of the time and labor of another to his own use, that would be 10 per cent. of slavery. To the extent that one man may by law appropriate to himself the earnings of another, to that extent is the one the slave to the other. We have abolished human slavery in this country, and the universal sentiment of mankind condemns the system.

The law therefore ought not to aid or protect one class of laborers at the expense of another. Can the law then furnish no protection to labor? This does not follow. The law can protect all classes to the extent of guaranteeing to them equal rights, and can secure to every man the fruits of his earnings, less the amount which he ought to contribute to the support of Government.

It is conceded that all valuable commodities must be created by labor. To secure such commodities is the object of all our toil. We must either create them ourselves or obtain them from others. Are not those who create them entitled to them, and may they not exchange such as they have and do not need for such as they need and do not have? Will you deny this privilege to workingmen, to those who create valuable articles in excess of their own wants?

THE PURCHASING POWER OF WAGES.

From these observations it will be seen that workingmen are more concerned in the purchasing power of their wages than they are in the nominal amount of their wage-fund. Money is not the real object of labor. It is merely a convenient medium for the exchange of values. Silver and gold will not of themselves supply the demands of the stomach or protect the person from cold or heat. Greenbacks will not shelter us in a storm or supply the place of blankets, carpets, and bedding. Money is useful only as it aids in the exchange of property and products of labor. The question which ought to concern the workingman above all others is, "How many useful articles and comforts of life can I procure with the proceeds of a day's labor?" If one day's labor will purchase a blanket of a certain quality, what difference does it make whether the nominal amount of the wages is two dollars or three?

And so of all other articles which may be desired for the comforts of life. A friend of mine was during the war a prisoner at Andersonville. He exchanged some greenbacks he had for confederate money, for the reason that the latter was current with the sutlers about the prison. But he found that it required $20 of such money to purchase a watermelon. He learned from this little experience that the purchasing power of money was its most essential quality. If a laborer should receive a hundred dollars a day in such depreciated money he would find it impossible to supply with it his most pressing demands.

THE OBJECT OF LABOR.

What, then, is the object of labor so far as the workingman is concerned? It is to supply his wants, to support his family, to educate his children, to surround himself with the greatest possible amount of the comforts of life, for which he can exchange the products of his toil. In what way can the Government aid him in this matter? It can impose as light a burden as possible upon him for the support of the State and nation. It can prevent, or ought to prevent, the extortion of common carriers, the grinding power of monopolies, the plunder, peculation, and oppression of public officials, and the granting of special and exclusive privileges to favored classes. But can it in justice require one class of laborers to contribute a portion of their earnings to another class, except for purposes of government? Can the laws be so framed as to enable a man to get more than he can himself earn? The laborer is worthy of his hire. But is he worthy of any portion of the wages of another?

DOES PROTECTION PROTECT?

It is claimed that protective tariffs can and do protect the laborers of this country from the competition of the laborers of other countries. How can this be shown? It must follow, if this be true, that the law must exclude the product of foreign labor or impose a tax upon its importation that will increase the price of the home product of like character to the amount of the tax upon the foreign article. The home product, not being subject to the tax, may be sold for a higher price than it would otherwise bring, and the laborer who created such home product would thereby be better remunerated for his labor. If protection be a reality, it results from this effect of protective laws. But, conceding for the sake of the argument that this be true, who pays the amount which protection secures? Protection, if it is anything, results from the increased price of domestic products which protective laws have produced. Who pays this increased price? The consumers of the products. And who are the consumers? The people. If blankets are increased in price by protective laws, who pays the increased price? The consumers of blankets. If woolen goods are increased in price who pays the increase? The consumers of woolen goods. This seems to me too plain to require proof or further illustration. The great mass of the products of our people is consumed at home.

If the price of these products is increased to the consumers by reason of protective laws, our own people, our working people, must pay the amount of that increase as well as the price which the product would bring if unaffected by such laws. If this increased price is for the benefit of the workingmen, for those who created the products, who is to reimburse the other workingmen who must in purchasing those commodities for their own use pay this increased price? Is not by this process a portion of their wages taken from them in order to better remunerate other workingmen for their labor? Is not this practically the taking of a portion of one man's earnings and bestowing them upon another without consideration? It is a species of slavery. It is wrong in principle, oppressive in practice, and a fraud upon workingmen themselves.

But I must do the advocates of the protective system the justice to state that they insist that protective laws have the effect to decrease the prices of commodities. In Congress we hear this argument advanced whenever the subject is being considered. Protectionists point to the fact that many of the leading products have greatly decreased in price in this country since our protective laws were passed, and argue from this that protection has caused it. But they fail to point to the further fact that in England, where protective laws do not exist, there has been even a greater decrease in the prices of the same products during the same time.

Now, I was taught when in college that "like causes produce like effects." If protection has decreased prices in this country, how is it that free trade has decreased them to a greater extent in England? I have never heard this explained fully yet. The fact is this: The improvements in the processes of production, which are the result of new inventions, the increased facilities of transportation, the general diffusion of knowledge, and many other natural causes, have made production cheaper and decreased prices accordingly. But these very causes should have greatly improved the condition of workingmen. They should have been enabled to secure more of the comforts of life with less effort, to have been able to decrease the hours of labor, and to have increased the sum of their happiness. Strikes should have grown less frequent, lock-outs should have ceased, and labor should enjoy its perfect remuneration.

IMPROVED PROCESSES OF PRODUCTION.

I may be pardoned for referring for one moment to some facts and figures in connection with this subject. I have the authority of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], an experienced iron manufacturer, for the statement that in 1860 the cost of producing steel was in no case less than 10 cents per pound. A better quality of steel can now be produced for 2 cents a pound. This result has been arrived at by improved processes whereby the productive power of labor has been correspondingly increased in this class of production.

Steel is one of the most essential agents of industry, and the increased facilities for its production demonstrate how great have been the increased facilities for production in every other branch of manual labor.

A striking illustration of the increased productive power of human effort is found in the manufacture of boots and shoes. By comparing the census report of 1870 with that of 1880 it will be seen in reference to this important industry that in the year 1870, 91,702 hands were employed in factories in the manufacture of boots and shoes. They produced in this year 80,627,244 pairs. This amounted to a product of 879 pairs to each hand employed. In 1880 there were 111,052 hands engaged in this industry, and the number of pairs of boots and shoes made aggregated for the census year 125,478,511. This shows an annual product for each hand of 1,129 pairs. The increased productive power of those engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes in factories was 250 pairs to each hand, or over 28 per cent. But let us follow these facts further. The total amount of wages paid in 1870 for the manufacture of the 80,000,000 pairs of boots and shoes that year amounted to $42,504,444. This shows that each hand received 52 cents per pair for making boots and shoes in factories during that year.

In 1880 the 111,052 hands employed received altogether in wages for their labor but $43,001,438, or only 35 cents per pair. By comparing these figures with 1870 we will perceive that the loss to the operative on each pair produced amounts to 17 cents, or a decrease of nearly 33 per cent. In other words, one hand in 1870 for making two pairs received about the same pay he received in 1880 for making three pairs.

A further fact is worthy of note in this connection. The average annual pay of each hand engaged in this branch of industry in 1870 was $463.50, and for 1880 the average pay was only $387.21.

Thus we see that the average compensation of each operative employed in our boot and shoe factories for the year 1870 was $76 per annum more than that paid in 1880, and the number of pairs made by each was 250 in number less in the former year than in the latter. In other words, operatives were paid in the year 1870 $463.50 for the manufacture of 879 pairs of boots and shoes, while in 1880 they were paid at the rate of only $387.21 for the manufacture of 1,129 pairs; so that while the productive power of labor increased 33 per cent. in ten years the compensation of the workingman in this branch of industry decreased 16 per cent.

During the past twenty years the protection on boots and shoes has been 35 per cent. ad valorem. Whatever advantages this protection may have been to the manufacturer, it is quite certain that the workingmen in that industry received no benefit. Protection failed in this case to protect or benefit laborers in boot and shoe factories.

Take another illustration. In 1870 the production of cotton goods or cotton fabrics amounted to 349,314,592 pounds, and the hands employed were 135,369. The product per hand was 2,580 pounds. In 1880 the production was 607,264,241 pounds. The hands employed were 172,544. The product per hand was 3,519 pounds. The increase per hand was 939 pounds, or 36 per cent. The wages paid in 1870 amounted to $39,044,132. This was an average for each hand of $288. In 1880 the wages paid amounted to $42,040,510, or an average of only $242 to each hand. The wages of each hand decreased $45, or 18 per cent., in ten years, while the productive power of each increased 36 per cent. During this period the protection on the principal articles of production and consumption of cotton fabrics was over 50 per cent. In this industry the manufacturers may have been benefited, but certainly the laborers received no benefit. Protective tariffs do not protect the operatives in cotton fabrics. I might go through with the whole list of highly protected industries and the result would prove the same—an increase of productive power and a decrease of wages. Protection does not protect labor.

I regret that the census statistics are so compiled as to make it impossible to make a similar comparison as to the productions of agriculture at different periods. Some agricultural products are estimated by weight, some by measure, and others only in values, and it is impossible to determine how many persons are engaged in the respective productions. But I have aggregated the number of bushels of Indian corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, and buckwheat produced in 1870 and 1880, and find the increased production between these periods to be nearly 100 per cent. I find the increased production per hand to be 68 per cent. in the products named. The improved machinery used, the knowledge acquired in the use of fertilizers, and the increased facilities of transportation have greatly increased the productive power of labor in agriculture, as well as in manufacture. Our tariff laws make it impossible to any great extent to export our surplus manufactured products, and they fall upon our home market and depress it by overproduction.

Labor first feels this depression in the stoppage of mills or running them on reduced time or in the reduction of wages. These results are now being felt by nearly every branch of manufacturing industry. But there can be no overproduction of agricultural products. They are not fostered by protective tariffs. It is true that there is a nominal duty on the importation of the cereals I have named, but except in the case of barley the duty does not protect and the result would not be changed perceptibly if the duty were abolished. Those cereals and all products of the soil readily find a market abroad. Who ever heard of overproduction of corn, wheat, cotton, or of any agricultural product? All rejoice in the prospect of bountiful crops from the fact that any surplus we may have can be shipped abroad with profit. It would be precisely so in manufactures if our surplus could be exported with profit.

The facts which I have cited prove conclusively that the wages of labor have not increased in proportion to the increase of the productive power of human effort. A laborer can accomplish much more of result to-day than he could ten or twenty years ago. Hence the remuneration or purchasing power of labor should be greater now than then, but it is not. On the contrary it appears that the wages of workingmen in 1860 and 1870 were greater in many industries than they were in 1880, according to the census of those years.

LABOR STATISTICS.

The condition of workingmen has not improved in proportion to the improvement in the processes of production. The purchasing power of their wages has not increased in proper proportion to the creative power of their brain and muscle. With all the advantages of modern invention and improvement in their favor, the workingmen of the country have not increased the purchasing power of their efforts. In the State of Illinois we have organized a bureau of labor statistics for the purpose of collecting all useful information and facts affecting the laboring classes. The board is composed of practical workers, and was established at the earnest solicitation of workingmen's organizations. It has made careful examination into the condition of labor in Illinois. The last report of the bureau (1882), on page 288, sums up the result of the investigation and presents the facts which are proven. The report says:

The class who constitute the contributors to these tables are the more intelligent and prosperous of the great mass of workers. They are chiefly identified with labor organizations, and possess the individual thoughtfulness and thrift necessary alike to self-help and to organized effort. These statistics are accordingly fairly representative of intelligent workingmen, who make the most of their advantages, and do not cover the case of vast numbers of workingmen whose condition is below the averages here given, and do not reach the lower stratum of the metropolitan life at all. They merely approach the confines of that world of helpless ignorance and destitution in which multitudes in all large cities continually live, and whose only statistics are those of epidemics, pauperism, and crime. It is to escape this last, worst condition, that the honest workingman makes his daily and life-long struggle. He shrinks from no hardship; he spares no time or toil; through fair weather and foul he contributes daily and willingly to the wealth of others and of the world; he accepts his humble and helpless career, but for this he asks at least to escape mendicancy, and to be able to secure food for his children and a fair expectation of shelter and repose for his declining years.

An examination of these tables will demonstrate what ground for that expectation the average workingman has. It will be observed that one-half of them are not even able to earn enough for their daily bread, and have to depend upon the labor of women and children to eke out their miserable existence. Yet these averages are high as compared with the thousands of workingmen from whom no reports are received.

In fact, the average earnings of the heads of families, for the entire list of occupations, are less than the general average for the cost of living; and that this is reduced to the minimum is painfully apparent from the tenements they occupy, the clothes they wear, and the food and fuel they consume.

Other deductions of a character not less startling will be developed upon examination of these statistics, which, although not representative of the more destitute classes, are still fruitful of suggestions as to the average condition of multitudes of people, who, living in this land of plenty, in this age of prosperity and invention, are still oppressed with continuous and relentless poverty.

Such glimpses of social conditions as are afforded by these tables reveal the disabilities which encumber honest industry, and illustrate how labor is filling the world with wealth and living itself in want; how labor-saving machinery is neither saving the labor of men and women nor reducing the hours of that labor, and how the material progress of which we boast and the prosperity of the few may operate to intensify the poverty and distress of the many.

Mr. DUNHAM. Who says that?

Mr. SPRINGER. The bureau of labor statistics of the State of Illinois, created by an act of our Legislature and appointed by the governor of our State. That bureau has made an official report, from which the extract I have read is taken, and to it I call the attention of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] and every gentleman of this committee.

It must be observed that the condition of the laboring classes in Illinois, as shown by the report of the Illinois bureau of labor statistics, is doubtless better than is the condition of those classes in many other States in the Union. Illinois is rich in agricultural resources, and all breadstuffs and provisions are much cheaper there than in the large cities and in the Eastern States; also the wages of labor are higher in Illinois than in States farther East. But their condition in Illinois, as this report shows, is bad enough. "The average earnings of heads of families for the entire list of occupations is less than the general average for the cost of living."

But, Mr. Chairman, this does not show the entire picture of distress in the labor of the country. I hold in my hand the report of a committee of this House on labor. It is report No. 444, and will be found in the document-room.

This committee proceeded to take the evidence of laborers and workingmen in the country as to their true condition at this time. That evidence is given, beginning on page 8 and continuing to the conclusion of the document, from which I will quote largely if the committee will pardon me. I am sorry the honorable gentleman on the Committee on Ways and Means from that State [Mr. KELLEY] is not present. He spoke of the distress of workingmen and working-women in England. I regret he is not here to learn something of the condition of the workingmen in his own State. He went across the waters to find a very mild case of hardship compared with those in his own State. If he had visited some localities in Pennsylvania he would have learned of distress in comparison with which the cases he cites in Europe pale in significance.

I find here from this report that the monopolists of Pennsylvania having got the tariff fixed to suit them so as to exclude foreign products from the country under the pretext of protecting American labor from competition with the pauper labor of Europe, having got these laws so arranged as to keep out the products of the pauper labor of Europe, have sent their agents to Europe and brought the paupers themselves to our country and put them in the mines, in the coke-pits, and in the mills to take the places of American workingmen.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not yield to the gentleman to make a statement in my time. I am making statements myself.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Then I will ask the gentleman a question. Does he know that in the county of Fayette, where coke is mostly made, in 1881–'82 the average price paid to miners in that county was $2.56 per day. For the truth of that statement I refer the gentleman to Mr. BOYLE, who represents that district.

Mr. SPRINGER. That may be true. But there were efforts to reduce those wages. The men struck. The employers defied them and sent to Europe for Hungarians and put them in their places. Those very men are now displaced by the most degraded of the pauper labor of Europe. The extracts from this report which I will print in my remarks, and some newspaper articles, to which I call the attention of gentlemen, will show that women, with infants at their breasts, and little girls but 10 years old are aroused at 1 o'clock in the morning and put in the coke-pits along with sturdy men to work for seventeen hours a day. And that is in Pennsylvania, under the very shadow of the temple of protection that the honorable gentleman from that State [Mr. KELLEY] has been so instrumental in rearing.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. And the people of Pennsylvania asked this Congress to pass a law to prevent the importation of foreign contract labor and cure this evil; and you have not done a single thing.

Mr. SPRINGER. We hope to pass that bill during this session.

One of the witnesses before the committee stated that since the new tariff went into effect there had been scarcely any importation of bottles, upon which the duty had been raised. He stated that two American blowers could turn out eighty dozen bottles per day, while two foreign blowers could turn out only fifty dozen per day. He said further that "the manufacturers seem to favor free trade in labor, but they were in favor of a high protective tariff on their own manufactured goods or wares." So it seems that the laborers have at last found out what is the matter in this business. They have learned that the manufacturers are for protection on the manufactured article, but are for free trade in labor.

I desire to call attention to a paper published at Reading, Pa., the Morning Herald, of April 18, 1884, which gives an account of women working on the streets, in the midst of inclement weather, breaking stones for a living.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. Does not the gentleman know as a matter of fact that, in the case of these same women who he says are breaking stones upon the streets, their real ordinary business is that of washer-women? Breaking stones is to them lighter work, as they perform it while sitting on chairs, and they find it easier to do than to wash clothes.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman may apologize for this system as much as he likes. He may see nothing onerous or toilsome in breaking stones on the streets for a living. But when women have to do that in protected America, I hope, in the language of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], that the time will come when no such scene as that will be witnessed in this favored land.

Mr. DUNHAM. And does not the gentleman know it to be the fact that these women do that work from choice?

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes, all laborers work from choice. It seems that they must work or starve; that is the choice they have. [Applause.]

Mr. BEACH. "Hobson's choice."

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee on Labor, in the report to which I have referred, submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], says:

As evidence tending to show the efforts employers of labor are making to supplant American workmen with foreigners, and as still further demonstrating the necessity for passage of this bill, attention is called to the following resolution of the Window Glass Manufacturers' Association, held at West End Hotel, Long Branch, July 11, 1883, which is submitted without comment;

"On motion of Mr. Gorsuch it was resolved, by a vote of thirteen to eight, that the treasurer be authorized to pay a sum not exceeding $30 per man for each blower or gatherer brought over from Europe after August 1, 1883, provided the same be employed by some member of this association, and provided they are not workmen who have been in this country within the twelve months last past."

The committee had before it and took the testimony of some of the leading and most intelligent men in the labor organizations of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Ohio. A summary of their testimony is appended hereto, as are also copies of contracts signed in Europe by the imported workmen. The importance of this subject, its bearing upon the social, political, and economic condition of our people, together with the magnitude of the interests involved, will, it is hoped, furnish an apology for the length of this report.

SUMMARY OF TESTIMONY TAKEN BY THE COMMITTEE.

Mr. T. V. Powderly, of Scranton, Pa., master workman of the Knights of Labor of the United States, representing 500,000 workingmen who are interested in several bills which are before Congress, testified as follows:

"I am interested in the eight-hour law, the land bill, and bill on imported labor under contract introduced by Mr. FORAN. These imported men show no disposition to become citizens of this country, but, on the contrary, seek to obtain a certain sum of money, which they consider a competence, and with it return to Italy or Hungary. I have seen eight of these people and one woman living in a small house, without beds or furniture, sleeping on the floor, and have been informed by reliable authority that these nine persons' expenses for one month was only $27. I have seen them in the Frostburg region of Maryland, where they had been brought by agents, who engaged them at Castle Garden, living in a wooden building, sleeping on bunks, this building being fenced in to prevent them being communicated with by the people whose places they had taken. The diet of these men was water and mush, with a small quantity of meat on Sunday. These men are brought into competition with skilled as well as unskilled labor, and it is fast becoming as bad as the competition of the Chinese in the West. A demand is now going up for an amendment of the Chinese bill in such particulars as it has been shown deficient."

William Leech, of Malaga, N. J., of the W. G. W. A., says:

"I was at Malaga last year when certain Belgians were brought to that place. It was our duty to find out from them if the situation of affairs at Malaga had been made known to them before they came, or whether it had not been misrepresented to them. When we attempted to obtain this information the company had thirty-five of us enjoined by the courts from interfering with them. The window-glass workers were ordered out of their homes in midwinter and compelled to move. Last spring we went to work, the Belgians in one factory and the citizens in another. They have since left Malaga, the firm having changed managers."

Emile Bouillet, of Zanesville, Ohio, W. G. W. A., said:

"I was hired at Antwerp by an agent of Dean F. Williams, of Zanesville, Ohio, who came for a set of men (sixty). When I went to see him I asked him why he came to Europe for men. He replied 'that men were scarce and work plenty in the United States.' I told him we would expect the same wages paid in the United States. He said 'they would pay the New York tariff.' When we arrived at Zanesville we discovered that the New York tariff was 25 per cent. less than the regular price. I complained to the company of this misrepresentation and they answered that 'they did not authorize the payment of more than what they were then paying.' At Kent the company did not pay the price agreed upon. They brought them to Kent on a contract for three years. The men were not permitted to associate with American workingmen lest they might find out the true state of affairs. Two of these men were arrested and put in jail for some days for violating this contract. When we arrived, a friend of one of us was met by a man whom he knew in Europe. As soon as they commenced to talk the manager ordered the arrest of the party. When we arrived at Mansfield, Ohio, a member of the firm came into the car and inquired if any of us could speak English; I answered that 'my father and I could.' He then warned us not to talk to the men."

Question by member of committee. What is the difference between the wages paid these foreigners and Americans?

Answer by John Schlicker. Between 28 and 50 per cent.

Question. Did any of these people show a disposition to become citizens?

Answer. I think not.

William F. Barclay, representing the miners of the coke region of Pennsylvania, said:

"We have a great many of these so-called Hungarians. They are not Hungarians, but Slavonians. They are not brought to our region on a written contract. There is an agency in Pittsburgh and in New York for the employment of these people, and to send them where they are called for. We are against the importation of these people because their influence is degrading. Firms employ these people in preference to Americans or other emigrants. They are easily imposed upon, not 5 per cent. of them being able to read. They perform this soft-coal mining very well, as it requires little skill. They have usually about one woman to every ten men. Their habits are disgusting in the extreme. I saw and counted one day thirty-five women and children employed in forking coke and working about the ovens; the children poorly clad, of every age ranging from 5 years upward. They do not work on Sunday. To illustrate how they live: A yard-boss who went to get men to work got thirty-seven men out of a house containing four small rooms. They had no beds, but laid on the floor, heads and tails, I suppose.

"I never knew one of these men to stay in the country. They spend comparatively nothing, saving their money to return home. Even when sick they go to the poor-house, until at last the authorities refused to longer entertain them while they had money. They will eat anything. They hang their meat out in the sun that it may become soft and tainted. The business men of the region are opposed to them. They get the same wages as the Americans, except when they work by the day; then they are paid 33 per cent. less, which is all they are worth. This importation has reduced the price of mining, and makes it impossible for the men to do other than submit to whatever the operators demand or require of them, regardless of its justness. The condition of the miners and coke-makers generally is aggravated by the company stores which abound in this district. I priced potatoes before I left, and could have bought them of an outside dealer for 50 cents per bushel, while the price in the company stores is 80 cents per bushel. If the men do not deal in the store they are discharged.

"I never met one of these Slavonians who could speak English. We tried to organize the men to enforce the statutes of Pennsylvania, but it was a failure. The companies discharged the men who were active in the matter. They were black-listed and refused work throughout the region. I was urged at another time to get up a strike by one of the operators, so that the price of coke might be raised.

"The Hungarians are paid 60 cents per ton, but they are so ignorant that they do not know what a ton is. The mines are wet, and these people work from 1 o'clock a. m. to 7 p. m. for a day. Americans and more skilled workmen could do the same amount of work in eight hours, but all have to wait on the wagons, the filling of which is delayed by these men, thereby putting the skilled and the unskilled on an equality. We dare not lay our grievance before the coke manufacturers, for whoever does so will be immediately discharged. We are opposed to strikes, as they are of no use, and could not succeed with us while these people are in this state of ignorance. Our citizens and merchants are leaving the region. The conditions are becoming insufferable. The works run from two to five days per week, and the wages paid about $1.25 per day, or generally eight tons at 13 cents per ton. The coke manufacturers are now trying to form a syndicate, that they may monopolize the coke business. There are some manufacturers who will not employ these foreigners, one of whom lives in the region."

Mr. Barclay also furnished the committee with the following written statement:

"We have the following evidence that the importation of laborers under contract does exist. The captain of the vessel on which Joseph Walsh, brother of Hon. John Walsh, ex-member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, came to the United States informed him that the large number of Slavonians on board the vessel were imported laborers shipped to America under contract; that the importers had made a special contract with the steamship company at a very low rate for their delivery in the United States, and that their accommodation would be in accordance with the rates, and that should he (Mr. Walsh) not receive the proper care he should complain to him (the captain). I have this from Mr. Walsh himself. We have much other evidence of their being imported by special agreement to work for certain firms. We have discovered an agency at work engaged in the business of importing laborers, agents in Europe gathering the men, an agent in New York receiving them and forwarding them to destinations. I have in my possession evidence that a firm having a branch in the city of Pittsburgh is engaged in this business. E. Dorner & Co. is the name of the firm who have received a certain amount per head for such imported laborers.

"Paul O. De Esterhazy, Austro-Hungarian consul in New York, has acknowledged the existence of such an agency, but says he is unable to do anything in the matter. The class imported by the coke manufacturers are the lowest beings that have ever been in the State of Pennsylvania, subsisting upon what an American laborer could not eat—such as mules, hogs, &c., which have been killed or died with cholera and other diseases. Not one has ever been known to become an American citizen, but all return to Hungary within a limited time (about four years) with what money they can save by living in this miserable condition of filth and squalor. Women and children work, too, drawing coke and forking coke into cars, commencing work about 1 or 2 o'clock a. m. and returning to their shanties as late as 7 p. m., working through all kinds of weather from two to five days per week. They seldom sleep in beds, but lie on the floor with a board or a stick of wood under their heads, as large a number probably as forty in one house intended for a miner with an average family, one female serving about ten men in all relations between male and female, housewife and laborer in the coke-yards. They are not known to purchase any of the luxuries which tend to elevate and enlighten the people, living in filth and wretchedness; but hoard up their small earnings, which they promptly forward to Hungary, thereby draining our district of the circulating medium. Being low in the scale of intelligence, they are the willing slaves of the coke manufacturers, willing to submit to almost any conditions.

"One of the tricks of the manufacturers is to import these people for the purpose of evading the laws enacted for the protection of the laboring classes.

"The 'Checkweighman law' is an example. The people being unable to read and write, they promise them 30 cents per wagon of one-half ton each, but when they arrive here they are compelled to sign an agreement, making only about 18 cents per ton for mining.

"I have known these beings during the time of the strike to have been dragged from their homes and driven down into the mines by the managers and coal and iron police. I have also known them to have been knocked down and kicked under cars for refusing to do more contract work. In all, they are mere tools by which the manufacturers gain almost any point they desire, to the degradation of our native workingmen and the detriment of our business men, making tramps of the former and bankrupts of the latter."

William Ashton, of Philadelphia, Pa., W. G. W. A., said:

"My information is in regard to importation of foreigners to Baltimore, Md. These men were brought under a contract; they were window-glass blowers. The first importation took place in 1879; forty-eight were then brought over by Swindell Bros. The following year Baker Bros. imported seventeen, King Bros. twenty-two, and Swindell Bros. twenty-three. The first importation occurred during a strike; there was no strike when the second importation occurred. Some of the foreigners refused to work and were arrested, but discharged before a hearing was had; their clothing was retained by the firm and it was weeks before they could secure it. They were kept locked in houses when not working, and could not be seen by the Americans. Most of them have since returned home, some being sent by the Glass-Blowers' Association and some by the Belgian consul, who complained bitterly of the treatment they received. The effect of their importation was the reduction of wages about 12 per cent. An injunction was issued against the American workmen from interfering with them and made perpetual by Judge Brown, of Baltimore. Before these men were imported we had as good a set of American workmen as could be found anywhere. The system in vogue in Europe and America differs materially. The Europeans work according to old methods and processes; in fact, they bring their tools and molds with them. The European workman can not turn out within 35 per cent. as much ware as the American workman, and as a result do not or are not able to fulfill their contract; hence the employers are at liberty to pay them what they please."

Val Haas, Baltimore, Md., W. G. W. A., said:

"The situation was misrepresented to them; some of them, when the exact situation was explained to them, quit. Two Germans who quit work were refused their clothes and were arrested. I have been called up at night by these men to explain to them the trouble, as we could not get near them or they near us, so that an understanding might be had. They were under constant police surveillance, and we were enjoined from interfering with them. These foreigners were natives of France, Belgium, and Germany; they were brought in three different parties. In 1879, Baker Bros. brought forty-eight, and King & Bros. twenty-five. Baker Bros. brought a second lot of twenty-five, and King & Bros. and Swindell & Bros., twenty-three. Previous to this last importation there was no strike; some of these men are here yet, others have gone away. The effect has been a 12 per cent. reduction of wages."

Charles Leffler, Baltimore, Md., W. G. W. A., said:

"My statement is substantially the same as Messrs. Ashton and Haas. Mr. Swindell says he does not want the foreigners any more; they accomplished the object intended, the reduction of wages."

J. Campbell, of Pittsburgh, Pa., said:

"We have no objection to these men coming here voluntarily, but we object to them coming under contract and to reduce American wages."

John Schlicker, of Pittsburgh, Pa., W. G. W. A., said:

"The labor of window-glass blowers is very hard; but few men are able to work at it after the age of 45 years; the average is but 35 years. In consequence of the exhaustiveness of the labor, we decided to not make more than forty-eight boxes of glass per week, which amount is more than 200 per cent. more than what was a week's work some years back. This limit of forty-eight boxes is a good week's work. To break this limit was the purpose of the importation. These foreigners could not make this amount, and consequently could not fulfill their contract, and were therefore subjected to its penalties for failure. One lot of men that were brought to Kent, Portage County, Ohio, were not employed, as the glass-house was not started, and these poor men and their families were left destitute in a foreign land and in a hostile community, a charge on the public."

Q. Did you examine Mr. FORAN's bill?

A. I did, and I favor its passage. I would not object to men being brought to start a new industry.

Mr. James Campbell here said that Mr. James Chambers, of Pittsburgh, had said that Mr. Day, of Kent, Ohio, could send to Belgium and get men at any time, he having an agency there.

John Costello, of Pittsburgh, Pa., president of the Miners' Association, said:

"To mine bituminous coal it required but little skill. In our district we adopted arbitration, which is legalized under the laws of Pennsylvania. Some of the operators are now trying to break the price agreed upon or decided by the board of arbitration. They sometimes go to Castle Garden and engage men to work in the mines that are idle because the operators will not give the price. Recently we paraded, with drums beating and the United States flag flying, on the road which passed near the mines that are refusing to pay the arbitration price, and sixteen of those who were in the procession were arrested for conspiracy. After the arrest and bail of the accused we paraded again, and twenty-two were arrested on a capias."

John Schlicker, of Pittsburgh (Pa.) W. G. W. A., said:

"The difference in working in the glass industry in this country and Europe consists in the fact that there they have two factories and work eleven months a year. I have worked in glass-works for thirty years and have not averaged eight months per year in that time. The difference in wages is not material, when all things are considered, between this country and Europe. At Kent, Ohio, these imported men are working on Sunday."

T. B. Barry, East Saginaw, Mich., ax-maker, said:

"I am an ax-maker of good reputation for skill and industry. The ax-makers struck in Cleveland. We were practically denied the right of free speech. We were not allowed to communicate with the 'rats' who were brought there. Two men, during the time of the strike, who stopped to light their pipes, were arrested and fined $10 each by Judge Solders. I wrote to different parties for work, but could not get any. I received a letter from R. Man & Son, Clinton County, Pennsylvania, in which they informed me that they would not employ any person who belonged to a labor union. I have been forced to take a rest.

"In the lumber region of Michigan there are 1,000 men working for their board. Agents go to Canada and bring men under false pretenses, telling them that they will receive $35 per month, and advertise for men in large numbers in the Canada papers, to be paid the ruling rates, about $35 per month. When the lumber camps are filled they offer them $16 per month.

"At Muskingum an attempt was made to reduce the boom-men by importing men from Canada. This luring men under false pretenses should be remedied. The hours of workmen who work at salt manufacturing are from 4 o'clock a. m. to 7 p. m. The wages are $1.50 per day of seventeen hours. These people, to get an existence, cultivate in the evenings, with the aid of lamps, small patches of ground. The men who come from Canada do not intend to remain here, but return to Canada."

John Muray, of Shawnee (Ohio) Miners' Association, said:

"Our men are deeply interested in the bill against the importation of labor, and we expect Congress to do something to remedy the evil. There were seven hundred foreigners and seven hundred colored men brought to my district during a recent strike there."

Fred. Turner, of Philadelphia, Pa., secretary of Knights of Labor, said:

"It is the universal sentiment that the bill of Mr. FORAN should be passed. The importation of foreign workmen is getting as bad as that of the Chinese. We have not the slightest objection to their voluntary coming. The African slave was better off than are these people under some of these contracts. The slave had some one to look after his welfare; these people have not. We present a petition to the committee containing 35,000 names of persons who pray for relief by the passage of a bill to remedy this matter."

Frank Porter, of Cambridge, Mass., cotton mill, said:

"I voice the sentiment of New England and ask that Mr. FORAN's bill be passed. The manufacturers of New England have imported men, time after time, during strikes, from England, Ireland, Scotland, and Canada, whether under contract or not we are not able to prove, but we believe they were imported under contract. The Canadians, as a rule, do not become citizens, but return to Canada."

John S. McClelland, Hoboken, N. J., telegraph operator, said:

"I was one of the men who participated in the late strike of telegraph operators. The telegraph companies would have imported foreign telegraphers if they could have gotten them. They could not get them from England as there they are in Government service, and if they once leave, when they return they are forced to begin at the bottom."

F. C. Morgan, of Washington, D. C., said:

"I saw an agent, when I was in Brazil, in 1879, trying to engage the natives of Brazil to come to the cotton-fields of the United States. I do not know that he engaged any who went."

John Costello again said that these imported workmen signed contracts, waiving the benefits of the statutes of Pennsylvania, which were passed for the protection of workmen, and thereby in their ignorance injuring the workingmen and nullifying the salutary laws of Pennsylvania, which were enacted to protect the workmen from the avarice of greedy manufacturers.

Mr. A. C. Robertson, of Pittsburgh, Pa., said:

The number of foreign glass-bottle blowers brought to the Western States under contract is about 80 in all, distributed in five factories, namely: La Salle, Ill., 36; Covington, Ky., 13; Louisville, Ky., 14; the balance in Streator, Ill., and New Albany, Ind. They receive about 40 per cent. less wages than American blowers, or, in other words, they get 8 cents per dozen for quart beers, while the American gets 13 cents per dozen. The effect of this competition will be to bring the native workmen down to the level of pauper labor. The hollow-glass workmen west of the Alleghany Mountains have not worked since last June. They have been during all this time enjoying the luxury of a lockout. Last year's revision of the tariff virtually increased the duty on green glassware nearly 100 per cent., but notwithstanding this increase the manufacturers are endeavoring to force a reduction of 20 per cent. in wages. Previous to the revision there was an importation of about 200,000 gross of bottles. Since the new tariff went into effect there has been scarcely any importation of this ware. Two American blowers will turn out 80 dozen bottles per day, while two of the foreign blowers turn out but 50 dozen per day. The manufacturers seem to favor free trade in labor and a high protective tariff upon their manufactured goods or wares.

I now call attention to the following extracts from the Pittsburgh Dispatch:

MOUNT PLEASANT, March 30, 1883.

The Hungarians that for past months have shocked the citizens of this section of the State by their uncivilized actions are still emigrating to the coke regions. For a time it looked as if they were going to leave for their native land and the State would be rid of them, but the arrival of a number of them the past few days has dispelled such ideas. Yesterday several families arrived here, fresh from their native land, and immediately sought employment with their countrymen. The first Hungarians that began work in the mines and coke-yards were employed about three years ago near Broad Ford, and took the place of men who had originated a strike.

HOW THEY HAVE GROWN.

When new coke-yards were started here they were brought to this place and put to work, and were also employed by old establishments. Since they first began work hundreds of them have come from their foreign home. They have sought and obtained employment in the coke regions, and after laboring perhaps a year, have returned to Hungary, and others have taken the places of those originally employed. Many of them are owners of small farms in their native land, for which they are in debt. To secure money to raise this indebtedness they have come to America and after hoarding several hundred dollars have returned. Others have come merely to seek fortunes, and after laboring for a time in our community have removed to some other point and again begun laboring.

In the mines and coke-yards they have readily found employment, because by the combined labor of themselves, their wives, and their children they have been able to take the places made vacant by strikers. At first they are scarcely able to perform the required work, but naturally quick at learning they soon perform what is required, though not with the alacrity of those whose places they are filling. Some of the men are employed in the mines, others in the coke-yards.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN

also handle the coke, doing the same work that is required of husbands and fathers. The fact that the women and children work has created indignation. This indignation has been increased when the home life of the Hungarian is revealed and when it becomes known that the foreigners are living in a manner that almost places them on a level with the brute creation.

Several hundred of the Hungarians are employed now in the mines and coke-yards about this place. There are about two hundred at Moorewood, just a mile from here. A more complete picture of degradation could scarcely be portrayed than that presented by a visit to Moorewood this morning. All night long a drizzling rain had fallen, and this was continued until near noon, when the rain turned into snow. Those employed in the coke-yards begin their labor at 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, and some continue work until the same hour in the afternoon. These that were seen to-day had been working six or eight hours in the cold, drizzling rain. They labor through all kinds of weather whenever the works are running. There are persons here who had said that Hungarian women were performing the labor of men at the coke-yards, but it was not thought probable when the cold and rainy morning appeared that they would be engaged to-day. Yet they were. Thirty-two women and girls, Hungarians and Prussians, handled coke-forks, some of them crowded into box-cars where the escaping fumes made breathing almost impossible, and in a temperature which seemed at least 110°. A few women stood at the oven-doors with heavy iron scrapers more than ten feet in length, drawing the new-made coke, which emitted a strong, almost

OVERPOWERING GAS.

Others pitched coke into cars with forks that held enough coke to fill a coal scuttle, and still others, standing in pools of water before the oven-doors, were cooling off the contents of the oven. The women in some instances had a ghastly look. Over their heads they had tied shawls, and for dresses they were wearing flannel skirts and waists. Occasionally one might be seen better protected from the inclement weather by a man's coat or a woman's cloak, worn threadbare. For coverings for the feet they wore boots and heavy shoes. One woman had little protection from the water, as the tops of her shoes were torn from their soles. A girl, seemingly about 17 years of age, who with an elderly woman was pitching coke into a car, had on mere slippers. All were drenched to the skin, and their wet waists seemed to stick to their shoulders. One little girl about 10 years old was a most pitiable object. She had been running about the yards through the morning and, becoming drenched, stood before an oven-door trying to get warm and dry her garments. She looked the very picture of misery. There were eight girls about the yards apparently not more than 16 years of age, some of them about 12, yet they handled the great iron forks filled with coke.

WITH THE EASE OF MEN.

Several of these children were housed in the hot cars, and with hand-leathers piled the coke fresh from the ovens.

In two long frame structures, partitioned into houses of two rooms each, the Hungarians reside. There are about two hundred employed about the works, and nearly all live here in, possibly, forty rooms, about 12 by 14 feet in size. Hanging upon the outside of the houses and from windows were hams, pieces of bacon, and baskets containing fresh meat, left there that the meat might become tainted. This is done in all seasons of the year, summer or winter, and in rain, snow, or sunshine. Citizens here say that the Hungarians purchase the very cheapest of meats. They have been known to carry to their homes hogs that have been killed by the cars. One gentleman said to-day that not long since a box of sausage was received at a retail grocery in town. When it was opened the contents were found to be covered with slime and unfit for use. A Hungarian who chanced to be present was given a piece of the spoiled sausage. He left the store, and presently a number of his countrymen entered the grocery to get some of the same.

There seems to be little feeling shown by the Hungarians toward their dead, and instances are related of their heartless actions. Not long since, it is said of one family, a daughter died during the night. The next day the remainder of the family worked as usual and at night-time buried the girl. A child also died. Its father dug a hole near the house, and unprotected, save by its clothes, placed the little one within. A girl but about 12 years old was left to cover up the remains. When it had afterward been learned that the parent had so acted clerks in the works procured a coffin for the child and made the father take up the dead body and bury it properly. The indications are that the grave-yard will fill up much more rapidly in the future, and that the number of new but small mounds will be increased. Women, it is stated, take their babies to the coke-yards and while they work hour after hour at pitching or drawing coke the little ones are laid on the ground or in a car near by. During the entire winter children have been running barefooted, even on the coldest days. To-day while the rain and snow were falling they have been about the yard around their home without stockings or shoes. Women, too, were seen in the same condition. They have been seen working in the coke-yards with nothing but a skirt about their body and a shawl tied over their heads.

I have here also extracts which I have caused to be taken from the report of the evidence before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, of which Senator BLAIR, of New Hampshire, is chairman. This committee was in session for six or eight months, and visited many parts of the country taking evidence as to the condition of workingmen. The evidence taken by that committee is now being printed at the Government Printing Office. This evidence contains a vast amount of valuable information in reference to our industrial interests and condition, and will be appreciated hereafter much more than it is at this time. I have here extracts from that document which more than confirm all that I have stated with regard to Pennsylvania and Illinois. These extracts will prove to gentlemen on the other side that their boasted system of protection is one to protect manufacturers only; that the pauper laborers of Europe are being brought to our very doors to take the places of the striking workingmen of our own country; that manufacturers have black-lists, upon which they record the names of the strikers, by reason of which they are driven from place to place as outcasts, and that the condition of wage-earners in this country has deteriorated rather than improved during our high-protective era.

The attention of gentlemen is earnestly requested to the evidence taken before that committee.

EVIDENCE TAKEN BY THE BLAIR COMMITTEE.

Frank K. Foster, printer, a prominent member and representative of several workingmen's organizations, after describing very graphically and in detail the condition of the laboring classes generally in New England, says:

The great and distinctive feature of our New England industries is, of course, the manufacture of cotton, woolen, and textile fabrics in the different sections of that country. It is there that we see presented more forcibly than anywhere else the condition of affairs that we seek relief from. It is there that we see more clearly than elsewhere the dangers that threaten society at large in the time to come; that we see more clearly the conditions which will produce an enfeebled and inferior race—as the mills of England have produced an inferior race among the operatives there in some localities. The condition of life among the operatives in the textile industries is on a much lower plane as regards the satisfying of man's natural requirements and the pursuit of happiness than in the skilled trades. This is necessarily so, perhaps. When I speak of "operatives" I wish to be understood as speaking of those employed in any of the branches of textile manufactures. They have to encounter difficulties, restrictions, and privations that, perhaps, can only be equaled in this country by those of some of the laborers in the mining regions, and the hardships of their condition are not probably made less striking by a comparison with the old slave labor of the South.

I am sorry to disagree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] as to the condition of the mill operatives. I may state here, in order to give force to what I say, that, being deeply interested in the subject, I took the opportunity (as my trade did not give it me) of pursuing an occupation that threw me in contact with those people for the space of over a year, that I lived in their midst in various places and observed their manner of existence, their amusements as they were called, and the social conditions that had been produced by the system of corporation manufacturing, and I am sorry to say that there is room for all the talent and energy that can be employed in bettering their condition, and for all the assistance that legislation can possibly give them. The condition of Massachusetts is, I think, better than that of most of the other New England States, especially those engaged in manufacturing to any great extent.

The operatives of Massachusetts, however, work longer hours than the English operatives, and they receive even nominally but a trifle more wages. I have some comparative tables that may be of interest to the committee, but I presume they have already been presented to Congress; the tables taken from the consular report of Albert D. Shaw, United States consul at Manchester, England, giving the average earnings of operatives in English factories, and they are accompanied by tables giving the prices paid in the mills of Massachusetts:

Q. You may proceed, then, with your statement as to the social, financial, and economical condition of the operatives in the cotton-mills in New England.

A. One of the most important peculiarities in the textile industries is the large employment of female and child labor. I will quote a paragraph from the report of Mr. Wright, chief of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics, for 1881 (page 466), as his words may be taken with greater confidence than those of any individual who has not had equal means of information. He says:

"In our cotton-mills especially the women and children largely exceed the men, being often from two-thirds to five-sixths of the whole, and the proportion of them is steadily increasing. And what are these women and children but the very weakest and most dependent of all the people? They have no disposition to agitate. They have no power to change any existing condition of society if they would, and their mind does not work in that range, if they could. All that is possible to them is to toil and scrimp and bear. Now, for men, the strong, those who bear rule, the sovereigns of the land, the hours of labor are but ten all over the country, in about every employment where they preponderate. But where the women and children preponderate, the hours of labor, as a rule, are eleven or more. And the question is, why is it, in this land, which aims for equality and justice, that the weakest, the most helpless and dependent, are loaded with the burden of the more hours, while the strong, the able to bear, and the controlling, only have the less hours to work? And this question, which an operative whispered in our ear in a private room, we have taken the liberty to utter aloud."

And I think the same question comes home with a great deal of force to any one who makes himself familiar with the condition of the operatives in the textile industries in New England and in other parts of the country. To any one who will stand at the gates of any of our large manufacturing establishments in that line and notice the people who come forth at noon or at night or who go in in the morning, as the case may be, the very large percentage of children is startling—something that no one can see without asking himself: Where must this end? The number of women and girls who follow up this routine of daily labor which exhausts their vitality and destroys their womanhood almost, from the very conditions of the labor and the sanitary, or rather the unsanitary, conditions under which it is performed, and the relations between many of the girls and those who have power over them, the employers or the directors of the mills, being considered, it must come home to the observer with increasing force all the time that so long as that condition of things exists and the hours of labor remain as they are and this general state of affairs continues there is a growing element of danger in our social condition. That this state of affairs does exist in New England can be proven by observation and by reference to the reports of the bureau of labor statistics. In the report for 1882, page 220, Mr. Wright says:

"In many quarters visited by the agents in Fall River they found much misery, rarely meeting with happy, contented people. In Lowell and Lawrence it appears that even the poorer class of help secure many of the comforts of life. The reason for this evidently lies in the fact that in Lowell and Lawrence there is more of the individual in labor and less of the family. In Fall River entire families work in the mill, and an obligation in the lease of the mill tenements requires the lessee to furnish a certain number of people to the corporation as employés."

* * * * * * *

It is a great cause of complaint among the cotton operatives, and especially among those employed by the large corporations, that they are frequently "black-listed" on account of membership in trade societies.

Q. What is it to be black-listed?

A. It is to be placed on a list of names which is preserved by the manufacturers' association or board of trade as a person that it will not be safe to hire owing to some participation in a strike or to membership in some trade organization. These causes render it necessary according to the manufacturers' association to put a person under the ban.

Q. What do you mean by being under the ban?

A. I mean that it would be impossible for a man black-listed to obtain employment in any of the corporations represented in this board of trade or association.

Q. What about that association of employers—what are its character and objects?

A. If you will permit me I will read a paragraph from Mr. Wright's report upon that point:

"Other manufacturers granted that the black-list was in existence, and stated that its use was necessary to guard against strikes, one saying, 'If we wanted to black-list a man we would undoubtedly do so.' Another stated that there was such a thing as a 'black-list.' Another said, 'This [black-listing] is done by a committee of the Manufacturers' Board of Trade. A man's name is sent to this committee, and they examine the list and take action on it. The black-list is directed mostly toward the members of the Mule-Spinners' Union, for they cause us the most trouble. For our own protection we started a secret service, and it has accomplished much good, as it gave us the names and occupations of the most prominent in agitating strikes. There have been twenty-six mule-spinners black-listed since last fall.'"

That is the testimony of the manufacturers. The testimony of the operatives is this:

"Nearly all of the Fall River operatives visited by the agent seemed to fear the possibility of the manufacturers discovering that they had given any information. One of them, and his statement will cover those made by several others, said:

"'You will find that very few of the operatives will say anything unless you can assure them that their names will never be known. If it was known that I was giving you any information I would be discharged at once, so you see that I am reposing considerable faith in you. My bread is at stake and were I asked if I had given you any information I should deny it from the beginning.'

"Under these circumstances it was necessary to proceed with caution, but in the majority of cases the mere promise that no names would be mentioned was sufficient to gain the desired information.

"All agreed that the 'black-list' was an abominable institution, one that embodied all that was pernicious in the system of spying. The universal statement was that the spinners, as a body, were the most eagerly punished by black-listing, it being asserted that thirty members of the Spinners' Union were on the black-list, and could not obtain work in any mill in the city. One operative stated that there were several causes that led to dissatisfaction and striking in Fall River, one of the most pronounced being the black-list."

Robert Howard, of Fall River, Mass., an ex-member of the Massachusetts Legislature, a spinner by trade, a native of England, who has had long experience in both English and American factories, and who is secretary of the Mule-Spinners' Association, gave the following interesting testimony with regard to the comparative condition of English and American factory operatives:

THE ENGLISH MULE-SPINNERS BETTER OFF THAN THE AMERICAN.

Q. Before proceeding to a detailed statement of the condition of the working people as you have observed it in this country, please give us a somewhat particular account of the condition of the working classes in Great Britain, and in Ireland also, if you are acquainted with it?

A. I worked in England for upward of seventeen years as a mule-spinner and a piecer for the mule-spinner—that is simply an assistant—and my opinion of the condition of the workmen in that branch of industry relatively in the United States and in England is that the English spinner is in a far better condition.

I will not speak for the weavers, but only for the mule-spinners; they are better off in England because the manufacturers there don't appear to be so desirous of working the men so much like horses or slaves as they do in our State—they don't work at the same extraordinary rate of speed that we do in Fall River. There they give a man a pair of mules—that is, cotton-spinning frames—and they give a man an assistant to work between the mules with him, and also an assistant to work on the back of the mules; but in this country it is a very peculiar fact (but I know it is so with the exception of one or two places) that however large the mules may be, no matter how many spindles they may contain, the employers will not come down to the same policy adopted in England. They insist on one man running the mule with only one little assistant to go behind it. There is one exception to that, I think, in the Amoskeag Mills in Manchester, N. H. As the secretary of the Mule-Spinners' Association, I know what the practice is in all the mills. In that mill they run very large mules, and they do allow a piecer, but the spinner gets very little wages. In our city, Fall River, if they were to run the same as the spinners in the Amoskeag, I suppose they would get from $4 to $5 a week more, but it would be very hard work for them.

CAN AMERICAN COTTON MANUFACTURERS COMPETE WITH ENGLISH?

Again, the year before, in a letter that he sent to the Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, he says that he does not see why we should not be able to compete with the English manufacturers, and indeed Mr. Blaine himself says that he can not see why either. Mr. Shaw mentions several kinds of cloth of which the cost of production in England is in the ratio of 2.55 there, against 2.50 here, so that it really costs more in England.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN WAGES.

Mr. Shaw gives also the wages of the weavers and spinners in England, and the reason that I did not want to go into that matter in detail now was that I have not those figures with me, but I think the wages given by Mr. Shaw for the weavers commence at $3.84 and range all the way up to $8.64, and the wages earned in America by the weavers commence at $4.62 and run up to $8.73, so that there is hardly any perceptible difference between the wages in England and the wages here. I think the wages paid to spinners in America he puts at from $7.20 up to $10.63, and the wages paid to spinners in England, if I recollect right, start at a little higher than the lowest wages here and run up to a few cents lower than the highest here; but there is hardly any difference in the figures. And, moreover, we are not paid so much in proportion to our production here as they are paid in England; for the reason that if we get as much wages here, we have to give more work for it.

AMERICAN OPERATIVES WORK HARDER THAN ENGLISH.

You will see a good smart girl running eight print-cloth looms in our mills here. She ought not to be allowed to do it, but she does it; and there is not a weaver in England that is allowed to run over four, and the English weaver has an assistant in running even four. So that the weavers do not get paid as much per loom for their production here as they get in England.

AMERICAN MILLS "RUN" AT LESS COST THAN ENGLISH.

I also noticed in Mr. Shaw's report this year some figures showing the cost of running mills in Massachusetts and at Ashton-under-Lyne, and also at Blackburn, in England, and he shows that some of the mills here are run on less cost than those English mills, particularly the Rhode Island mills, which are run by water and which, with the exception of Conant's mill, pay very low wages. The wages generally is about $7 or $7.50 a week, but in Conant's mill it is exceptional; there they pay as high as $12 a week. These facts were the basis for Mr. Blaine's inference from Mr. Shaw's report.

I will make further extracts from Mr. Shaw's report before I conclude this subject, showing that the cost for labor in manufacturing a pound of cotton goods is greater in England than in the United States.

Mr. Howard continues:

INTIMIDATION OF WORKINGMEN.

Now there is one remarkable thing in Massachusetts, and that is that if ever a bill is brought before our Legislature for the redress of some grievance which may exist, or if the workingmen come to the Legislature asking for some law which may be beneficial to their interests as workingmen, such as a law providing that they shall be paid weekly, or a law providing for boards of arbitration, or a law to make the ten-hour rule more stringent—if ever there is a bill of any of these kinds brought before our Legislature you will always see the corporation detectives there, particularly from Lowell and from Lawrence. Lowell wishes itself to be looked upon as the workingman's Paradise of Massachusetts, but it is the worst place in Massachusetts, and pays the lowest prices to its workingmen. The Lowell manufacturers always have a ring of men down at the State-house, and they always wish to make it appear that their city is a Paradise and an Eden. It was that Merrimac corporation that got us reduced 10 per cent. in 1880.

When the Board of Trade met the others said to us, "You make that Merrimac Company pay the same as we are paying; they can undersell us as things are." There are men there running 1,500 spindles for about $9.50 a week, while in the other New England mills they can get $12 a week. They have a man named Moses Sargent, who is there at the State-house every week, and when I was on the legislative committee I used to see him watching every man that came in; so that a Lowell man that had to earn his bread in the mills dare not put his head into the committee-room. The same is true in Lawrence. They had a detective named Filbrook always watching to see if any Lawrence men came before the committee to give testimony. Then, after the meetings were over, they would say, "There are those Fall River fellows; they are a turbulent set." It is not that we in Fall River are turbulent; it is because we had manhood enough and nerve enough to go and ask and demand what was our right that they say that about us. There are no Fall River detectives at the State-house.

I went to a meeting of the mule-spinners at Lawrence some six or seven weeks ago. I wanted to get all the mule-spinners out from the Pacific Mills where the wages was reduced about a year ago, and I called a meeting by circular and had the circular distributed through the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Pemberton Mills. When the time came that was appointed for the meeting, there across the road stood Filbrook, the corporation detective, and Russell, the overseer, watching every man that came in. There was one man at that meeting who was looking out of the window at them, and he said, "I never belonged to a union in my life, Howard, but nothing does so much as the presence of those men there to convince me that there must be some good for the workingmen in unions, for unless there was those men would not stand there spying us as we come in." That is the condition of affairs. Those manufacturers have their detectives employed permanently. I will not vouch for the statement I am going to make, but I have been told that Filbrook gets a salary of $6,000 a year from the Pacific Mills alone. However, I do not vouch for that as true.

Here is what this representative New England factory operative has to say about the tariff:

Q. If in the American market there is a certain amount of a certain kind of goods, and in the foreign market there is a certain surplus amount of the same kind of goods which is kept out from our market by a tariff, and if you remove that tariff and let that European surplus in, and you are a producer of the same kind of articles here, will you get more wages or less wages as a result of removing that tariff?

A. I do not think we would get any less in our city in our branch of industry. At first we might suffer on account of our corporations being built up under the tariff law; but if no tariff restrictions had been in existence when our corporations were built up I believe we would not suffer now by goods coming in from abroad. I think that what it took $600,000 to build under the tariff law could be built for $400,000 without it. Consequently the sales of a given amount of goods would yield a greater dividend and would enable our manufacturers to pay us good wages and compete with England. But the mills are there; the money is invested in them and the owners want a return on it. We only want to do what is fair between capital and labor. Some of the new mills I think would not be able to stand; but some of the old ones would be able to stand against the competition of foreign goods.

Q. You think they have arrived at that point now?

A. I do, as to our branch of industry. I could not speak for all branches.

* * * * * * *

Q. Now, I understand you to say that these mills have come into existence and that the industries carried on in them have developed so far that they can produce and sell in competition with the foreign producers, in your opinion?

A. I think they could. I think that if our American manufacturers would adopt the same system that the English merchants have adopted of having agencies in foreign countries we would be able to wrest some of the trade of several of those countries from the English manufacturers, because our cloth, it is generally admitted, is looked upon as entirely superior to the English now.

Q. Aside from the English market, are there not other markets of great importance opening to us abroad?

A. Yes, sir; and if we once get a strong footing in the China and Indian markets, you would see our manufactories rapidly extend. I think the banking system, too, is better here than it is in England, but a very important element is the agencies that the English houses here established abroad and which have placed them in possession of those foreign markets, and it would not be very easy to wrest those markets from them. Our manufacturers will have to be more speculative, more enterprising than they are now in order to compete with the English.

By Mr. PUGH:

Q. What about its being a fact publicly known to the whole country that protection through the imposition of tariff laws is claimed, by members of Congress who represent that policy, for the benefit of the American laborer? Is not the tariff adjusted, or said to be adjusted, so as to afford protection for the benefit of the American laborer by enabling the manufacturer to pay him the highest wages for his work? Is not that the general ground on which it is claimed that there should be protection?

A. That is the ground upon which it is claimed; but that is not the prevalent opinion among the working people.

Q. Then, while this protective law is claimed to be and is passed in order that it may be a benefit to the operatives in our manufactories, I want to know how much benefit they do actually get from the increased prices which the protective tariff gives to the product. What share do the operatives receive when the product is sold and the proceeds are divided between them and capital?

A. The benefit? Looking at the wages here compared with the wages in England I can not see any benefit.

Q. That is, the manufacturer takes the whole of the benefit Is that it?

A. Yes. They will go over to Canada and bring over hordes of French people here to work in our mills at 50 or 75 cents a day.

Q. I understand you to say that the present condition of the manufacturing industries in New England is such, in your opinion, that they can get along without the protective tariff.

A. In the future I think they might. I would not fear to try it.

Q. Well, I do not want to argue with you whether protection is right or wrong. I simply want to get your opinion and the facts.

A. I hold, as I have held for a long time, that if they put a restriction on the importation of cheap goods, they have just as much right to put a restriction on the importation of cheap labor—Swedes and Frenchmen and Belgians who come in here to work cheap and come here to compete with our workingmen. If they think the tariff is going to benefit us any, and if they wish it to benefit us, let them do that, and then the people might be generally more willing to concede the benefit of the tariff to the manufacturing corporations.

And here is his description of the condition of the operatives:

Q. In regard to the actual physical condition of the operatives in Fall River and elsewhere, can you give us any information?

A. The condition of the operative in our city is a very unenviable one. The work there is very hard and the wages are very low—low in proportion to what they used to be some ten years ago, before the financial depression set in. Our females in particular are overworked; their strength is entirely overtaxed by the labors they have to perform. I have often argued myself that if our manufacturers would give over preaching so much about temperance and other things and try to bring about a reform in the condition of their operatives, it would be better than all the many thousand temperance lectures and temperance tales.

THE DWELLINGS OF FACTORY OPERATIVES.

Q. In regard to the actual tenements in which the operatives live, and their sanitary condition generally, what have you to say?

A. Well, I think that in Fall River we are behind the other cities of Massachusetts in regard to our dwellings.

Q. I do not ask you about Fall River alone, but about that and the other manufacturing cities such of them as you have observed.

A. Well, I think myself that there should be something done by the city government in regard to those houses. I think there ought to be something done to prevent the building of these huge blocks of tenements with only one room for a man to sit in and cook in and live in. They will have two bed-rooms and a kitchen, and in that kitchen they must cook and sit; and if a friend comes in they have got to meet him there. When I have gone into those places in the night where there was a hot stove and they were cooking, I have felt fit to run anywhere out of them. There is no comfort at all. If a man had a little room where he could go and read his paper and be comfortable, I think he would be more likely to stay at home instead of going abroad to seek other kinds of enjoyment.

John Jarrett, president of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers of the United States, testified as follows upon the points indicated below:

IMPORTATION OF CHEAP LABOR.

A. There is one trouble that we have had in this connection: the manufacturers have adopted a system of importing men to take the place of our men when they are on strike. The class of common labor that largely predominates in the mills (you must remember that I have been speaking of the steel works), with the exception of the Edgar Thomson mills, are foreigners—Hungarians, Poles, Italians, Bohemians, men that really don't know the difference.

Q. What difference?

A. The difference between light work and heavy work, or between good wages and bad wages. They simply look at the amount they may get. If you show them that they get twice as much as they got at home in their own country, they think that it is a good thing, and they never know the difference when they are working twice as hard as they did there.

Q. And paying twice as much for what they have to buy?

A. Yes, sir. In investigating these matters I have been disgusted to find that those people can live where I think decent men would die; they can live on almost any kind of food, food that other men would not touch, and in houses that other men could not live in at all.

Q. That is about equivalent to Chinese cheap labor, is it not?

A. Almost as bad, in my estimation.

Q. Do you think those men know as much as the Chinamen?

A. I could not tell that. I never had any conversation or connection with Chinamen. All I know about these men is that I have been astonished and astounded at the little they do know, and when you go to talk with them they are fairly afraid to speak with you.

Q. Why?

A. I can not tell, unless it is that they are demoralized and afraid of each other. I will give you the reason that a gentleman in Bethlehem gave me. I got hold of one of these Bohemians aside one day with a gentleman who understood the language, and I had a little talk with him about this condition of things. He wanted to tell me that he did better in Hungary than he did in this country. I asked him then, through the interpreter, why he came here. He said it was because he was misled. I wanted to know how he was misled. He became confused.

CONDITION OF THE PENNSYLVANIA COAL-MINERS.

Q. Do you know anything about the condition of the workingmen in other trades than your own?

A. I have not given that subject one-tenth of the attention that I have given to the condition of the workers in my own trade.

Q. Do you know anything about the condition of the men who mine the iron?

A. I do, sir. Did you say the coal-miners?

Q. The men who mine the iron and coal.

A. Well, coal-mining in Pennsylvania, in my opinion, is a more important interest than ore-mining, and the condition of the coal-miners in the State of Pennsylvania is pitiable, miserable.

Q. How many of them do you think there are?

A. There must be at least 90,000 coal-miners in Pennsylvania.

Q. Do you mean heads of families or workers, all together?

A. I would assume that there would be among them about 60,000 heads of families.

Q. You say their condition is pitiable and miserable. How so, and how much so is it?

A. It is because the wages of coal-miners are too low. They are ill-paid. Then, too, they suffer from the truck system. Under that system they pay 100 per cent. more for what they buy than our people do. Then the houses they live in are extremely miserable. If I feel particularly for any branch of labor in this country it is the poor coal-miner. He risks his life day after day for a mere pittance. Every time he departs from the light of day he does not know whether he will ever see it again. And while in some branches it does not require much skill to be a miner, in others it does, and I think the coal-miner ought to better paid, better clothed, better housed, and better fed than he is.

THE ENGLISH MINERS BETTER OFF.

Q. Have you been among those miners?

A. Yes, sir; and from my experience among the coal-miners in England I may say that they are really better cared for there than are the coal-miners in the United States. I do not say that the English miner gets as mueh money for his labor, but he is better cared for.

Q. Do you mean that he has more comfort during the year?

A. Yes, sir. The Government there has taken care to make very stringent laws for the protection of the miners. The colliery laws control all the mines there, and I think it is the duty of our Government here to make equally strict laws to apply to that subject.

IMPORTATION OF LABOR UNDER CONTRACT.

P. J. McGuire, of New York, secretary of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, testifies as follows with regard to the importation of foreign labor:

The fourth measure I wish to present for your consideration is legislation by Congress to prevent the importation of foreign labor under contract. Within the last few years it has come to pass that a large body of the cheaper class of foreign laborers, people unused to our habits of living in this country, are brought over here under contracts made in their own countries through the influence of United States consuls, with the avowed object of aiding the iron and coal corporations to reduce the wages of their employés. * * * This importation of labor to this country was noticeable in connection with the strike in the coke region around Steubenville, Ohio.

* * * * * * *

I wish to give my experience in regard to the freight-handlers' strike last year in one respect only. During that strike the railroads made use of Castle Garden very efficiently.

Q. That is the immigrant depot here?

A. Yes, sir. They brought over hordes of Italians—Calabrians from the mountains of Calabria—in the holds of vessels and transported them from Castle Garden across to the railroad docks in Jersey City and along our piers here, and put them to work. Those men, Italians and others, slept in the holds of the vessels and were fed there, and were not allowed any liberty at all; they were in fact prisoners. They were under very close guard, and they were compelled to render their services by virtue of contracts that had been made with them before they left their own country—contracts made by padrones, shipping agents, and others, who bring these people here under false inducements, paying their passage money over and then making them work it out here with a big percentage added to it.

CONDITION OF WORKINGMEN IN EUROPE.

Q. If it does not interrupt your current of thought, won't you state the result of your observations as to the actual condition of wage-laborers generally in the European countries you have mentioned in comparison with the condition of corresponding classes here?

A. Well, that question covers a great deal of ground, and there is so much to be taken into consideration in answering it, the relative purchasing power of wages here and there, the social aptitudes of the people, and so many other elements, that it is a very extensive subject.

Q. Is it one on which you have an opinion?

A. I have a very decided opinion.

Q. Without going into details, please state that opinion.

A. In some trades the condition of the workingmen in England is equally as good as their condition here. In the cotton trade, in the woolen trade, in the hosiery trades, in the building trades, hours of labor are lower in England, or throughout Great Britain, than they are here. They work but 50 hours a week throughout Great Britain on an average in the building trades, while the average is 58 hours a week in New York city and 60 hours throughout the country. They have more leisure in Great Britain, and the result is that the education of the working classes there has vastly improved during the past twenty years. That has come through the reduction of the hours of labor.

Q. Then you think that if the truth about this country were represented abroad rather than these falsehoods, the competition of American with foreign labor would be only such as we could get on with without difficulty?

A. Yes, sir; I believe that for every immigrant who would come here voluntarily and freely there would be room; but when these highly colored pictures are presented to the people in Europe through the press and by means of placards on the walls along the streets, those people imagine that this is a land flowing with milk and honey, and very many of them sell out their little property, leave their little homesteads that they have had handed down, some of them, from their fathers, and come here, and when they arrive they find that they have been deceived and that they have no homesteads to get.

The same witness, speaking for the Central Labor Union of New York, a body composed of delegates from nearly all the local trades-unions, thus defines the position of the workingmen on the tariff:

THE UNION NEUTRAL ON THE TARIFF QUESTION.

Several times the question of the tariff has been brought into the body, and the Central Labor Union has taken the position that the tariff question is a fight between the importers and the exporters, a fight between the manufacturers and the merchants, and that no matter which way it is settled, the wage-worker still remains under the same conditions, having to compete for work with those who are out of employment, and also with women and children; and that while certain evils exist, such as foreign labor imported under contract, such as the labor of women and children under the stress of poverty, and such as the present prison contract system—that as long as such evils exist, and others that might be named, the settlement of the tariff question one way or the other will not benefit the workingmen. They will still have to fight for every dollar more pay that they get; they will still have to strike for every reduction of the hours of labor that they desire.

Q. Then I understand you to say that the workingmen of your organization are neutral on the tariff question.

A. They are neutral on the tariff question. They relegate it entirely to the individual opinions of the members.

Edward King, a representative of the Central Labor Union of New York, testifies that the workingmen have been in favor of protection in the past, but are now turning against it because it has not been just. He says:

I think there is a tendency in the other direction now, purely owing to the fact that the protection that we have had has not been just. That I believe to be the real point at issue.

By Mr. GEORGE:

Q. You say the protection we have had has not been just. In what has it been unjust?

A. It has been unjust in not protecting the workingmen from the intrusion of foreign labor, especially when he has been engaged in his struggles with capital. I might refer to an instance, a statement made by Mr. Powderly, who represents a large labor organization. He was invited to address a large public meeting in the city of New York, which was supposed to be held under the auspices of the workingmen of New York in aid of the protective policy. Mr. Powderly, to my own certain knowledge, excited a great deal of comment among the workingmen who owed allegiance to him as an officer of their organization, by the very fact of his taking any action on that question in association with certain capitalists and in the supposed interest of a political party. The speech that he made on that occasion was freely commented upon by the workingmen, and the general opinion I found to be that while he advocated protection he still maintained that it was necessary for the workingmen to be organized and to fight for their share of the spoil. That proposition means that, living on wages which barely support him, having work during only a part of the year, and being almost incapable of supporting a good organization, the workingman is still to keep up this struggle for protection because it is necessary to have this "protection" in the interest of both workingman and master; and that when the protection is secured, then the workingman has got to turn around and fight his master or employer in order to get his share. So, as I have said, the general opinion of the workingmen on that occasion seemed to be that it was a kind of a work of supererogation on the part of a workingman to take any hand in defending the tariff, when it was acknowledged that they themselves would still have to keep up this fight with their employers for their share of the benefits of the protection, and to keep it up a great deal more bitterly than was found necessary in England under free trade.

William McClelland, a member of the central district committee of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, gave the following testimony in relation to the tariff and imported labor:

I do not mean to introduce here any argument on protection versus free trade, but there is one thing I would like to point out, and that is the position that the workingmen are in compared with that of their employers. A manufacturer is at perfect liberty to import, under contract or otherwise, all the pauper labor he wishes from the most starving portions of Europe or Asia, and to bring that labor here in competition with the American workingman. There is no protection for the American workingman. On the other hand the American manufacturer is protected to this extent: there are heavy duties imposed which are strictly enforced upon the importation of foreign commodities, and while the manufacturer is at liberty to import his labor the consumer is not at liberty to import manufactured goods from the same market from which the manufacturer imports labor. This nursling of the manufacturer is protected and hedged in on all sides, so that on the one hand his employés have no protection, and on the other he has all the protection. Now I am not going to propose any remedial measure, but I just wish to point out the injustice of that state of affairs.

Robert Blissert, now a merchant tailor in New York, a man who began life in the English mines, and who has had very large opportunities of knowing the condition of the working classes in this country and in Europe, and one of the best known and most ardent advocates of trades-unions in the country, gave this testimony:

I believe that the miners of England have the advantage over the miners of America; that their condition is better. I believe that the moral status of the American miner is somewhat above that of the English miner, but the pecuniary condition of the English miners and the condition of its home is, in my opinion, rather better than that of the American miner.

Q. You have special reference, I suppose, to coal-miners?

A. Yes, sir; but I speak of all the mining interest. I believe that the condition of the homes of the miners in England is better than the condition of the homes of the American miners. The hours of labor are shorter there, and the amount of work performed by the English miners in a day is much less than the amount performed by the miners here. The same may be said of the carpenters, bricklayers, and plasterers, and there the hours of labor too are shorter in England. They are only from fifty-two to fifty-four hours per week. The mechanics' institutes and other places of information are more largely attended than they are here. There are more of them, and the workingmen all avail themselves of their benefits there more than they do here, even where they do exist, and I think I can say fearlessly that the intelligence of the skilled mechanic in England is better than the intelligence of the skilled mechanic in America.

Finally, on page 858, he says:

I do not know, however, whether I have stated clearly my opinion as to the practical condition of the workingmen here and in Europe. It is all nonsense for the Fourth-of-July orators to tell us here in this country that we are so much better off than they are in Europe. I found the workingmen in Paris equal if not superior to the workingmen in New York. I want to be properly understood when I say that the expressions heard from time to time here about the pauper labor of Europe, and the statement so often made about the condition of the people here being so much better than the people there, is unfounded—it is a dream.

Adolph Strasser, on behalf of the Cigar-Makers' International Union of America, volume 1, page 455, says:

The wages in England are higher than they are in Pennsylvania. In the State of Pennsylvania the average wages among the cigar-makers is from $2 to $6 a week, the lowest in the United States. The cigar-makers in that State are the poorest paid in this country. They work cheaper than the Chinamen of San Francisco, and they do not receive even that wages in cash; they have to take it in scrip and truck.

Henry George, the well-known political economist, says on page 488:

Labor does not get its fair share. There are workingmen in this country who are as much peons as the peons of South America. Get the reports of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics—and they are corroborated by the investigations of independent inquirers—and you will see that a very large proportion of the operatives in New England can not make enough to supply their families even in the poorest fashion. They are absolutely compelled to rely upon the labor of their little children—children whom the law strives to prevent going to work.

On page 517 he says, speaking of the rates of wages in the old countries and their relative purchasing power:

The rates of wages are lower there, speaking generally. In some avocations, however, I am inclined to think that the condition of the workmen is as good as it is here, and in some even better.

On page 518 he says, in reply to a question whether the manufacturing operatives and those we call day-laborers, including agricultural laborers, are any better off than they are in Great Britain:

I should say yes, though I should say that there are some classes better off. They are the English wage-workers; they have provided very much more by co-operation and combination, and all that can be done in that way, than have Americans. In England they have much larger and stronger trades-unions.

On page 524 he testifies to the growing feeling of dissatisfaction in the minds of the workingmen in regard to the present condition of affairs in this country.

Thomas J. Curran, a boiler-maker and iron-ship builder, testified as follows in regard to the wages of workingmen in his business here and in Scotland:

WAGES HIGHER ON THE CLYDE THAN ON THE DELAWARE.

Q. How do the wages of the workmen in the ship-yards on the Delaware compare with the wages of the same class of workingmen on the Clyde?

A. The workingmen on the Clyde receive better wages; they receive at least $4 a week more than they do on the Delaware.

Q. Is not the Delaware the great place for iron-ship building in this country?

A. It is the principal iron-ship building point in this country.

Q. What do you know about the comparative purchasing power of the wages received by the workmen on the Clyde and the wages received by the workmen on the Delaware?

A. I know about it from reports.

Q. Which on the whole is better paid, the Clyde workingmen or the American workingmen on the Delaware? Whose wages will purchase most of the comforts of life?

A. Well, certainly, where a man receives $4 a week more, and where he can buy more for a dollar than he can buy here, his wages must be more and he must have more comforts.

Q. You understand, then, that the necessaries of life are cheaper in the old country than they are here?

A. Yes, sir.

Thomas B. McGuire, of New York, an expressman, gave the following startling testimony illustrating the condition of the workingmen in some of our large cities:

AN ABLE-BODIED MAN WILLING TO WORK FOR FOOD, CLOTHING, AND SHELTER.

By Mr. CALL:

Q. Suppose you could make a contract with some person on a farm in Illinois, or Ohio, or Iowa, or Minnesota, or anywhere in the West or Northwest, by which you could have a comfortable and abundant subsistence for yourself and family, with a house to live in, and, say, $20 a month wages; could you not make a very good start on that?

A. I would be willing to do better than that. If they will guarantee me food, clothing, and shelter for myself and family for twenty years, I will give them my services for nothing.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you a good workman?

A. Well, my references from my last place class me as honest and industrious, and I am positive I never drank a glass of liquor in my life, except two glasses of beer.

Q. Are you in pretty good health?

A. Well, yes. I suppose all the damage I have ever suffered to my health has been in handling those heavy cases that I spoke of. I can't get anything to do, but at the same time they give me permission to be taxed to pay Vanderbilt $40 a minute on his Government bonds.

P. H. McLogan, a representative of the Chicago Trades Assembly, gave this testimony in relation to discontent among the workingmen:

By Mr. PUGH:

Q. What is your information or knowledge as to the feelings and ideas of the class of people who are in the condition you describe? Do they complain on account of the condition of these houses that they occupy, and on account of their wages not being sufficient to enable them to live more comfortably and to improve their surroundings?

A. They undoubtedly do complain, and the very fact of their living in the squalor and wretchedness they do live in has provoked discontent in their minds; and in all our labor agitations, wherever there is any particular excitement aroused, these men who feel that they are oppressed are ready for almost any remedy. Even if it reached a revolution, if you choose, they are ripe for it.

Q. Then their discontent is of a character approaching to desperation?

A. Undoubtedly it is. I am speaking now of the lower class.

Of importation of labor under contract he said:

We think, also, that the Congress of the United States ought to pass a law prohibiting the importation of foreign laborers under contract. We know that, notably, men working the mines in the upper lake region frequently make contracts in Europe, in Sweden, and Denmark, and import a number of laborers from there. It may be said to be, in a modified form, the Chinese cooly system over again. It is the same system in a modified and less objectionable form. Those men are imported from Europe, and they work from one to two years under contracts made in Europe. That system is a source of great dissatisfaction to a great many American workingmen, for while a great many of us believe that American workingmen ought to have "protection" so as to get better wages, still we can not conceive how we can be really protected when the same manufacturer who advocates the "protection" of American labor can, in case of a lockout, go over to Germany, or some other part of Europe, and import as many mechanics or laborers as he pleases to compete with our American mechanics here at home. That was done notably in the case of the glass-blowers in New Jersey. We consider that any "protection" now given to American mechanics is of no avail so long as capital can import this cheap European labor in that way.

J. T. Finnerty, of New York, a brass-worker, gave the following testimony:

DECREASED WAGES.

A. The wages paid in the trade fourteen years ago were from $18 to $21 a week.

Q. What are the wages now of the same class of workmen, with the same skill, and working the same number of hours—if they do work the same number of hours now?

A. From $12 to $18 a week; on an average $15 a week.

Q. Do you think $15 a week is a fair statement of the average now?

A. Yes, sir; it is rather above than below the average.

THE SOCIAL CONDITION OF THE MEN GETTING WORSE.

Q. You have told us that the wages have been reduced. How is it as to the style of living of the workmen now compared with how they lived fourteen or fifteen years ago?

A. That appears to be about the same as far as house rent is concerned. There was a reduction of house rents some years ago, but they have reached up again.

Q. Are other things about equal?

A. About equal.

Q. Let me see if I understand you fully. You get less wages than you did fifteen years ago?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, do you mean to say that the wages which you receive at present will buy as much of the comforts of life as the wages you received then would?

A. By no means. I say that the rents are the same as they were fourteen years ago, but the man who had apartments of four or five rooms at that time is confining himself to perhaps three rooms now.

Q. How are the social surroundings of the workingmen now, as to the character of the neighborhoods in which they live; for I have noticed that there are some very fine neighborhoods in this city and some others that are very poor?

A. The bronze workers as a rule live in tenement houses. They are surrounded by the poorest class, the cheapest class, the cheapest element of the laboring people, and they are no better than anybody else.

Q. Was that so fifteen years ago, or is there a difference since that time?

A. It was different then. A mechanic was considered somebody, and he felt that he was somebody; he was a skilled mechanic, and he was considered above the poor laborer on the street.

Q. How is it as to the neighborhoods where they live and the character of their dwellings at present as compared with fifteen years ago; are they better or worse than they were then?

A. If there is any change, it is for the worse; the tendency is to get worse.

Charles L. Miller, of New York, tailor, gave the following testimony about the condition of his trade:

WAGES OF TAILORS IN NEW YORK.

Q. What are the wages of tailors now in New York, and what were they ten or twelve years ago?

A. The wages to-day for cutters average $15 a week, and they have work about nine months in the year.

Q. Have they no employment for the other three months?

A. No employment.

Q. So that they have to live during those three months on what they have saved during the other nine months that they have work?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There is no other business in the city in the tailoring line that they can turn to?

A. Oh, yes; if they have a mind to they can go to tailoring. Every cutter is supposed to be a tailor, but that is not the fact at the present day. Previous to 1864 it was so—previous to the introduction of cutting machinery.

THE CONDITION OF THE TAILORS DETERIORATING.

Q. Is the condition of tailors in New York better or worse now than it was some years ago?

A. It has grown 200 per cent. worse since 1874.

Q. What is their style of living as to comforts now compared with what it was in 1874 and before that?

A. It is next to pauperism. I am speaking now of tailors, not of the clothing cutters.

Q. Well, there were none of those, I understand, before 1874; so that you can not make the comparison of their condition at that time with their condition now.

A. No, sir. As to the condition of the clothing cutters at the present time, I would place them in the middle class.

Q. Clothing cutting is a branch of the tailoring trade, though it is not complete tailoring?

A. No. The reason that I put the cutters in the middle class is that many of the people who worked at the business from 1869 to 1874 accumulated money enough during that time to become real estate owners or property owners. In our branch of the trade we find from the statistics of our organization that one-third of the members are property-owners.

Q. How is it now as to their accumulating money?

A. It is quite the reverse. There are none of them since 1874 or 1876 that have accumulated anything to our knowledge.

This witness goes on to explain that one great cause of the deterioration of this class of American working people is the competition of very poor and ignorant foreigners—mostly Russian and Polish Jews.

John Morrison, of New York, a machinist, testified as follows:

Q. What is the prospect for a man now working in one of these machine-shops, a man who is temperate and economical and thrifty, to become a boss or a manufacturer of machinery himself from his own savings? Could a man do it without getting aid from some relative who might die and leave him a fortune, or without drawing a lottery prize, or something of that sort?

A. Well, speaking generally, there is no chance. They have lost all desire to become bosses now.

Q. Why have they lost that desire?

A. Why, because the trade has become demoralized. First, they earn so small wages; and, next, it takes so much capital to become a boss now that they can not think of it, because it takes all they can earn to live.

Q. Then it is the hopelessness of the effort that produces the loss of the desire on their part; is that it?

A. That is the idea.

Q. What is the pay generally of those workers in these machine-shops?

A. It ranges from $1.25 to $3.50 or $4 a day, but these last are, of course, exceptional wages. The average wages I should say is about $2 a day.

Q. In New York, do you mean?

A. Taking New York and vicinity, it might be $2.25 a day. You must remember that good machinists have more responsibility on their shoulders than men have in the average trades, as in fact the safety of society itself rests on their shoulders as far as regards steam-engines, locomotives, steamboats, and all kinds of machinery. Still, in spite of all that, in spite of all the knowledge which it is necessary for a man to have who works on this general machine work, he is compelled to go along with less wages than a hod-carrier. And yet we have on iron one of the highest protective tariffs possible.

Q. What is the social condition of the machinists in New York and the surrounding towns and cities?

A. It is rather low compared to what their social condition was ten or fifteen years ago.

Q. Do you remember when it was better?

A. When I first went to learn the trade a machinist considered himself more than the average workingman; in fact he did not like to be called a workingman. He liked to be called a mechanic. To-day he recognizes the fact that he is simply a laborer the same as the others. Ten years ago even he considered himself a little above the average workingman; he thought himself a mechanic, and felt he belonged in the middle class; but to-day he recognizes the fact that he is simply the same as any other ordinary laborer, no more and no less.

Q. What sort of houses or lodgings do the machinists occupy as a general rule?

A. As a general rule they live in tenement houses, often on the top floor.

Q. How is it as to the size of the apartments that they occupy, the conveniences and comforts they afford, their healthfulness, the character of the neighborhood, and the general surroundings?

A. That depends a great deal upon the size of the families. In most cases they are compelled to send their families to work, and of course they have to have rooms in proportion to the size of their families, and of course it often robs them of their earnings to pay rent; but as a rule the machinists live in the lowest quarters of the city, between Eighth and Eleventh avenues, on the west side, and on the east side between Third avenue and the river. You will find the machinists stuck in those quarters on both sides of the city.

One great trouble with our trade is that there is such a surplus of machinists in the market now that every day sees seven or eight at the door of every shop looking for a job. In fact they are denied the right to labor, and that is what we kick about. About two months ago I believe there was about one-fifth of our trade in this city entirely out of work.

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you mean to say that that is the general condition of the machinists in New York and in this vicinity?

A. That is their general condition, with, of course, a good many exceptions. That is the general condition to the best of my knowledge.

INTIMIDATION AND "BLACK-LISTING" BY EMPLOYERS.

Q. Where do you work?
A. I would rather not have it in print. Perhaps I would have to go Monday morning if I did. We are so situated in the machinist's trade that we daren't let them know much about us. If they know that we open our mouths on the labor question, and try to form organizations, we are quietly told that "business is slack," and we have to go.
Q. Do you know of anybody being discharged for making speeches on the labor question?
A. Yes; I do know of several. A little less than a year ago several members of the organization that I belong to were discharged because it was discovered that they were members of the organization.
Q. Do you say those men were members of the same organization that you belonged to?
A. Yes, sir; but not working in the same place where I work. And in fact many of my trade have been on the "black-list," and have had to leave town to find work.
Q. Are the machinists here generally contented, or are they in a state of discontent and unrest?
A. There is mostly a general feeling of discontent, and you will find among the machinists the most radical workingmen, with the most revolutionary ideas. You will find that they don't so much give their thoughts simply to trades-unions and other efforts of that kind, but they go far beyond that; they only look for relief through the ballot or through a revolution, a forcible revolution.

A great mass of such testimony was presented which I have not room to reproduce here, but its general tenor is well illustrated by these extracts. The gentleman who took the lead in introducing the testimony sums it up as follows:

THE FACTS PROVED BY THE CENTRAL LABOR UNION.

In presenting the case in behalf of the Central Labor Union, we have proved so far, with reference to the city of New York, first, that the productive power of labor here has been vastly increased by machinery; and secondly, that, concurrently with this increase of productive power, the wages of labor have at least been at a standstill, if they have not decreased; while at the same time we have shown that the workingman's style of living and his social condition have deteriorated, and that, in many cases, his wages are actually lower in dollars and cents, while the price of living is considerably higher, than some years ago. We have also shown that a workingman nowadays learns no complete trade, and, therefore, never becomes an independent workman, but must always seek a master. We have shown that it is almost, if not quite an impossibility, for a workman going into the mechanical trades to ever become the employer of himself; that in consequence of that, in many cases, he loses spirit and becomes despondent and thriftless, and in other cases desperate and disorderly. We have shown, to some extent, that children, instead of being at school, are put to work here at a very early age merely to eke out the income of their parents, and we may yet be able to show specifically by employers instances of the employment of child-labor in factories.
I know of my own knowledge that in one dry-goods house, that of Erich Brothers, children who I should say are not above 10 years of age are kept busily at work during the week, from about 6 or 7 o'clock in the morning until 6 or 7 o'clock at night, every day except Saturday, and on Saturday until 11 o'clock at night. I have seen Erich Brothers' store open and crowded as late as 11 o'clock at night, and those children still on duty. It is my intention, at present, to try to have Mr. Erich on the stand as a witness to testify on this subject. We have proved these facts which I have thus rapidly recited by intelligent witnesses of various trades, representing probably ten or twelve of the principal mechanical trades carried on in this city, and, if the committee desired, it would be possible for us to offer additional proof in regard to other trades in which the same general state of facts would be found to exist.

From the last annual report on labor and industries in New Jersey, from the hands of a protectionist, I extract the following statement:

Progress and poverty seem to be the concomitants of our civilization, and while the phrase so generally heard that the rich grow richer and the poor poorer may not be strictly true, it is painfully evident that the advance in our social life, great as it has been during the past half-century, bears no sort of proportion to the increase of wealth, knowledge, and material appliances. Labor receives no fair share of these advantages which bring out in strong relief the inequalities of our modern life; with the increase of palatial residences for the rich few the tenement-hovels of the many poor increase; with the erection of the costly church edifices and school-houses of the country, the enlargement of our jails and almhouses. The greed for gain, so characteristic of our age, makes the chief end of life the acquisition of wealth, and the increasing competition is the plea by which the employing class seeks to justify the reduction of wages of the employé to the lowest possible level sufficient for bare existence. In periods of business depression, which so often recur, the wages cease entirely, and the wage-workers are left dependent on private or public charity. The great army of tramps and vagrants is recruited from unemployed workmen. As long as this state of affairs continues it is idle to talk of any social improvement of the workmen.

This is the sad condition to which labor has been brought in many of the richest States in the Union. There has been no famine or pestilence or war to produce this condition of things.

The facts set forth in these extracts are furnished by the workingmen themselves. Read them. They are an indictment which the American workingmen have drawn up against this protective system.

On that indictment we are going to the country this fall. As sure as these laboring men are allowed to cast their votes at the polls in November next they will speak there in no uncertain sound in condemnation of this system. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNHAM. That is mere prophecy.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, it is prophecy; but I will stand by that prophecy.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. If you adopt the same platform at Chicago that you did in Cincinnati in 1880, in favor of a tariff for revenue only, you will be beaten in Pennsylvania by a hundred thousand votes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not concerned about carrying Pennsylvania for the Democratic ticket. That State is all wrapped up in the system of protection, and she will naturally support a policy which enables her to grow rich at the expense of the people of other States.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. And you will lose Ohio also, and every other Northern State.

Mr. SPRINGER. We will take our chances on that, my friend. Wherever this system is understood in all its enormity, in all its outrages upon labor, there will be scarcely a State in the Union that will not favor the reforms that are now advocated by the Democratic party on this subject. Why, Mr. Chairman, the movement for this reform has already begun in Boston, as I have already shown. It will not long be a question of dividing the Democratic party, but a question of splitting the Republican in two.

WAGES IN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

Reference was made in the extracts taken from the Blair report to the wages paid in England and the United States in cotton mills. I desire to call further attention to Consul Shaw's report in order to show that in England it costs more in wages to produce a pound of cotton fabrics than in this country. This fact is very important in view of the constant assertions made on this floor and elsewhere that we must have a protective tariff in order to compensate for the difference in wages in this country and in Europe. I invite, therefore, the most careful consideration to the following extracts from the report of Albert D. Shaw, United States consul at Manchester, England, July 15, 1882 (see "Cotton and woolen mills of Europe," State Department, Report No. 23, September, 1882, page 425):

COMPARATIVE COST OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN COTTON MANUFACTURES.

As I do not possess a practical knowledge of all the details entering into the cost of cotton manufactures, in all their wide ramifications, I am compelled to rely on the labors and conclusions of adepts in this field of research. In this connection I have much pleasure in acknowledging the able services of the late Mr. James Thomley, of Manchester, whose tables and criticisms I herewith present as bearing upon this point. Mr. Thomley visited the United States in 1879 as the "special commissioner" of the Textile Manufacturer of this city, and his deeply interesting and reliable series of letters to that periodical very fully reviewed the cotton interests of our country.
As one of the latest and fullest comparisons between English and American manufactures I believe the following tables and remarks from his pen will be found reliable. The following is the rate of wages paid for weaving printing-cloth in some of the principal districts of England and America:

ENGLAND.

Description of cloth.	Ashton-under-Lyne.	Blackburn.	Stockport.	Hyde.	Average.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.

28 inch, 60 reed, 16 picks (64 by 64) 58 yards	(a)	22.30	23.20	23.20	22.90

a Unknown.

The weight of the cloth—28 inches, 56 reed, 14 picks, 58 yards long—is 7 pounds 4 ounces, and the cost of weaving, in wages, per pound is, therefore, 0.898 cent, or 0.449*d.*, less in America than in England, while the difference in favor of America in the cloth 28 inches, 60 reeds, 16 picks, 58 yards long, weighing 8 pounds 4 ounces, is 0.726 cent, or 0.363*d.*, per pound. It will be observed from the weights given above that American printing cloths are made of coarser yarns than the English, the usual counts being about No. 29 for warp and No. 36 for weft, while in England they are, respectively, about No. 31 and No. 41. With respect to the quantity of the work turned out by each loom per week of 60 hours, I found that the usual production was 5½ pieces of 28-inch, 16 by 16 (64 by 64), 45 yards. This, at the Fall River and Lowell rate of wages, made each loom earn for its attendant 99 cents, or 4*s.* 1½*d.* As it is a very ordinary thing for eight looms to be worked by one weaver, your readers will see that, though the rate paid in America is lower than that general in Great Britain, the average earnings of the weavers are higher.
It now only remains for me to summarize and, to some extent, add to the matter contained in this and my previous letters. I shall endeavor to do this in such a way as to place side by side the cost of working an English and an American mill. I was, through the kindness of several friends in the United States, allowed to make such extracts from their books of account as enables me to present to your readers the cost of manufacturing there. I obtained particulars regarding a variety of goods, but I have thought it best to confine my comparison to medium counts of yarn, as I know that from these calculations can be made for others. I have left out of consideration those mills where the amount spent each year in repairs is so much in excess of the amount usually expended in Lancashire; but in order that a proper idea may be obtained of the comparative cost of cotton manufacturing on both sides of the Atlantic, I have worked out the sums for interest and depreciation in the value of mills and machinery at the rates generally adopted in England. Those who are accustomed to allow a different rate can, of course, work out their calculations so as to accord with their ideas. The cloth chosen for a comparison is in America 28 inches wide and in England 32 inches wide, but I consider that the two may be fairly compared, because the counts of yarn and the reed and picks are so much coarser in the American than in the English mill, which latter is fairly representative of a factory weaving both narrow and wide printing-cloth.

The above tables show that where the cost per pound is lowest there is nothing put down for motive power, and that in the American mills the cost increases as the water power becomes less predominant. The mill at Fall River is driven by steam-engines, and the Rhode Island mill entirely by water. I said in my last letter that I did not consider that there was much economy effected by the use of water-power, because the cost of constructing the water-works was so great as to absorb as much in interest of money as the coal would cost each year. We may, therefore, fairly add to the cost of production, as given above, an amount equal to what motive power costs in England. With respect also to the items of freight or teaming and brokerage or commissions, I ought to say that in America the cost of its carriage to the mills is reckoned in the price of the cotton, while commission is paid only on the purchase of the raw material, and not, as is common in Manchester, upon the sale of the manufactured article.

At the mill in Rhode Island, where it will have been observed that the cost of production is very low, I was told by the owners that they considered they were manufacturing at a lower rate than any firm in America, and I found this opinion confirmed in other quarters. The cause of this economical working was said to lie in the fact that the mill was situated in a rural district, where the taxes were low and coal-oil was used for illuminating purposes instead of gas, and where, in addition to any advantages derived from its situation, it had the advantage—not possessed by the others, and in a still less degree by the English factory—of being allowed to work for sixty hours per week. Your readers will gather from the figures given in the foregoing table of costs that, in the matter of wages, America is as cheap as England; from what I have said previously they will be able to see also that still further economies may easily be made in this item by reducing the cost in the spinning department. It will be noticed that the disadvantages suffered by American cotton manufacturers arise chiefly from the weight of their taxation, the dearness of their coal, and the great expense of their mills and machinery. Two of these drawbacks are removable, the other is probably permanent.

The foregoing extracts from Consul Shaw's report explode all the theories of protectionists. It seems that in Rhode Island it costs less, considering every element of cost, to manufacture a pound of cotton fabrics than it does in England. In the matter of wages merely the amount paid in England for making a pound of cotton fabrics exceeds that paid in any part of the United States. But the price of the raw material is not considered. In this country raw cotton is cheaper by the cost of freight to England, but dye-stuffs are dearer by the protective tariffs paid on them. These items may balance each other. What pretext, then, is there for a tariff of 38 per cent. on foreign cotton fabrics? None except to promote and foster monopolies in this country.

PROGRESS OF THE WORKING CLASSES IN ENGLAND.

The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his able speech on this bill on Wednesday last referred to the inaugural address of Robert Giffin, LL.D., president of the London Statistical Society, read November 20, 1883. The gentleman from New York justly regards him "the most eminent living authority on the subject of statistics." Mr. Giffin's address was on the subject of "The progress of the working classes in the last half-century." This article is published in the Popular Science Monthly for May, 1884. The importance of this article can not be overestimated. It proves conclusively that the condition of the wage-earners of Great Britain has constantly and steadily improved during the last half-century—covering the free-trade era of England. After an exhaustive presentation of facts and statistics, Mr. Giffin concludes his article as follows:

From this it appears that the increase of what is known as working-class income in the aggregate is greater than that of any other class, being 160 per cent., while the return to capital and the return to what are called the capitalist classes, whether it is from capital proper or, as I maintain, a return only in the nature of wages, has only increased about 100 per cent., although capital itself has increased over 150 per cent. At the same time the capitalist classes themselves have greatly increased in number, so that the amount of capital possessed among them per head has only increased 15 per cent., notwithstanding the great increase in capital itself, and the average income per head can have hardly increased at all. On the other hand, as the masses of the nation, taking the United Kingdom altogether, have only increased about 30 per cent. since 1843, when these income-tax figures begin, while their aggregate incomes have increased 160 per cent., it is explained how these incomes have gained, individually, about 100 per cent. as against hardly any increase at all in the incomes of what are called the capitalist classes on the average. Thus the rich have become more numerous, but not richer individually; the "poor" are, to some smaller extent, fewer; and those who remain "poor" are, individually, twice as well off on the average as they were fifty years ago. The "poor" have thus had almost all the benefit of the great material advance of the last fifty years.

We may now conclude this long inquiry. It has been shown directly, I believe, that while the individual incomes of the working classes have largely increased the prices of the main articles of their consumption have rather declined; and the inference as to their being much better off which would be drawn from these facts is fully supported by statistics showing a decline in the rate of mortality, an increase of the consumption of articles in general use, an improvement in general education, a diminution of crime and pauperism, a vast increase of the number of depositors in savings-banks, and other evidences of general well-being. Finally, the increase of the return to capital has not been in any way in proportion, the yield on the same amount of capital being less than it was, and the capital itself being more diffused, while the remuneration of labor has enormously increased. The facts are what we should have expected from the conditions of production in recent years. Inventions having been multiplied and production having been increasingly efficient, while capital has been accumulated rapidly, it is the wages-receivers who must have the benefit. The competition of capital keeps profits down to the lowest point, and workmen consequently get for themselves nearly the whole product of the aggregate industry of the country. It is interesting, nevertheless, to find that the facts correspond with what theory should lead us to anticipate.

Individual cases of distress and hardship among the working people of England may be cited there as in this country. But the evidence submitted by Mr. Giffin shows that the condition of this class has improved over 100 per cent. since free trade was established, and that they are now better fed, better clothed, better housed, better educated, and better in all that contributes to human happiness than ever before.

OUR HIGH PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

We have had on our statute-books for nearly a quarter of a century what is called "a high protective tariff." The friends of that system revised such laws at the last session of Congress, and made some slight reductions and some slight increases of rates, all in "the interest of the protected industries themselves." In the case of many of the leading industries, notably the manufactures of iron and steel, the importation of many classes of such manufactures is practically excluded by our tariff laws. On every schedule of the tariff law except in the case of sugar the tariff has been imposed for protection, the revenue to be derived being the merest incident.

Protectionists continually assert that tariffs are imposed for the benefit of the workingmen; that they are highest on luxuries and lowest on articles of general consumption. Let us examine this claim. Eighty-five per cent. of the women and children of the country, in fact all the laboring classes, wear more or less of worsted and cotton dress goods. I have obtained from a prominent merchant in New York a table showing the rate of duty on this class of goods weighing under four ounces to the square yard. A careful examination of this table will prove very interesting. It will be seen that the highest tax is on the lowest-priced goods. Under the old law in force prior to June 30 last the duty on the cheapest qualities of these goods was 125 per cent., and this exorbitant rate was reduced to 110 per cent. by the new law. As the price increases the tax decreases step by step until the highest-priced goods, those worn by the wealthier portion of the community, are reached, where we find the tax only 60 per cent. under the old and 58 under the new law. The goods of the very poorest classes are taxed 100 per cent. more than are the goods worn by the rich. This discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich is preserved in all the schedules imposing duties on wearing apparel, except that there is a uniform tax of 60 per cent. on all classes of silk goods. The table to which I have referred is as follows:

Five per cent. for freight and charges added to the cost in Europe to make cost to land here.

Before the war the duty on these goods was 19 per cent. ad valorem.

I have another table showing the duty on woolen dress goods weighing under four ounces to the square yard. The same peculiarity is observed in this table as to the rates. The highest tax is on the cheapest goods, those worn by the poor. And not content with imposing a tax of 74½ per cent. under the old law, the protectionists in the last Congress raised this tax to 99½ per cent. But as the goods rise in price the taxes are reduced, until the fine goods of the rich come in at 43 per cent.

This table is worthy of careful examination. It has been prepared by a merchant of long experience and is based upon actual transactions and prices at the time it was prepared (September 29, 1883): [See table below.]

The duty on all these goods was 24 per cent. ad valorem before the war. Thus it will be seen that protection does not protect workingmen, but imposes taxes upon the articles which they consume twice as great as upon the articles consumed by the rich. In view of the present condition of the laboring classes in this country, in view of innumerable strikes, of continuous lockouts, of unrequited toil; and in view of the languishing condition of the manufacturing interests themselves, of extensive business failures, of the general unrest of both labor and capital, I hold that the protective system, after twenty-four years of trial, has proven a dismal failure. Its pretenses have been false; its promises of high wages to workingmen have been delusive; its claim that it has promoted the general prosperity is without foundation in fact. "This insubstantial pageant" of protection has faded and all its boasted advantages have dissolved into thin air—

Like the baseless fabric of a vision.

Let us go a step further. We are told by the advocates of the protective system that protective tariffs are necessary in order to prevent our country from being inundated with the cheap goods of other countries; that the products of the pauper labor of Europe will flood our country and destroy home industries. If this were true I should favor the highest protective rates, even to the exclusion of foreign articles. But is it true that our country—our workingmen, if you please, would be injured by being permitted to supply their wants from the world's cheapest market? Let us reason upon this subject for a few moments, and in doing so I will refer to some facts taken from the annual report on the foreign commerce of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, the last fiscal year, by Mr. Joseph Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics. From this report it will be seen that the total value of the exports of merchandise, including gold and silver, during the last year was $855,000,000. This large amount of exports embraced among others the following items:

OUR SURPLUS PRODUCTS.

Value of exports of agricultural products was $619,000,000, or 77 per cent. of the whole amount exported.

The value of exports of manufactures was $111,890,000, or nearly 14 per cent. of the whole amount.

The products of our mines exported, including mineral oils, were valued at $51,000,000.

What do these facts prove? They show that during that fiscal year the workingmen of this country created articles of value sufficient in amount to supply the demands of all the people of the country and had left a surplus of articles for which there was no market in this country equal in value to $855,000,000. What was to be done with this surplus of products? These products had been produced by the sweat and toil of workingmen, and they were entitled to dispose of them to their best advantage. Of what did these surplus articles consist?

The report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shows that 77 per cent. of them were the products of the soil. The farmers had produced products during that year of the value of $620,000,000 in excess of the demands of the country. The transportation of these products to the seaboard furnished employment to thousands of men on railroads, and the freights contributed to the dividends of stockholders. The laborers in manufacturing establishments and mines produced articles in excess of home demands of the value of $162,000,000. The production of these surplus products of the factories, mills, and mines gave employment to thousands of workingmen and vastly increased the amount of wages paid to labor. But what became of the surplus products? No man in this country would buy them. They went abroad to seek a market in foreign countries. They went forth to be disposed of to the best advantage for those who had created them, and whose wages and remuneration had been fixed by their supposed commercial value in other countries. Practically they belong to the workingmen of the country, and were to be sold on their account and for their benefit.

Now comes the practical question: "In what shall the proceeds of the sales of these articles be invested?" The protectionists have suggested we should sell our surplus products for gold and silver only. Let us see how this would work. Eight hundred and fifty millions in gold and silver drawn from other countries each year for five years would exhaust the coin supply of the world. At the end of that time our customers would be impoverished and could purchase no more. We would thus "kill the goose that lays the golden egg." But the proposition is absurd. It is contrary to the course of trade and the experience of mankind during all the ages of the past. We must dispose of our surplus products in some other way. The protectionists again come forward and inform us that there are some products which may be brought into this country which will not injure our manufactories and workingmen. These they have enumerated in the tariff laws under the head of the "free-list."

According to the report to which I have already referred, the value of merchandise which was imported into this country during 1883, free of duty, was $206,000,000. This amount exhausted our wants, so far as the free-list is concerned. We have still on hand as the proceeds of our surplus products a credit to the amount of $650,000,000. In what must this large sum of money be invested? We can not sell our products for gold and silver. We have already purchased the harmless articles not produced in this country and admitted free of duty. We do not need food or breadstuffs; we have those articles for sale. There is but one course left us. We must invest our six hundred and fifty millions in the manufactured products and raw materials of other countries. That is just what we did do, just what we were obliged to do.

Let us see what kind of articles we did purchase. First on the list we find sugar and molasses, of which nearly one hundred million dollars' worth were imported. The other leading articles imported during the past year were the following:

Wool, raw	$10,949,000
Manufactures of wool	44,274,000
Silk, raw	14,000,000
Manufactures of silk	36,000,000
Chemicals, drugs, dyes, &c.	43,000,000
Iron and steel, and manufactures thereof	40,000,000
Manufactures of cotton	36,000,000
Hides and skins	27,000,000

These will serve to illustrate the character of imported articles. It will be seen that many of these articles are raw materials which furnish employment to labor in converting them into useful commodities. Now, the question arises, was our country benefited or injured by these importations? The protectionists would have us believe that they were an injury. But were they? How did it happen that they came to this country? It was not the result of an accident. It was not the result of a design on the part of wicked foreigners to inundate us with cheap goods and thus destroy our home industries. On the contrary, they came as the result of natural causes. We had a surplus of products; we could find no market for them here, and hence sent them abroad. We invested the proceeds to the very best advantage for us and our people, and especially for the best advantage of those who created by their toil and sweat those surplus products. The articles which were purchased with such proceeds were for the use and benefit of our own people and the measure and recompense of their own toil. Shall they be excluded? The protectionists find it impossible to exclude them entirely.

But they insist upon imposing a heavy tax upon the articles coming in. Who pays this tax? In the first instance, the importer. But finally the burden falls upon the persons who consume the articles, upon those who use the sugar, woolen goods, cotton goods, iron and steel manufactures, and, in short, all articles which pay duties. A greater part of the burden falls upon the workingmen themselves, those who created our surplus products and caused them to be exchanged for other products that they desired and could not otherwise procure. If any injury has resulted from the importation of foreign goods into this country the workingmen and farmers who produced our surplus products are alone responsible. They alone are answerable for the consequences. They toiled too early and too late. They created too much, they overdid their business, and thus produced commodities beyond our home wants. Wicked workingmen and farmers! how could you do such a thing? Protectionists often refer to our large imports and lament that those articles were not produced in our own country. They tell us how many days' work were lost or transferred to foreigners, to the pauper laborers of Europe. This employment, they say, should have been given to our own people. Our own workingmen could have made all these imported articles, but in our folly and blindness we have gone off and hired strangers and aliens to work for us. This is the argument of protectionists.

A FAIR EXCHANGE

would be no robbery. Foreigners bought from us eight hundred and twenty-five million dollars' worth of our products (excluding coin), and thus gave employment to millions of our people who created these products, while we have purchased articles from them to the value of only $700,000,000. If each dollar's worth of products represented a day's labor, foreigners paid us during that year for 125,000,000 days' work more than we paid them. As a mere matter of business and reciprocity, how and wherein was our country injured by the operation? We merely exchanged products we did not need for those we did need. And we paid off $125,000,000 at least of our indebtedness abroad at the same time. Those countries which have no surplus products are not troubled with the cheap goods of other countries. The Esquimaux, in the frozen region of the poles, would be delighted to be inundated with cheap blankets, cheap coal, and cheap clothing from foreign countries. But they are not. They have nothing to sell, no surplus products of theirs crowd the world's markets, and they are saved the calamity of cheap foreign goods.

The ignorant inhabitants of the tropical isles whose articles of apparel are patterned, not after the latest Paris fashions, but follow the simple styles of our first parents in the garden, are not troubled with the cheap goods of foreigners. They have nothing to sell. No surplus products of theirs go abroad to be exchanged for cheap clothing. They need no protective tariff to keep out such goods. Their own ignorance and indolence serve their purposes equally well. They have nothing to exchange and are thus perfectly protected against the cheap wares and pauper labor of foreign countries. Thus it will be seen that ignorance and indolence are as perfect protection against the pauper productions of other nations as the most perfect system of prohibitory tariffs. They will both accomplish the same result—suppression of all trade between different nations and secure what protectionists regard as the perfection of their system—a nation entirely independent of all others—neither seeking nor requiring commercial dealing, but living wholly within and of itself. Such a nation has existed. Its example is the most striking illustration of the workings of the protective and exclusive system of government. I refer to

THE EMPIRE OF CHINA.

There the people enjoyed for hundreds of years whatever of benefits the principles of protection, put in full effect, could bestow. The Chinese closed their seaports. They built a great wall on their northern border 1,200 miles long and twenty feet high as a protection against the Tartar tribes. They shut themselves in and all other nations out. They enjoyed all the benefits of a home market and all the advantages to be derived from the consumption of home products. They had freedom from all competition with the pauper labor of India and the isles of the sea. No cheap foreign goods appeared in their storehouses or market places. They had a nation and spelled it with a large N. They could live upon their own resources, and were independent of all other nations, peoples, and tongues. Their motto was doubtless: "China for Chinamen." They enjoyed their exclusive policy until British guns broke down the barriers and British armies opened their ports to the commerce of the world. Here we should have found the paradise of the protectionists, the millennium of labor.

Hundreds of years of the practical workings of the protective system should have elevated labor to its highest estate and lifted the workingmen to that proud, prosperous, and happy condition which protectionists promise as the practical result of their teachings. But the facts were not encouraging. Protected China was neither happy nor prosperous. The people were destitute of religious feelings and beliefs. Women were inferiors and but little better than slaves. The Chinese possessed great skill in handicraft, but labor was poorly paid. Poverty and vice were everywhere to be found. Ignorance and superstition prevailed. Workingmen were degraded and poorly paid, meanly fed, and in a great measure destitute of the comforts of life. The Congress of the United States has seen fit in its wisdom to exclude those much protected Chinamen from coming to our country and settling in our midst. We have regarded them as too degraded to associate with our people, and have denied them citizenship and an asylum. This we have done in the case of no other people in the world.

A few years of commercial freedom have wrought a wonderful change in China. An immense trade has been opened up between that country and all others. Many modern inventions have been introduced. Telegraphs are being built, and the time is not far distant when railroads will be permitted in the empire. The construction of the thousands of miles of railroads which the four hundred millions of Chinese will require in the near future will create a revolution in the business and financial world, and bring immense advantages to the manufacturing industries of our own country, if we know how to avail ourselves of the opportunity which will be offered.

COMMERCE BETWEEN THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH

has been carried on from the earliest period of antiquity. It has never been detrimental to mankind, but always beneficial. Yet there could be no foreign commerce without trade between nations. It results from the natural desire to exchange the products of one country for those of another. Such exchanges are not hurtful, but mutually beneficial to all concerned. One country—as did ours last year—produces more of certain kinds of commodities than can be profitably disposed of in the country of their production. They go abroad, and are exchanged for other products which are in demand and which serve a useful purpose. The cheaper the freights both ways the better for both buyer and seller. Hence improved methods of navigation on the high seas and improved facilities for transportation on land have always been looked upon with favor. And why? Because the best interests of all concerned were promoted by bringing the cost of commodities at the place of consumption as near as possible to that at the place of production. Cheap transportation does this; and hence cheap transportation is regarded by all as being beneficial to both producer and consumer.

But why have cheap transportation and protective tariffs at the same time and imposed on the same commodities? If steamship companies were organized into a grand monopoly and allowed to charge as freights 50 per cent. upon the value of the cargo the effect upon the home products of like character would be precisely the same as would be the collection of tariff taxes to the same amount, and the benefits (if I may be pardoned for using that word) to the workingman would be precisely the same. There would be this difference only: the Government would get no revenue. But the steamship company could afford to pay the Government a large tax for the monopoly which it would enjoy. In this way the result all around would be practically the same. But if

I should advocate a steamship monopoly to control freights on all products being shipped to this country I would, by the universal judgment of the people, be condemned and repudiated. But what is the difference between high freights and high tariffs? Both increase the prices of commodities to the consumers and protect producers from competition. Why improve our rivers and harbors? Why vote millions of acres of the public lands and millions of dollars of the people's money to aid in building railroads and canals for the purpose of cheapening transportation and then counteract all the benefits secured by imposing protective taxes?

All obstructions to trade and commerce are detrimental to the best interests of the people. The greater the freedom the greater the benefits to all. The Creator of the universe evidently intended that man should enjoy all the blessings that the earth could supply. He created the poles, where are frozen seas and mountains of ice. He created the tropics, where summer lasts all the year, and fruits and vegetation are the spontaneous growth of the soil. Between these extremes there is every variety of climate, soil, and resources. A high order of civilization and a right appreciation of the goodness of Providence will bring all of earth's blessings within the reach of man. He can sit "under his own vine and fig-tree" and enjoy the choicest products of all countries. He can procure his coffee from Java; his tea from Japan and China; his wines from California, France, or Germany; his furs from the Arctic regions; his spices from the tropics; his silks from Lyons; his laces from Brussels. His home may be furnished with comforts and luxuries drawn from the world's best markets. His person may be clothed in garments illustrating the highest skill which any people had attained. His wife and children may also enjoy with him all those comforts, conveniences, and luxuries which those in like circumstances in any other part of the world enjoy.

IN CONCLUSION.

Why should we seek to deprive ourselves of any good and perfect thing which a kind Providence has placed within our reach? Why should not the workingmen be permitted to exchange their surplus products to the best advantage to themselves? They are entitled to the full measure of the fruits of their own earnings.

Both producers and consumers are entitled to the benefits of the world's best markets; such markets will not kill business but make it alive. They will not impoverish, but enrich mankind. They are the centers of the world's best thought, life, and enterprise, and their approach, with perfect freedom, is one of the inalienable rights of man, the right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor and said: I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. BRAINERD].

Mr. BRAINERD. Mr. Chairman, shall the industrial interests of this country be protected against foreign competition is the question presented to the American people by the provisions of this bill. The proposed legislation is not demanded by the people; it is not demanded by the varied industries. It is an unwise experiment in the interest of free trade and against protection. The character of the measure and the boldness and persistency with which it is being pressed by its exponents is alarming, and may well arouse the business interests, so essential to the prosperity of the country. The reopening of this great question at this time is against the judgment of the majority of thinking men. The tariff bill of the Forty-seventh Congress only went into effect in July, 1883, and has, therefore, been in operation about ten months. It has not been tried a sufficient length of time to enable the people to form a correct judgment of its operation upon the industries and the revenues.

This measure, if successful, will be an important advance toward the ultimate establishment in this country of the pernicious doctrine of free trade, a result for which the free-trade interests of England have labored so long and hard to accomplish. The advocates of this bill can not successfully deny or conceal the fact that its success in this Congress will be hailed on the other side of the water as a significant triumph for foreign labor and foreign capital against American labor and American capital. This is but another declaration of war against our industries, calculated in its far-reaching results to injuriously affect every branch of business and every laborer in the country. This same warfare has been waged before by the same influences and for the same purposes, at different periods in the history of the Government, with varied results. Sometimes the free-traders have been in the ascendency, and then again the protectionists have triumphed.

The history of the country is replete with conclusive evidence of the wisdom of protection and the folly of free trade. Under our protective system labor has found remunerative employment and capital profitable investment; manufacturing industries have grown up in all sections of the country; the busy hum of industry has been heard on every hand; our markets and storehouses have been supplied with the products of American labor; the farmer has found a fair market for his products; the material interests of the country have been developed, and fifty millions of people have found American homes. What arguments do the advocates of this bill present for a change of policy in the rates of import duties? In this discussion the duties on imports have been styled a war tax. The present rate of duties is not properly a war tax, and the argument for the bill derives no force from such a statement, nor will the people any more readily indorse the measure as needful and wise.

While legislative wisdom has never perhaps been able to make a perfect system of import duties, yet it may be safely said that the act of 1861 and its supplements provided as perfect a system of duties on imports as affecting the interests of the people and the general prosperity of the country as we have had at any time in the history of the Government. But more than twenty years of national growth during a period fraught with issues vital to American liberty, to national prosperity, and the perpetuity of the Government itself seemed to call for a revision of the tariff law, which resulted in the appointment of the Tariff Commission and the final passage of the act of 1883. While this act is not perfect and does not sufficiently protect all the industries against foreign competition, it was the result of compromise, and was accepted by the people as settling the principle of protection for the present in the general interest of American producers and of American labor.

But the free-trade element still want more, and now propose an indiscriminate reduction of 20 per cent. regardless of the demands of any of the industries, thus clearly demonstrating their determination ultimately to open our markets to the free importation of all kinds of foreign merchandise, reckless of the effect of such legislation upon the manufacturing and laboring classes in our own country. It matters not whether the friends of this measure call it revenue reform, or reduction of war taxes, or by any other designation. It is, in fact, the beginning of the free-trade structure which the free-trade exponents on this and the other side of the water have long threatened to rear in this country in the interest of foreign capital and foreign labor, though it be erected upon the ruins of our industries and impoverishes and oppresses the laboring classes. The representatives of the people should not forget in their action that they are legislating for America and for American labor, and not in the interest of foreign countries or foreign laborers. Let us address ourselves to the duties of the hour, and shape our legislation to foster and develop our manufactures and to elevate and better the condition of the laboring classes in all sections of our country.

Protection to home industries is a principle which it is the duty of our Government to maintain. The idea of protection is not to build up monopolies, but to encourage the industry and skill of the people and to develop the natural resources of the country. For this purpose customs duties on foreign imports should be so levied and adjusted as to prevent the free importation of such articles as can be manufactured or produced at home, and thus enable our products to compete with foreign productions of the same class in our own markets, and at the same time provide the needed revenue for the Government. It prevents monopoly by encouraging home competition among the industries. It does not benefit any special class at the expense of another, but promotes the general interest and welfare of all. It builds up a healthy domestic and foreign commerce. It especially guards and protects American labor in all its branches. It furnishes a diversified employment for labor at remunerative wages and an opportunity for the investment of capital, the product of labor, and thus utilizes all our resources for the advancement and welfare of the people.

There is no country in the civilized world that can be so largely benefited by a varied employment for labor as the United States, with her diversity of resources and unequaled natural advantages, with the skill, energy, and inventive genius of her people. Let it continue to be the settled policy of the Government to afford protection to all our industries and to labor, and thus develop the vast resources of the nation, which will call into action the skill, energy, and power of the people, and a degree of national advancement and national growth will be witnessed in the next quarter of a century unequaled in the history of the world. It is the destiny of this nation, under the beneficent influence of the policy of protection, to be first in agriculture, first in manufactures, first in prosperity, first in wealth, and first in civilization.

The foundation of the Republic rests upon the products of protected intelligent labor, and no American Congress should consent to weaken the structure by adopting free trade to furnish a market in this country for the industrial products of the Old World. From the course the discussion has taken on the part of the friends of the bill we are told that the tariff is the cause of all our national ailments, and that free trade or a horizontal reduction, which, when interpreted in the light of the statements of gentlemen on the floor of this House, means practically the same thing, is a national antidote for all our difficulties.

They seriously tell us that the tariff has closed the factories and workshops now idle; that it has turned laborers and mechanics out of employment and reduced them and their families to poverty and want; that it has caused an overproduction of American products and overstocked our markets; that it depreciates the price of labor, and at the same time increases the price of the articles of consumption; that it oppresses the farmer and helps the monopolist.

This is a strong arraignment; but what is most remarkable, the intelligent people of this country are asked to believe it. History proves that the tariff has not closed any workshops or factories or turned any laborers out of employment in this country. On the contrary, it has at all times bettered the condition of labor; it has afforded employment for labor at remunerative wages, and sustained the various industries. While there may be temporary suspension in some of the great industries through overproduction and from fear of the reduction of the tariff duties, it can not be attributed in any sense to the present tariff as the cause. A manufacturer may well suspend, and consider what the result of his investment in business is to be if the duties are to be so reduced as to enable foreign productions of the same class manufactured by the low-priced labor of the Old World to be placed in our markets in competition with the products of the better-paid American labor.

The free-trade policy proposed to be enacted into law has done more than anything else to bring about the stand-still condition alleged to exist in some of the industrial pursuits.

Thinking men doubt the future, and will continue to doubt as long as the agitation of the free-trade idea continues. The authors and supporters of this measure will be held responsible for the inevitable result which will follow. No appeal to the prejudice of any class can avert the verdict which the American people will surely render. The toiling millions are awakened in every section of the country, East, West, North, and South, to the danger that awaits their interests by even a temporary or partial success of the free-trade principles now sought to be established. The lessons of experience with revenue tariffs and free trade in this country are still fresh in the minds of the people and will continue to be for generations to come. They remember the impressive language of James Buchanan when in describing the results of a tariff for "revenue only" he said "the manufacturers and their laborers have been thrown out of employment, and the farmer out of a market;" while "dismay and desolation" are the terms used by Henry Clay in describing the same situation.

Certainly the people do not want a repetition of the condition described by these great statesmen. That American laborers are more intelligent, more independent, better clothed and provided for, have better homes, receive much larger compensation for labor, enjoy more fully the blessings of life than the laboring classes of free-trade England is a proposition which must be conceded and can not be denied. The superior condition of our laboring classes is a potent argument in favor of our protective policy. How was this condition of the laboring classes brought about and maintained? Certainly not by free trade; for we have been constantly under a protective policy since 1861.

At no time in the history of the country has labor been so well and constantly employed and generally well remunerated as under the protective policy of the past twenty years. Why should there be a change? There is but one answer, and that is the free-trade interests of the Old World want a market in America for their manufactured products. The logic of the argument in favor of this bill is that America should open wide her markets to the free importation of foreign products.

The startling announcement to the people of the country that it is better to allow foreign importations to take possession of and control our markets, our labor, our capital, and our industries than to control them ourselves will bring from 50,000,000 of people in the next election such an answer as will demonstrate to England that since American independence was declared she has ceased to dictate our commercial and industrial policy; that she can neither control our capital nor pauperize our labor; that this Government will dictate the terms upon which foreign merchandise can enter our markets to the extent of protecting the interests of the people, whatever they may be.

It is said that the tariff compels the people to pay more for some of the articles of consumption than they would cost in foreign markets under free trade, and illustrations have been given to sustain the statement. This is a plausible theory, based upon the difference in the cost of producing such commodities.

We all know that with the cheap labor of England many articles can be manufactured there cheaper than in this country. So the ingenious free-trader tells the people to make a calculation and see how much more it costs them for certain articles of consumption under protection than they would cost if we had free trade. Is the proposition true that the people can live cheaper, everything considered, under free trade than under protection? I think the answer is, manifestly, "no." Will our free-trade advocates control the prices of the articles of consumption when they have opened our markets to unlimited free importations to the destruction of our industries? Will not free-trade England take possession of and control our markets; will she not say to us that we may raise the food, produce the raw material; that she will manufacture the product and dictate to us the price? Will not the duty now paid on her merchandise imported to our markets go into the hands of British capitalists, so that England will gain by free trade what America must lose?

When the workshops and factories have been closed by the ruinous competition invited by free trade, the laborers turned out of employment, and their wives and children are without homes and food, will the free-trade capitalists tell them that the compensation for all this is that some of the articles of consumption are cheaper and that what they lose in being out of employment and destitute is placed to the credit of English capitalists? If our manufacturers are not to be sustained in their efforts to give employment to labor at remunerative wages the question arises, what is to be done with our skilled mechanics and laborers who have spent a lifetime at their trades and are unfitted to change their occupation? The free-trade answer is: "You must work for the wages paid foreign labor for similar work or seek such other employment as you can get." If our manufacturers, under free trade, attempt to compete with the pauper labor of Europe, will not our laborers have to accept a large reduction in their wages in order that the manufactured product shall not cost more than the same can be purchased for in the Old World? Such must be the logical result.

The effect of such a policy upon the laboring class may be better understood by making a comparison of American and foreign wages in one of the leading industries. The report of the Tariff Commission gives the following as the wages paid in England and Pittsburgh for manufacturing iron:

	England.	Pittsburgh.
Puddling, per ton	$1 94	$5 50
Shingling, per ton	29	77
Rolling in puddle-mill, per ton	29	68¾
Rolling and heating, per ton	1 80	4 80
Common labor	$0 56 to 0 62	$1 30 to 1 50

In a late visit to Pittsburgh, Mr. Casson, the general manager of the Earl of Dudley's Staffordshire iron-works, said:

I find that in many respects you have the advantage of us as regards mechanical appliances, while in others we are greatly ahead of your manufacturers. We can manufacture iron at just one-half the cost as far as the price of labor is concerned. I find that your rate of wages is about exactly double what we have to pay.

Abram S. Hewitt, United States commissioner to the Paris Exposition in 1867, in his report on iron and steel, said:

We have seen that the cost of making iron in England, Belgium, and France varies from $32.50 to $40 per ton, and $5 additional pays its transportation to our seaboard ports. At these same ports American iron can not be delivered at less than $60 in gold, against $40 for the foreign article, and the entire difference consists in the higher wages and not in the larger quantity of labor required for its production in the United States, where the physical, mental, and moral condition of the working classes occupy a different standard from their European confrères, and where wages can not be reduced without violating our sense of the just demands of human nature.

There are over eleven millions of people—men, women, and children—who are dependent upon labor at mines and manufactories, whose interests are involved in this issue. To the laboring classes let me say that the ballot is your remedy; that the ballot is your protection against the wrong of free trade; that the ballot guides and directs the general welfare of the people and the policy of the nation. We started poor one hundred years ago and without manufactories. Each industry struggled for its existence through uncertain legislation and want of capital. In a single century we have reached an annual product of the manufacturing and mechanical industries of about $6,000,000,000.

Can we not afford to continue under the policy that has produced so gratifying a result?

A PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS BETTER FOR THE FARMER THAN FREE TRADE.

The farming industry is one of the greatest sources of our nation's wealth. Its rapid, healthy growth and development from 1860 to 1880 under a protective tariff affords a satisfactory showing of the effects of protection upon agriculture. The following figures speak for themselves:

Subjects.	1860.	1880.
Value of farms	$3,271,575,426	$10,197,161,905
Wheat produced ....bushels...	173,104,924	498,549,868
Wheat exported ....do....	4,155,153	153,252,795
Corn produced....do....	838,792,742	1,717,434,543
Corn exported ....do....	3,314,305	98,169,877
Wool produced ....pounds...	60,264,913	232,500,000
Cotton produced ....bales...	3,826,086	6,343,269
Oats produced ....bushels...	172,643,185	407,858,999
Barley produced ....do....	15,825,898	44,113,495
Cheese exported ....pounds...	15,524,830	127,553,907
Hogs packed....number...	2,350,822	6,950,451
Improved lands ....acres...	163,110,720	287,211,845

The value of live-stock in 1860 was $1,107,500,000; in 1880, $5,000,000,000. The value of farm implements and machinery in 1860 was $246,000,000; in 1880, $900,000,000. The large advance indicated by these figures in farm productions and in farm property must be considered by every farmer as convincing proof against the free-trade cry of the friends of this bill. The farmers have been told in this debate by the champions of the measure that they have been wronged for more than twenty years by this protective policy; that protection is a tax upon the many for the benefit of the few.

Here let me say that the Republican party takes the responsibility of the tariff of 1861 and points with pride to the record made under its operations. I am willing to compare with our free-trade advocates the growth and development of the country for these twenty years under protection with any like period under free trade or a tariff for "revenue only," and by that record stand or fall on the question of protection. Let me refer the free-trade element of this House and of the country to the compromise tariff of 1833; to the tariff for revenue only of 1846; to free trade in 1857, and to the long train of disasters which followed, and ask them if they want the experience of those years repeated again in this century. In 1860 the nation was bankrupt; manufactories were closed, labor was unemployed, money was not to be had, the farmer was without a market; all this was the legitimate fruit of free trade.

We want no more free trade or tariff for "revenue only" in this country. What the people want, what the farmer in particular wants, is an American market for American productions, where the home products can be disposed of at once at a fair price. When we consider that about 90 per cent. of all farm products are consumed in the United States and that the best prices are always obtained at home, the farmer's interest in a market is shown to be largely at home and not abroad. He becomes interested at once in the success of American manufactories and in the remunerative employment of American labor. He must be convinced that he has a direct interest in the protection of labor and manufactures; that the protective policy is not for a special class in its operation, but for the general benefit of the whole people. The free-traders have no more toleration for the interests of the farmer than for the manufacturer or the mechanic. When he asks for protection on wool, one of the most valuable of farm products, he gets free trade.

There is no conflict between the interests of the farmer, the manufacturer, or the mechanic under our protective system, and the farming classes will not be deceived into opposition to protection by the free-trade tracts of the Cobden Club or by the efforts of the free-trade element on this floor. The farmer's interest is to build up and foster manufactories and labor. The more home consumption, the larger the home demand and the better home market he will have for his products, and the more remunerative will be his industry. The home market must be subject to the law of supply and demand, but there is always less liability to fluctuation in home than in foreign markets. The home market depends mainly on our own crops and welfare, while the markets abroad depend upon the crops and welfare of several countries. The farm and the factory are natural allies and neighbors.

The farmers nearest to the great mills and factories get the best prices for their produce. The cash value of the principal crops of Pennsylvania per acre is larger than that of any other State. This is because she has a large extent of good farming land, with her great manufacturing industries close at hand. Statistics show that the same principle is true of other States, that the value of farm products per acre is largest in manufacturing districts and States. It is estimated that the average price of farm products has increased in the last half century about 300 per cent., and that the average decrease in the price of our manufactured articles has been from 20 to 90 per cent. It is estimated that fourteen-fifteenths of the products of all our industries is consumed in this country and that only one-fifteenth is sold in foreign markets; foreign countries will only purchase of our farm products what they do not raise themselves. I think a candid consideration of the whole subject will fully satisfy the manufacturer, the laborer, the mechanic, the farmer, and the business man that the pending bill ought not to pass.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, addressed the committee. Before his time had expired,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, said: Will the gentleman give way for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I will, if it is understood that I do not lose my right to the floor when the consideration of this question is resumed.

The CHAIRMAN. It is so understood. The gentleman has thirty-seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAGLEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments the bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1106) for the relief of Francis H. Plummer; and

A bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument.

CLAIMS OF STATES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BARKSDALE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6867) to adjust claims of the States against the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS FOR PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. HOLMES. On behalf of a minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I desire to present at this time their views upon the bill (H. R. 6866) providing pensions for certain disabled soldiers and for certain widows of soldiers. This bill was reported by a majority of the committee as a substitue for House bill 1189 for pensioning prisoners of war who were confined in confederate military prisons during the late war. I ask that this report be placed on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The views of a minority of a committee do not go upon the Calendar; but they will be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—O'FERRALL VS. PAUL.

Mr. LOWRY. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, after the call of States, I propose to call up, on behalf of the Committee on Elections, the report in the contested-election case of O'Ferrall vs. Paul, from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I trust that will not be done, as the report of the majority of the committee was only filed on the day before yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] is merely made for information. It will be for the House to determine, when the matter is called up, whether it will proceed to the consideration of the question.

CATHARINE M'CARTY.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6868) for the relief of Catharine McCarty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. WILSON.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6869) referring the claim of William F. Wilson to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent that the testimony given by members of the Mississippi River Commission before the Select Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks, as the Chair understands, that the testimony be printed for the use of the committee?

Mr. KING. I would like to have copies printed also for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. VAN EATON. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the motion for a recess the Chair will lay before the House the personal request of a member.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Alex. Wishart, without leaving copies on file, there having been no adverse report.

RECEPTION OF SIAMESE EMBASSY.

Mr. HORR. There is a matter I would like to submit to the House from the Committee on Appropriations, because it is exceedingly important. I ask unanimous consent to have considered and passed at this time a joint resolution appropriating $10,000 to receive the embassy from Siam——

The SPEAKER. The hour for recess, 5 o'clock, has arrived.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session, which will be for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar. The House is now in recess till half past 7 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., resumed its session, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the House meets to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar under the order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under the special order just read. The Clerk will report the first bill.

C. A. CILLEY.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4856) granting a pension to Bvt. Col. C. A. Cilley, of North Carolina, be first taken up. It is not the first bill on the Calendar, but the one immediately preceding it I apprehend will give rise to some considerable discussion. I ask that this be taken up in order to accommodate the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. VANCE.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place the name of C. A. Cilley, of North Carolina, late a major and assistant adjutant-general of United States Volunteers, and brevet colonel of United States Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, this case is one that was considered the other night and passed over because it did not appear that it was a case which had been rejected at the Pension Office. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is ready, he informs me, to show that this has been done by the officer. The report in the case has already been read.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, which I ask to have read from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1884.

SIR: In response to your personal request, I have the honor to state in reference to the claim of Clinton A. Cilley, that it appears that some of the original papers which were filed with the Committee on Invalid Pensions have been mislaid. From the printed copies of those papers and from such papers as are on file with the case, it clearly appears that the claim is inadmissible under the general law and must be rejected by this office. The testimony of Dr. Scroggs shows that the claimant's present disability did not appear until after his discharge, and consequently its origin in service is impossible of proof.

Very respectfully,

O. P. G. CLARKE, Acting Commissioner.

Hon. R. B. VANCE,
House of Representatives, present.

Mr. VANCE. I have also a sworn statement from Colonel Cilley which I have received since action was taken upon his case on last Friday night. I will state that he makes oath that he was injured at Chickamauga. He had two horses shot from under him while in action. When the second horse was shot it fell upon his leg, which was considerably injured, and he thinks it is probably due to that cause that sciatic trouble subsequently ensued. He served until the 1st day of September, 1866, when he was discharged from the Army. At that time he seemed to be in good health and so believed himself to be. After that period, however, his trouble came on. I will state that Colonel Cilley is a man of very high character, so much so that he was appointed a judge in our State. His disease is reported to be incurable, and he asks only this small favor at the hands of this Government, which he served so well.

I hope that there will be no objection to the passage of this bill. If any one wishes to have the affidavit read it can be read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. VANCE. Very well; I will ask that it take that course.

The affidavit is as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA,
Caldwell County:

Personally appeared before me, M. E. Shell, clerk of the suprerior court of said county, Clinton A. Cilley, and makes oath that from and after the summer of 1863 he was never on duty with the regiment to which he originally belonged, as he was detached to serve as a staff-officer, and therefore is unable to call on any of the medical or line officers of said regiment to make any statements as to his physical condition, they being the parties named in the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions dated February 20, 1884.

That he served until September 1, 1866, leaving the service in Raleigh, N. C., at which time he seemed to be and fully believed himself to be a perfectly sound and healthy man.

That he was not at any time in the hospital while in the Army, and, save for trifling ailments, never had medical attendance.

That he is therefore entirely unable to give or procure any testimony as to his having contracted his present disease while in the service of the United States.

But soon after his retirement from the Army his neuralgic and rheumatic symptoms began and have ever since continued. He has been advised and assured by many physicians that these symptoms and the incurable disease which now affects him are due to exposure and hard work in the Army from May, 1861, to September, 1866. It may be that an injury, believed by him at the time to be slight, and for which he never asked for a prescription, has been the exciting cause of the sciatic trouble he labors under. At Chickamauga, Ga., on Sunday, September 20, 1863, his second horse was killed under him, and in falling pinned him to the ground, where he remained for a while. The left leg, caught under the horse, was lame for a little space. The sciatica commenced therein.

While fully persuaded that his disease grew out of his army service, yet the impossibility of sustaining his belief by testimony caused him to instruct Messrs. R. S. & A. P. Lacey, his attorneys, of Washington, D. C., to abandon his pension claim before the Commissioner. The same impossibility makes him unable, although needing the allowance asked for, to say more than he has already said in support of his application.

CLINTON A. CILLEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, April 29, 1884.

[SEAL.] M. E. SHELL, Clerk Superior Court.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5004) for the relief of William B. Smith.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally. It is a case I know nothing about, and the gentleman who reported it is not present to night.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CATHERINE TERRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2447) for the relief of Catherine Terry.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Catherine Terry, the widow of Michael Terry, late a private in Company A, One hundred and eighteenth New York Volunteers, upon the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, her claim, No. 226390, having been rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions heretofore; said pension to commence from the date of the death of her said husband.

The report is as follows:

Mr. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 2447):

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 2447, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

Mitchell Terry, husband of the petitioner, was mustered into the service of the United States August 24, 1864, in Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, to serve for three years or the war.

On the 29th day of September following, at the battle of Chapin's Farm, Virginia, he received a gunshot wound in the lower part of his body, in front, the ball passing out on the back side, which greatly disabled him from laboring or traveling.

The certificate of disability for discharge shows that he was admitted to hospital October 17, 1864, with injury to the neck of the bladder from gunshot wound in pubic region, received in skirmish at Chapin's Farm, Virginia, at date as above stated. For his disability the soldier received a pension of $8 per month.

Soon after his death the petitioner filed a claim for pension, alleging that the cause of death was traceable directly to the wound received in the service.

The Pension Office rejected the claim on the ground that the fatal disease of which the soldier died originated after his discharge, and was not a result of any disease contracted or injury received in the service.

The evidence of the physicians who attended the soldier during his last illness, the committee think, points unmistakably to the fact that he died of blood-poisoning, due entirely to the gunshot wound.

Dr. Orville Terry says that the soldier was injured in the service by a wound in the groin, which, after the war, broke out into sores in and about the groin, and affecting his private organs, and, as deponent understands, affecting the passage of the water. Deponent further says that he did not see the patient after the discharging sores dried up, professionally, but was consulted by Dr. J. D. Woodworth, who attended him in his last sickness, and the doctor gave it as his opinion that, the discharge having stopped, blood-poisoniug would ensue, and as a consequence death. About this time the soldier began to be affected by disease of the lungs, and that continued to increase upon him down to his death. Affiant was familiar with the general health of the soldier and his constitutional tendencies, and from what he knew of his wound and its condition before the discharges were stopped has no doubt whatever but that said Mitchell Terry died from the effect of blood-poisoning, caused by the absorption of pus after the discharge ceased, and that in consequence disease of the lungs was produced and death.

Dr. J. D. Woodworth, in an affidavit before the Pension Office examiner, says that he was well acquainted with Mitchell Terry, and was his family physician, and knows that his death was caused by a wound in the groin; he died of pyæmia, absorption of pus, producing lung fever, said pus coming from the wound.

It is quite evident to your committee that this man's death was due to the wound received in the service, and that the widow has a good title to a pension. The committee therefore recommend the passage of House bill 2447 with the following amendments: Strike out all after the word "pension-roll," in line 6, and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. WHITCOMB.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to William H. Whitcomb.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Whitcomb, late a private in Company M, Fifth New York Cavalry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to William H. Whitcomb, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner was enrolled on the 1st day of October, 1861, in Company M, Fifth Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, and was honorably discharged at Winchester, Va., on the 19th day of July, 1865.

In a charge upon the enemy at Harrisonburgh, Va., his horse was shot under him and another horse fell upon him, seriously injuring his side, from the effects of which he has never recovered. Also at Parker's Store, in Virginia, he received a gunshot wound in the neck on the left side, and again in an engagement at Buckland Mills, in a charge, he was caught and thrown between two trees and his right knee severely injured. His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground of no disability since discharge.

O. W. Armstrong, M. D., late surgeon Fifth New York Cavalry, testifies as follows:

"That the claimant, on or about October 19, 1863, at Buckland Mills, Va., while in line of duty, and during an engagement with the enemy, was injured in his right knee by being forced, while mounted, against a tree, receiving a contused wound of said knee; that on the 5th day of May, 1864, during the battle of the Wilderness, he received a gunshot wound in the left side of the neck, passing through the skin and sterno-mastoid muscle; was treated by me for the said wound, being dressed as required, but not sent to hospital."

Justice Travis and William H. Bogardus, comrades, testify that they were members of Company M, Fifth New York Cavalry, from the fall of 1861 to December, 1863; that William H. Whitcomb was a member of said company during all this time; that they knew of said Whitcomb being wounded by being shot in the neck while in the line of duty, at Parker's Store, in Virginia, and of his being injured by a horse falling on him in a charge on the enemy at Harrisonburgh, Va., on the 6th day of May, 1862, and of his being injured in the right leg and knee at Buckland Mills, Va., in the summer of 1863, by being caught and thrown against two trees, in a charge. And the said Travis says that he was present and attended the soldier in the hospital at Winchester, Va.

Amos H. White testifies that he was first lieutenant and captain of Company D; major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of the Fifth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, and knows the petitioner, who was a member of Company M, of same regiment. That on the 6th May, 1862, the soldier was present with his company on duty; that in an engagement with the enemy's cavalry under Ashby, near Harrisonburgh, Va., his horse was shot, falling on and injuring him. That in an engagement at Buckland Mills, Va., October 19, 1863, said soldier was present on duty; that the nature of the ground on which the battle was fought was rough and partly wooded that in one of the many charges made on the enemy said soldier was injured. That on the 5th day of May, 1864, at the battle of the Wilderness, Virginia, near Parker's Store, Whitcomb was present and in command of his company during the battle, which raged all day, and was shot in the neck. The colonel also says that this soldier repeatedly distinguished himself, and for meritorious service he was promoted to second lieutenant of Company K, May 2, 1864, and first lieutenant of Company L, November 14, 1864. During the entire war he served with credit to himself and honor to his country.

J. Jewell, M. D., examining surgeon, says:

"In my opinion the said William H. Whitcomb is total, third grade, incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. Judging from his present condition, and from the evidence before me, it is my belief that the disability did originate in the service, in the line of duty. The disability is permanent."

The splendid record of this soldier, shown by the commendation of his superior officer, the many wounds he received, and the faithfulness of his service, recommend him to your committee as worthy of a pension, and they therefore ask the passage of the accompanying bill with the following amendment: After the word "cavalry," in line 7, add the following: "and pay him a pension of $8 a month."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a question in reference to this matter. The committee state—

That the splendid record of this soldier, shown by the commendation of his superior officer, the many wounds he received, and the faithfulness of his service recommend him to your committee as worthy of a pension.

If it is placed upon the wounds that he received, and he is disabled by those wounds, it is a case undoubtedly where relief should be granted. But while the closing words of the report make that statement it is not apparent that the pension is granted upon the ground of disability.

Mr. MATSON. The report states that the record of the soldier, the many wounds he received, and his gallant services, recommended him to the committee as worthy of a pension. But it is on account of what the committee believe to be his disability that we granted the pension. I will state to the gentleman from Alabama that in this case there appears to have been some disagreement among the surgeons. Some were of the opinion that there was no disability while others thought the disability entitled him to a pension of $24 per month. The Committee on Invalid Pensions in considering the matter thought it proper under all the circumstances to compromise on $8 per month, the amount recommended in the bill.

Mr. BAGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the few pension bills which I have introduced during this session of Congress. I believe I have introduced but three. But with this man I am personally acquainted. I know the fact of his disability. He is unable to do any but the lightest kind of work, and his condition has been such that it has been customary to appoint him as town constable, or on the special police force, or some such light employment, to enable him to support his family. He is a man who is entitled to the respect of all who know him. He did valiant service during the war, and that he is disabled I know personally. I know that he can not earn his living by manual labor, and it would be a very unjust thing to refuse to grant the pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let me ask why the committee do not recommend that he be placed upon the pension-rolls subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws?

Mr. MATSON. Because, as I have said, there was a difference or disagreement between the surgeons, and we compromised on the amount fixed in the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Would it not have been better to leave the rating of the pension to the office?

Mr. MATSON. The committee thought not in this case, where there was a disagreement. Under the circumstances the committee believed it was their duty to take cognizance of the matter and fix the rating, inasmuch as the Pension Office could not have done it under the law in consequence of this disagreement.

Mr. BAGLEY. I will state to the gentleman the object was that this man should get a pension, and for the very reason the chairman of the committee has stated. One of the surgeons claims there is no disability, as is reported by the Pension Office, and the other one says he is disabled, third grade.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. While I do not propose to oppose this bill, I wish to say it is a little out of the regular order for the House to rate the disability. We ordinarily put persons on the pension-roll subject to the provisions of the pension law. Then the disability is rated by a board of surgeons; and it seems to me that they are much more capable of rating the disability of a man than Congress possibly can be.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CATHARINE HENRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2425) granting a pension to Catharine Henry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine Henry, widow of Hiram Henry, late a private in Company F, Sixty-first New York Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of ——.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with an amendment to strike out all after the word "volunteers."

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

We find that the petitioner is the widow of Hiram Henry, who was a private in Company F, Sixty-first Regiment New York Volunteers; that he enlisted on the 13th of January, 1864, and was discharged July 22, 1865; that at the battle of Cold Harbor, June 9, 1864, he was wounded by a gunshot in the right arm. He was pensioned for the injury from March 23, 1868, at $4 per month, increased April 21, 1869, to $6 per same, reduced to $4 March 4, 1870, increase rejected May 17, 1870, disability reported ceased to exist June 17, 1871, was readmitted to the pension-rolls for same injury November 19, 1872, and received pension from that time up to his death.

Your committee find that during the lifetime of the deceased soldier he was frequently examined by examining surgeons of the Pension Office. In October, 1872, one of these surgeons reported, "Claimant has a gunshot wound of the right arm, in consequence of which his arm is weak and partially atrophied, and that to the best of the surgeon's knowledge and belief he is subject to frequent attacks of traumatic neuralgia radiating from the wounds along the branches of the musculo-spiral nerve and even involving the whole cervical plexus, and that he is therefore almost totally disabled from manual labor." From 1872 up to the time of his death the biennial examination shows him suffering more or less from the wound in his arm, and the petitioner alleges that from the effect of the wound he died. The Pension Office rejected the claim upon her applying for a pension, the cause of rejection being stated that the death cause was in no way incident to the wound or injury he had received in the service.

This case seems to have had a good deal of consideration at the hands of the medical officers of the Pension Office, and the rejection is based altogether upon the decision rendered by those officers. Your committee find that these medical officers had corresponded extensively with the family physician of the deceased, who was in attendance upon him at the time of his death. The home doctor gives in extenso the manner in which the deceased was affected and the manner in which he died. This is an affidavit sworn to on the 23d of April, 1879. On the 21st of October, 1879, the same physician, in response to letters from the medical officers of the Pension Office, again gives a description of the case. We quote:

"There is no doubt whatever in my mind, as I can not question it, that Hiram Henry came to his death by disease and injury sustained while a soldier in the service of the Government of the United States. By disease, I mean the pain he complained of in the back of his neck, extending from toward cervical section to base of the brain. This complaint was made to myself and others as being a source of great annoyance to him from the day he was wounded in the Army, i. e., at intervals. It was chronic when my attention was called to him, but acute before his death, a day or two previous to which he said that the pain in his neck and lower part of the head was unbearable. Unquestionably true! Now, then, take the remainder of his complaining; not only the pain and aching from the wound in the arm extending from the back of neck, commencing at the time he received the wound, increasing in severity at intervals as time passed along, it became unbearable before death ensued, as was said to doctors and others, and what can I say but that his death was the cropping out and fatal result of disease contracted and injuries sustained? Look at the contortion of his body before death for many hours. Elbow and upper arm drawn backward and upward, the head drawn back, neck stiff, having apparently no control of the upper arm and shoulder; and I can not but believe that death was the result of the disease he had complained of."

The physician continues his argument in like strain, and in view of the statement of the surgeon in 1872 it would seem to your committee that the nerve and muscular troubles which preceded death and were finally the cause thereof were a continuation of the same trouble which seemed to exist when the surgeon made an examination of the disease in 1872.

Taking the history of the case as portrayed by the evidence and the fact that one or two of the examining surgeons indicate that there was gangrene left in the wound, it shows to the mind of your committee a continuous disability existing from the time of the healing of the wound received in the arm up to the time of his death. This opinion is affirmed altogether from a perusal of the evidence.

In view of the facts as stated and the positive opinion expressed by the medical attendant of the deceased soldier as to the manner of his death, and the belief that it proceeded from a disease contracted from a wound received in service, your committee are constrained to believe that the death-cause in this case was due to the injury received in the service, and, as such, advise that the petitioner is properly entitled to the benefits of the pension laws. We therefore report favorably upon her petition, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 2425) granting a pension to Catharine Henry with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "volunteer," in line 7.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET KEARNS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2480) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Kearns, mother of James Kearns, late a sergeant of Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Infantry.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner is the mother of James Kearns, who was first sergeant, Company G, Ninety-fourth New York Volunteers.

Surgeon-General reports First Sergeant James Kearns, Company G, Ninety-fourth Regiment New York Infantry, was admitted to field hospital, third division, Fifth Army Corps, July 15, 1864, for treatment for gunshot wound of arm, fracture. Arm amputated on the field at shoulder-joint; soldier died July 20, 1864. Surgeon D. C. Chamberlain makes similar report. It is therefore evident that Kearns died five days after receiving wounds in the service. The place of death was Petersburg, Va.

The mother filed her application for pension May 28, 1868; her husband was then living, but it is shown that he was seriously disabled by rheumatism, although earning some money as a watchman. The Pension Office rejected the application on the ground that she was not dependent upon her son at his death.

The principal evidence to show the contrary is that of friends and neighbors, who, under oath, declare that they knew of the depending of the mother upon the son prior to enlistment.

Catharine Barry swears that she was an acquaintance of James Kearns from childhood, and that they associated together, and that up to and since the enlistment of James was a frequent visitor at the house of Kearns and familiar with their resources and means of living; that James made his home with his parents, and after he became old enough to work was steady and industrious, and worked regularly for the support of his father and mother, and that all of his wages, except such as he needed for his personal clothing, was used in support of his mother and the family. He was very prudent in his clothing, and spent but little of his wages for that purpose; it is also related that he was very affectionate toward his mother and was greatly attached to her, and always evinced a disposition to do all in his power to make her comfortable and happy.

Another witness says that James's wages went to the support of his mother and the family as regularly and uniformly as is common with the head of a family; that he was known to buy for his mother a shawl, shoes, and other clothing, and the same for a younger sister, who was dependent in the family. Since the death of the son the family has had an insufficient and meager support from what the father earned as a watchman. The father died in 1875, and she has now no means except what she gets from her own labor and the help of the younger children. Several affidavits similar to the above are on file, made in 1870, all showing the petitioner's dependence upon the son. It is also in evidence that Kearns sent money several times to his mother while he was in the Army.

The committee are of the opinion that the fact of the mother's dependence is sufficiently shown to warrant the conclusion that in his death she lost her main support. Moreover she is getting old, and is very needy. Believing that she has a good title to a pension, the passage of bill H. R. 2480 is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. SARAH SINFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1042) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Sinfield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Sinfield, of Dunkirk, N. Y., for services rendered by her during the war of the rebellion in the Third Excelsior.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The career of the petitioner, Sarah Sinfield, her adventures, her devotion to the cause of the Union, and her untiring exertions in behalf of soldiers of the late war are quite sufficient to make a romance.

Her husband, William Sinfield, volunteered as a private in Company E, Seventy-second Regiment New York Volunteers, at Dunkirk, N. Y., in April, 1861, and went from there to Staten Island in May following. About the 20th of July, 1861, Captain Barrett, of the company of which her husband was a member, left Dunkirk to join his company, and upon her request and that of her husband, took her with him. The day after her arrival at Staten Island the regiment left for Washington, and she accompanied it.

From Washington she followed the regiment, and was with it at the battles of Williamsburg, Peach Orchard, Fair Oaks, Seven Pines, the seven days' fight, the second battle of Malvern Hills, the second battle of Bull Run, the second battle of Manassas, the battles of Chantilly, of Fredericksburg, of Chancellorsville, and of Gettysburg.

At each and every one of these battles she aided in caring for the sick and wounded soldiers, carrying food and drink to those who could not help themselves, preparing bandages for wounds, and in many and various ways making herself useful, and putting up with such accommodations as were furnished soldiers. At no time was she absent from the regiment until after her husband was wounded and sent to the hospital for treatment, but endured all the fatigue and hardships of a soldier's life in camp and on the march.

After her husband was wounded at Gettysburg he was removed to Fort Smith hospital, Rhode Island, where she accompanied him, and was there employed by the head nurse as an assistant, and served in that capacity for about ten months, receiving as compensation $3 a week.

Her husband was discharged in May, 1864, and she went home with him to Dunkirk, N. Y., having been nearly three years in actual attendance on the regiment and company, excepting the time spent at Fort Smith.

The following, written by Mrs. J. L. Husband, Third Corps hospital matron, Sanitary Commission, shows the esteem in which she was held; it was given to her as she was about to leave the scene of operations to go to Fort Smith hospital:

"The bearer, Mrs. Sinfield, is, with her wounded husband, endeavoring to make her way to a place of comfort. She is a most worthy and useful person, and has been a mother to her regiment. The boys all love and respect her, and here her assistance has been most valuable among the wounded. All who can assist them in their progress will be doing a real kindness to most deserving people."

Captain Toomey, of Company E, certifies that she followed the regiment from the battle of Bull Run until the battle of Gettysburg, and rendered valuable assistance in the care of the wounded, and, in his opinion, has rendered services in camp and field fully entitling her to recognition by Government.

A paper signed by C. K. Abell, major Seventy-second Regiment, N. J. Jackson, brigadier and brevet major-general United States Volunteers, and twenty-three officers and privates of the Seventy-second Regiment, states that she marched with the regiment and rendered great assistance, and that her presence and worth were of incalculable value to the sick and wounded soldiers.

The exposure and fatigue incident to the camp and the march injured her health. She is now 59 years of age. Her husband is a cripple, but receives a pension of ——. This goes but a little way toward supporting them, and they are in indigent circumstances. Naturally and logically she believes that her devotion and services to the cause of the Union entitle her to some recognition from the Government. There is no law allowing her a pension, but there are precedents for special acts of Congress. The committee think this a case for such action, and, so believing, recommend the passage of the bill.

The committee desire to state, in addition to the foregoing, that Mrs. Sinfield received no compensation while with the regiment in the field.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE VAN NORTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4189) granting a pension to Caroline Van Norton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Van Norton, widow of Jacob Van Norton, late a private in Company K, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner alleges that her husband, Jacob Van Norton, contracted the disability of which he died while in the service and line of duty, as follows:

About July 4, 1863, he started on a forced march from Frederick, Md., and arrived at South Mountain, where he encamped for the night, sleeping in the wet grass, without fire or shelter, from which he took a severe cold, followed by diarrhea and disease of liver, and was sent to hospital August 25, 1863.

Adjutant-General reports him wounded in action May 10, 1864, and in general hospital. September 17, 1863, admitted to Carver Hospital, convalescent from fever; furloughed October 19, 1863, for sixty days; returned December 18, 1863. Entered Emory General Hospital, Washington, D. C., from the field with gunshot wound of left hand, received at Spottsylvania May 15, 1864, and was transferred May 27, 1864. Entered general hospital, Chester, Pa., May 26, 1864, with gunshot wound of left hand, and was furloughed July 22, 1864, and returned to duty January 20, 1865.

Nathan F. Peck, lieutenant, says that he served with the soldier and was sergeant, and called the rolls, and knows that Jacob Van Norton contracted chronic diarrhea and disease of liver about July 4, 1863, at or near South Mountain, Md., while in the line of his duty; that he did not recover while he was in the service; that he has been acquainted with him since his discharge, and that he continues to be affected with chronic diarrhea and in feeble condition, with a countenance indicating disease of liver.

E. H. Elliott, M. D., testifies that he was the family physician of the soldier; that he was a healthy man at the time of enlistment, and free from chronic diarrhea or disease of liver; that after his discharge affiant treated him for said diseases, which in the opinion of affiant were contracted while in the Army.

Nathan P. Johnson, M. D., testifies that he has been acquainted with the soldier since the spring of 1869; that he attended him in his last sickness; that he was affected with liver complaint and heart disease; that he died April 14, 1869.

J. H. Helms, examining surgeon, certifies that he examined the soldier July 25, 1868, and reports that he had chronic diarrhea for nine months while in the service, and has had frequent attacks since, followed by extreme constipation; has a serious liver difficulty beyond any doubt to his mind. His general health bad, and he is unable to do any labor.

The standing and professional ability of the physicians who testify is shown to be good.

From the evidence presented it is quite apparent that the soldier contracted a disease in the service which caused his death. The record of service shows that he enlisted October 1, 1862, as a private in Company A, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment, New York Volunteers, and was discharged June 26, 1865. His death occurred April 14, 1869. The widow's application was filed June 16, 1871, and was rejected on the ground that the death was not caused by disease contracted in the service.

As the evidence seems to point to the contrary, and as the widow is needy, your committee believe she should have a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 4189, which places her on the rolls subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JANE BRACKEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4191) granting a pension to Jane Bracken.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane Bracken, mother of Robert G. Bracken, late a private in Company K, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner is the mother of Robert G. Bracken, late a private in Company K, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery. Bracken was mustered into the service on the 22d day of August, 1862, and was discharged on May 23, 1865. He received a gunshot wound in the hip at the battle of Cold Harbor, Va., and was treated in De Camp United States hospital for the same. He was transferred, according to the certificate of disability, to general hospital at Rochester, N. Y., from whence he was discharged at the date above stated. He received for his disability a pension of $5.33½ per month. According to the evidence of the physicians he suffered constantly and severely from his wound, and to that extent that his mind became impaired, and finally resulted in his committing suicide by hanging. The mother claims the pension, alleging that this result was occasioned by the suffering from his wound, but the Pension Office rejected the claim on the ground "that soldier's death from suicide was not a result of his military service."

It seems, however, that when he went home from the hospital the wound, which was partially healed, broke out in two or three places. Dr. Nickerson, a family physician, was called and attended him about three or four weeks, when Dr. Sanford was called in consultation. The patient kept his bed for seven weeks, and was lifted from and to it on a blanket. Dr. Nickerson probed the wound for the ball, but the pain was so intense that the soldier could not endure it, and so the attempt was abandoned and the ball remained. In about three months he was so far recovered as to return to David's Island and rejoin his company, but in a short time the wound again suppurated, and two pieces of bone were extracted. At this time he was taken to Saint Mary's Hospital, Rochester, N. Y. From there, as before stated, he went home, but was in continued pain, unable to perform any manual labor, and at times gave way to tears from the distress occasioned by the wound. There were occasions when he seemed to act insanely.

Dr. Randall, examining surgeon, testifies to the character of the wound and the fact of the ball remaining, of the pain suffered by the soldier, of his being very lame, and states in addition that the soldier was not as well as at a prior examination.

Dr. Nickerson states that he believes the condition of the soldier's mind, which caused him to take his own life, was due largely to the effect of the wound upon his system.

William Shaw testifies that previous to 1869 and up to June of that year soldier had so far recovered as to be able to walk without a crutch, but at this point was taken sick, which so affected his wounded hip that when he again got about he was unable to walk without crutches, and he continued to use crutches until his death. During this period he was easily irritated and seemed to have little control over his actions. On the 28th of July, 1869, something occurred at the dinner-table that annoyed him, and he arose and left the house. His mother shortly after found him in the barn hanging by the neck; life was extinct.

It is apparent that this man was a great sufferer, and that the constant pain he endured, with consequent loss of rest, made life a burden to him. He became depressed and despondent, and sought refuge in suicide, so common to the distracted mind. The wound he received in battle was undoubtedly the irritating cause, and it is difficult to arrive at any other conclusion.

The mother is old, infirm, and poor; she has lost her support. To keep her from the almshouse she asks Congress for help. Your committee believe it should be granted, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill accompanying.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MAGDALENA COOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5089) for the relief of Magdalena Cook.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and conditions of the pension laws, the name of Magdalena Cook, widow of Jacob Cook, late a private in Company B, Thirty-third Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The petitioner, Magdalena Cook, widow of Jacob Cook, late private in Company B, Thirty-third Regiment, New Jersey Volunteers, filed her claim for pension on account of the death of her husband December 19, 1879. He was enlisted in the service on the 17th day of August, 1863, at Newark, N. J., for three years, or the war, in the company and regiment as above stated, and the papers show that he was honorably discharged on June 30, 1865. The Pension Office rejected her claim on the ground that the soldier's fatal disease (gangrene of lungs, from pneumonia) is not shown to have originated in or to have been the result of his military service.

The following statements and affidavits as to soundness and good health prior to enlistment, and also as to his disabled condition after discharge from the service, are presented as the history of the case:

Capt. James R. Sanford, of Company B, says:

"That soldier was wounded in the face at the battle of Rocky Face Ridge, Georgia, May, 1864. He was a healthy and sound man when he enlisted."

James Warner, second lieutenant of company, says:

"That soldier was a sound man at the time of enlistment; that he became disabled by exposure and hard marching to and from Lookout Valley to Knoxville, Tenn.; he had no shoes on, and complained of swollen feet; that after the march as above many of the company were suffering from colds and fatigue, and the medical attendance was poor."

Frank J. Sturn, sergeant of Company B, says:

"That Cook was placed upon sick-list on return of company from march to and from Knoxville, September 10, 1863; to Peach Tree Creek, 1864, and Kenesaw Mountain, June, 1864; he suffered from colds caused by exposure and hard and severe marching. Medical attendance was very poor."

Samuel Snape says:

"Saw soldier after he came home from the Army and when he was in Soldiers' Home; he was a poor-looking object; he was perfectly broken down in health, coughing badly, and continued in that condition to time of his death; he never improved in health after his return from the service, but broke steadily; he was apparently healthy when he went to the war."

Affidavits by other persons are made substantiating the foregoing facts. A misfortune attending the case is that the physician who attended the soldier died before the widow's application was filed, and hence that valuable evidence is not in the case. The attendants, however, state that Dr. Eshling treated the soldier for gangrene of lungs, from which cause he died. The conclusion is that exposure on the damp ground and hardships attending the marches so weakened his system, and particularly his lungs, that it produced the disease of which he died.

The widow is reported to be in necessitous circumstances, and is advanced in years, and can not maintain herself. The committee think she is entitled to the relief asked, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

APOLLINE A. BLAIR.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (H. R. 2984) granting arrears of pension to Apolline A. Blair, widow of the late General Francis P. Blair. It is on page 33 of the Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to understand what is the gentleman's request.

Mr. MATSON. This is the first bill that was called to-night. At my request it was passed over to await the arrival of some of our friends who have now arrived. The passing over of the bill was a mere matter of personal accommodation.

Mr. STEELE. I raise the question of consideration on that bill.

Mr. MATSON. I suppose after a bill has been passed over by unanimous consent it requires unanimous consent to return to it. It is a matter of mere personal accommodation. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] will not insist on objecting to the consideration of the bill. When it was first called I asked that it should be passed over owing to the temporary absence of some gentlemen who take an interest in the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I do not think that the bill having been passed over informally loses its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I submit that no unanimous consent is required to take up that bill now; it was simply passed over temporarily in order to accommodate some of the members of the Missouri delegation. I submit that we have a right to go back to that bill now that the members of that delegation are present.

Mr. STEELE. I had understood that the proposition of the bill was to give a pension of $5,000 a year. I understand now that I have been misinformed. I therefore withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Apolline A. Blair, widow of Francis P. Blair, late a major-general in the United States Army, arrears of pension as provided by the acts of Congress known as the acts for the payment of arrears of pensions, and for other purposes, approved January 25, 1879, and March 4, 1879, so that said Apolline A. Blair shall receive a sum equal to $30 per month for every month from ——, the date when her late husband was mustered out of the service, as shown by the evidence on file in the Pension Department, till July 9, 1875, the date of his death.

The bill was reported by Mr. FYAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the words "United States Army," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The sum of $5,000, in compensation for money and time expended by General Francis P. Blair in enlisting men and organizing troops for United States armies; and that hereafter said Apolline A. Blair receive, in lieu of other pension, the sum of $50 per month."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to have the bill read as it will be if amended in the way recommended by the committee.

The bill was read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order on that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This evening has been set apart for the consideration of pension bills. I make the point of order that this is really not a pension bill. It is both for a claim and a pension. The $5,000 is not a pension. From the reading of the bill it appears that it is not proposed to give that sum to this lady as a pension, but to give it to her as a compensation for the services of her husband. It is a claim and not a pension; and I submit that the bill is not in order to-night, under the order of the House for this evening session.

Mr. MATSON. Perhaps in connection with the discussion of the point of order I may as well state the history of this bill. It has been reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with an amendment. As originally introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] it provided that Mrs. Blair should receive arrears of pension. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, in accordance with its uniform policy upon that question, decided against giving arrears. It was insisted during the discussion that General Blair had sacrificed his entire fortune and had spent a great deal of money in the cause of the Union at the very outbreak of the war in organizing troops, and to some extent preventing the secession of the State of Missouri, and that the spending of that money had so impoverished him that he had left his widow without anything, and that she was therefore entitled to some consideration.

During the discussion of the question it was suggested in this bill she could be made whole and compensation should be given to her. Therefore it was reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions giving her $5,000 for compensation for money expended by her husband. It was determined by the committee as in every other case in reference to the widow of a general officer when it was asked to increase her pension from $30 to $50 a month. This is the history of the case, and the bill was so reported.

As to whether or not this is a pension bill, coming directly to the point of order, it seems to me it must be clear to the Chair this bill provides a pension for Mrs. Blair, and is therefore a pension bill. All pension bills are not alike. Some provide a specific sum of money. Others provide a pensioner after being dropped shall be restored to the rolls. Others provide for increase of pension. A great many provide the name of the pensioner shall be placed on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws. This is essentially a pension bill, because it provides for a pension. It is a pension bill in the parliamentary meaning of the term, because it has been reported by one of the pension committees of the House. The House gave the Committee on Invalid Pensions jurisdiction of this particular bill, and that committee has reported it back with an amendment. It must be apparent to the gentleman from Alabama this is not taken out of the special order allowing pension bills to be considered in these evening sessions.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. What else beside pension does it provide?

Mr. MATSON. It provides compensation for money expended by her husband in organizing troops.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. Not for arrears of pension?

Mr. MATSON. No; we do not give arrears of pensions.

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow me?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BURNES. I think we can settle the point of order by reference to the order of the House. It is as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

This is a bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and of course comes within the terms of that special order. So it must be decided the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am satisfied under that order of the House, which I did not think was as general as it is, the point of order can not be sustained. This bill certainly has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I therefore withdraw the point of order. I believe, however, it is a bill which should not be considered at this time.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that $5,000 of the bill should have been referred to the Committee on War Claims. It has nothing to do with pensions or arrears of pensions. It is a claim for money expended. We are not told how much is for services and how much for money expended.

Mr. MORGAN. Even if the point of order is a good one it comes too late. It should have been made at the time the bill was referred.

Mr. BAGLEY. This lady has made no claim for $5,000, but under the circumstances the committee think this is the best way in which to provide compensation to her for the services and expenditure of her husband. I do not understand how it should have gone to the Committee on War Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana does not submit any point of parliamentary law, but merely a question of fact, and under the order of the House which has been read the matter of fact is clearly in favor of the bill.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2984) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Apolline A. Blair, widow of the late Maj. Gen. Francis P. Blair, would report as follows:

They have had the subject under consideration, and find that by act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, Mrs. Apolline A. Blair, widow as aforesaid, was placed on the pension-list.

Your committee do not deem it advisable to establish a precedent by granting arrearages of pension as asked for in the bill, but, in view of the invaluable services rendered the Government by General Blair, your committee are very strongly of the opinion some compensation ought to be made to his widow, and give the following reasons:

That at the commencement of the late war General Francis P. Blair resided in the State of Missouri; that the citizens of that State were divided in sentiment on the issues of the war, but that the executive and other State officers, as well as a majority of the Legislature, were in sympathy with the confederacy. The Legislature of that State had pased a law, and the executive officers were endeavoring to enforce it, which looked to the disarming of Union men. No officers could be commissioned nor troops legally enlisted for United States service under the laws as they were enacted by those in authority in that State. In that emergency Frank P. Blair gave up all his time to recruiting and enlisting men and organizing troops for the Federal armies. To that end he expended large sums of his own money, for which he never demanded or received a cent in return from the Government of the United States.

That he served with great gallantry and heroism all through the war. That, although holding many high civil and military positions in the Government, he died a poor man, which is one of the many evidences testifying to the sterling honesty and integrity so characteristic of the man.

Your committee are assured from the number of letters received from prominent citizens of all parties and different sections of the country that in making some compensation to the widow of General Blair for the inestimable services her husband rendered his Government they will prove ours is a republic not ungrateful to her heroes and patriots.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that in compensation for money and time expended by General Blair in enlisting men and organizing troops for United States armies, his widow, Apolline A. Blair, receive the sum of $5,000; and that said bill (No. 2984) be amended by striking out all after the fifth line in said bill, and by adding in place thereof, after the fifth line, the following words:

"The sum of $5,000, in compensation for money and time expended by General Francis P. Blair, in enlisting men and organizing troops for the United States armies, and that hereafter said Apolline A. Blair receive, in lieu of other pensions, the sum of $50 per month."

And your committee recommend that the bill so amended do pass.

Mr. BROADHEAD. The point of controversy in this bill seems to be that portion of it which provides that the sum of $5,000 shall be awarded to the widow of General Francis P. Blair, jr., in compensation for money and time expended in enlisting men and organizing troops for the United States Army. I shall direct what I have to say to that portion of the bill.

Shortly after the death of General Francis P. Blair, jr., there appeared in one of the newspapers of Saint Louis the following notice:

Letters of administration were granted to James L. Blair on the estate of Francis P. Blair, jr., deceased, valued at $500.

He was 54 years of age at the time of his death. The prime of his life, the vigor of his manhood, the maturity of his intellect, the energies of his great nature were spent in the cause of his country, and worn out prematurely by the arduous physical and mental strain upon his constitution which such service imposed upon him, he died, worth $500.

He left a widow and eight children—five sons and three daughters. What did they inherit? Not money, nor estates. True, there is an inheritance of honor and renown which belongs to them and which they would not if they could barter for gold; but of that which ministers to the physical wants of men he left comparatively nothing.

His widow now asks for the passage of this bill, and I ask your attention to the consideration of its merits.

General Blair died poor because he devoted his means and his services to his country. This perhaps I know as well as any living man. The passage of this bill would afford but a small recompense for the services rendered and the money expended by him. I think I may be permitted to say that no one knows better than I do the nature and value of those services in the early history of the rebellion.

What I shall say will be the mere recital of events which belong to history, and then I shall leave to the judgment of this House the question as to whether the nation shall pay to the widow of this distinguished man a portion, a small portion, of the debt which was due to him.

On the 30th of April, 1861, the Adjutant-General of the Army issued the following order, which was approved by President Lincoln, by Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, and indorsed by Winfield Scott, then General of the Army of the United States:

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 30, 1861.

SIR: The President of the United States directs that you enroll in the military service of the United States the loyal citizens of Saint Louis and vicinity, not exceeding, with those heretofore enlisted, 10,000 in number, for the purpose of maintaining the authority of the United States and for the protection of the peaceable inhabitants of Missouri, and you will, if deemed necessary for that purpose by yourself and by Messrs. O. D. Filley, John Harn, James O. Broadhead, Samuel T. Glover, J. Nitzig, and Francis P. Blair, jr., proclaim martial law in the city of Saint Louis.

The additional force hereby authorized shall be discharged in part or in whole, if enlisted, as soon as it appears to you and the gentlemen above named that there is no danger of an attempt on the part of the enemies of the Government to take military possession of the city of Saint Louis or put the city in control of a combination against the Government of the United States, and while such additional force remains in the service the same shall be governed by the rules and articles of war and such special regulations as you may prescribe. It shall, like the force heretofore directed to be enrolled, be under your command. The arms and other military stores in the Saint Louis arsenal not needed for the forces of the United States in Missouri must be removed to Springfield or some other safe place of deposit in the State of Illinois as speedily as practicable by the ordnance officer in charge at Saint Louis.

[Indorsements.]

It is revolutionary times, and therefore I do not object to the irregularity of this.

W. S.

Approved April 30, 1861.

A. LINCOLN.

Colonel Thomas will make this order.

SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

Capt. NATHANIEL LYON,
Commanding Department of the West.

(See volume 1, page 675, of Rebellion Record, Documentary History of the War, for a copy of this order.)

I produce this order, made by the authority of the War Department and approved by the President, for the purpose of calling attention to some of the events which preceded its issue. The citizens named in this order had been formed into what was denominated a committee of safety about the 1st of February, 1861, three months before the making of this order. All of them were appointed at a meeting of Union men held in Saint Louis about the 1st of February; for the line was already drawn in Missouri between those who favored the Union cause and those who were preparing to commit Missouri to the movement then contemplated and announced of forming a Southern confederacy. To General Blair must be accorded the credit of having originated and organized this movement. To this committee was confided the cause and interests of the Union men in Saint Louis. Blair was the heart and soul of this movement. It was known that the governor and the State authorities favored secession. The people of the State it was supposed were nearly equally divided upon the question. Subsequent events, particularly the election for members of the convention held on the 18th of February, 1861, shows that a majority was in favor of the Union, but the State authorities were in the hands of the secessionists. The Union men of Saint Louis, under the direction of the committee of safety, proceeded to organize, arm, and drill in anticipation of the impending conflict. They labored with energy and fidelity in the fulfillment of their mission, and between that time and the 21st of April, 1861, four regiments of volunteers were raised and organized by the election of officers, and were ready to be mustered into the service; but they had no arms. On the 17th of April, 1861, the answer of Governor Jackson, of Missouri, to the call made on the States for troops was made public. He refused to furnish troops. I read his letter in reply to a telegram from the Secretary of War:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT OF MISSOURI,
Jefferson City, April 17, 1861.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 15th instant making a call on Missouri for four regiments of men for immediate service has been received. There can be, I apprehend, no doubt but these men are intended to form a part of the present army to make war upon the people of the seceded States. Your requisition, in my judgment, is illegal, unconstitutional, and revolutionary, in its objects inhuman and diabolical, and can not be complied with. Not one man will the State of Missouri furnish to carry on such an unholy crusade.

C. F. JACKSON, Governor of Missouri.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

That day Blair, assuming to act for the Union men of Missouri, as he had a right to do, telegraphed to the Secretary of War offering to furnish four regiments of volunteers for active duty, and asking that an officer be appointed to muster them into the service. On that day Blair received a telegraphic dispatch from the Secretary of War accepting the four regiments which he had a few days before tendered to the Government in a dispatch to the Secretary of War. On the same day Lieutenant Schofield received orders from Washington to muster volunteers into the service. But there was no authority to arm them, as will be seen by a letter of that date written by Captain Lyon, then in command of the arsenal at Saint Louis, as follows:

SAINT LOUIS ARSENAL, April 21, 1861.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Schofield has no authority to arm and equip these men, if he enrolls them, nor any instructions given about the location and disposal of them, and without the sanction of General Harney to this matter we are liable to serious difficulty, as the General may, on hearing what is transpiring, order my arrest, even while trying to arm the men, for violating his orders about issuing arms; and as he has the rank and authority, he may direct the volunteer force away or to disperse. We do not seem to be starting out right with the instructions Mr. Schofield now has. Lieutenants Saxton and Schofield will explain more fully what I have not time to write.

Yours, truly,

N. LYON.

To F. P. BLAIR, Jr.

General Harney was in command of the department; he had received no such order, and therefore did not feel authorized to act in the premises. Captain Lyon, however, at the urgent request of Blair, determined to receive them into the arsenal and arm them that night, which he did, saying in his reply to Blair's letter:

This of course is with the understanding that Lieutenant Schofield will at once accept them and be prepared to arm and equip them. I suppose he has this authority, though, if not, I must see them armed at any rate.

I may mention here, as a part of the history of those times, that a distinguished Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, then acting as the war governor of Pennsylvania, now a member of this House, was telegraphed to by General Blair to aid in inducing the Secretary of War to receive these four regiments and order them to be armed and mustered into the service. That dispatch reads as follows:

SAINT LOUIS, April 21, 1861.

Governor A. G. CURTIN,
Harrisburg, Pa.:

An officer of the Army here has received an order to muster in Missouri regiments. General Harney refuses to let them remain in the arsenal grounds or permit them to be armed. I wish this fact to be communicated to the Secretary of War by special messenger; instructions sent immediately to Harney to receive the troops in the arsenal and arm them. Our friends distrust Harney very much. He should be superseded immediately by putting another commander in this district. The object of the secessionists is to seize the arsenal here, with its 75,000 stand of arms, and he refuses the means of defending it. We have plenty of men, but no arms.

FRANK P. BLAIR, JR.

The four regiments were received and mustered into the service, and between that time and the 11th of May five more regiments were mustered in. Of the regiments mustered in on the 21st of April the First Regiment of Missouri Volunteers was commanded by Col. F. P. Blair, jr. It consummated a wish and a determination which I myself often heard him express, that he would raise the first regiment of volunteers for the war in defense of the Union which should be raised west of the Mississippi River, and this had been done without the aid of the Government or of the hostile State authorities. The secessionists were organizing and arming under the authority of the governor, and Blair had the wisdom to foresee that unless the Union men made preparations to counteract this movement without the assistance of the General Government, which was not able then to afford them assistance, the State of Missouri would be taken out of the Union, and the large supply of arms and ammunition then in the Saint Louis arsenal would be taken possession of. Captain Lyon had only between three and four hundred troops at the arsenal, collected from the military posts on the frontier, and embracing a company of raw recruits, and the Government was unable to re-enforce him. He was not assigned to the command of that post until the 19th of March, 1861. In season and out of season during the period I have referred to, by day and by night, Blair devoted all his time and energies to the organization of volunteer companies and taking such other steps as were thought necessary to secure Missouri to the Union cause. He was in intimate relations with the administration at Washington, his brother being then a member of the Cabinet, and he made frequent visits to the Capitol with the view of advising with the President as to what steps were necessary to be taken.

As early as January 24, General Scott received information to the effect that a plot was laid for the seizure of the United States arsenal at Saint Louis, where there were at least 40,000 stand of arms. Major Bell was then in command of the fort. He was removed and ordered to the eastern department; he declined obeying the order and tendered his resignation, which was accepted, and Major Hayner assumed the command. On the 11th of March, 1861, Blair wrote to Cameron, Secretary of War, asking that Lyon be put in command over Hayner (see page 656 of Rebellion Record), and on the 19th of March, as above stated, Major Hayner received orders (No. 74) assigning the command of the troops and defenses of the arsenal to Captain Lyon.

On the 16th of April, General Harney, who was in command of the department, wrote to the Adjutant-General of the Army that the Saint Louis arsenal was threatened. I mention these matters for the purpose of showing the perilous condition of affairs at Saint Louis and the importance of the work then being done by General Blair. On the 17th of April the letter of Governor Jackson, of Missouri, refusing to furnish troops under the call of President Lincoln, was written, and on the same day Blair telegraphed to the Secretary of War offering to furnish four regiments for active duty and asking for an officer to muster them into the service. Most of what was done in Saint Louis by the Union men had to be done secretly, for the police force and the State authorities were against them, and we all know something of the bitter feeling existing at that time, especially in the border States, between the two parties. Of the first company that was raised Blair became captain. It was armed by private subscription, and Blair, to my knowledge, paid a part of the money to purchase the muskets and ammunition. This was on the 14th of February, 1861.

Afterward when Colonel Blair was organizing the First Regiment of Missouri Volunteers—one of the regiments which was mustered into the service at the arsenal on the 21st of April, 1861—he was unable to get uniforms for them from the Government. He could not get them on the credit of the Government vouchers which he offered to give, and he was obliged to buy them finally from the late Robert Campbell, of Saint Louis, who required Colonel Blair's individual note, which he afterward paid, and for which he was never reimbursed. What the amount of this note was I am unable to state, but it was certainly more than the amount asked to be paid to his widow in the bill now before the House. To show the estimation in which his services were held at the time I quote from an influential journal of the date of June 26, 1861, just after his departure for Washington to take his seat at the called session of Congress which was to assemble on the 4th of July, 1861:

With the expansive vigor of a superior intellect he has developed new powers in every crisis, and risen equal to the demands of every emergency. To-day he fills a higher place in the popular estimation than he has ever filled. He has left Missouri with a greater reputation, a more extended influence, and larger capabilities for good than she has yet enjoyed. It is but just to Colonel Blair to record that on his return to this city in April last (this was after a short absence at Washington) his talents were subjected to most severe and trying experiment. The grand object before him at that time was to arrest the State of Missouri, then trembling on the verge of revolution, and bind her fast to the Union. The means by which this great and patriotic end was to be accomplished were of the most difficult and delicate nature. They consisted in the organizing and arming in this city of a military force sufficient to protect its loyal inhabitants against armed bands of secessionists. Already organized and officered and drilled, * * * the difficulty of organizing such a military force as Blair desired was threefold. There was difficulty in overcoming the fears of the rank and file of the Union men, who knew their motions were watched by a sharp and hostile police. There was danger that the first small body of Union men who might initiate the work would be set upon and cut to pieces by the "minute-men," who were garrisoned and fortified within the city.

But another and most imposing difficulty to be overcome lay in the hesitation and timidity of many men of influence among the Union men themselves. It was dangerous, said they, to organize; it was rash to arm; it would excite secessionists, provoke attack, draw down upon us the city police, and lead to bloodshed. But all these difficulties were surmounted; it was in the genius of Colonel Blair to overcome them all. He moved right on. His quiet, steady, and unpretending courage inspirited the faltering Union men. His discretion and celerity of action overreached both the police and the minute-men. The organization was perfected with so much secrecy and dispatch that an army seemed to have been created in an hour. * * * The victories afterward won were achieved in the winter and spring, when Frank Blair and the friends who followed after him, in their self-denying work of patriotism, threaded the streets and alleys of Saint Louis by night, and met with secrecy in halls and garrets, and collected and officered and drilled and formed and molded into shape by slow degrees the Union army of Saint Louis, 6,000 strong, soon after to be swelled by contributions from the country to nearly thrice that number.

It was said at the time by some good Union men that his action was premature, and that he precipitated events which otherwise would not have occurred. The subsequent publication of a letter from Claiborne F. Jackson, governor of Missouri, of the date of April 28, 1861, proves that he was not mistaken. That letter, the original of which I have, proves that he was correct in his judgment. The letter is as follows:

JEFFERSON CITY, April 28, 1861.

MY DEAR SIR: I write this note in confidence and under a state of mind very peculiar. I know not when I have been so deeply mortified as on yesterday when I read the leading editorial of the Republican. Governor Price called on me a few days since when passing on his way to Saint Louis. We had an interview of ten minutes, not more. It was strictly private and confidential. Neither was at liberty to repeat what the other said, much less was either licensed to misstate and misrepresent the position of the other. Governor Price asked me what I thought as to the time of calling the convention. I told him not to be in a hurry, but to wait till the Legislature met, and to be here at that time, so that we could consult with the members from all parts of the State and fix upon a proper time; that, in my judgment, we should not go out of the Union until the Legislature had time to arm the State to some extent and place it in a proper position of defense. This was, in substance, the sum total of all I said to him. Governor Price said many things to me in that short interview which I am not at liberty to repeat, and which I could not do without doing violence to my sense of honor, violating every rule of propriety which governs the intercourse of gentlemen, and forfeiting all claims to the position of an honorable member of community.

If it be the purpose of Paschall and Price to make me indorse the position of the Republican, and the miserable, base, and cowardly conduct of Governor Price's submission convention, then they are wofully mistaken. Lashed and driven as they have been by an indignant and outraged constituency from their position of "unconditional Union," they are now seeking shelter under the miserable absurdity of "armed neutrality." About the only truth in Paschall's article is that in which he states my policy to be a "peace policy." This is true. I am for peace, and so is everybody, except Lincoln and Frank Blair. You will do me an especial favor to inform Mr. Paschall that when Governor Jackson wishes his position upon matters of public interest properly stated and set out before the people he will take some direct manner of doing it, and not rely upon the colored and garbled statements of a set of men who, under the garb of friendship, seek to obtain his confidence only to betray him, and play the part of pimps and spies.

I do not think Missouri should secede to-day or to-morrow, but I do not think it good policy that I should publicly so declare. I want a little time to arm the State, and I am assuming every responsibility to do it with all possible dispatch. Missouri should act in concert with Tennessee and Kentucky. They are all bound to go out, and should go together if possible. My judgment is that North Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas will be out in a few days, and when they go Missouri and Kentucky must follow. Let us then prepare to make our exit. We should keep our own counsels. Every man in the State is in favor of arming the State. Then let it be done. All are opposed to furnishing Mr. Lincoln with soldiers. Time will settle the balance. Nothing should be said about the time or the manner in which Missouri should go out. That she ought to go, and will go at the proper time, I have no doubt.

She ought to have gone out last winter when she could have seized the public arms and public property and defended herself. This she has failed to do and must now wait a little while. Paschall is a base submissionist, and desires to remain with the North if every other slave State should go out. This he proved in indorsing all those who voted against Bast's amendment. The people of Missouri must, I think, understand my position. Paschall knows the people are twenty to one against him, and hence he seeks to drag me into his aid and support. You should denounce his course and expose his baseness. To frighten our people into the most slavish position he parades before them from day to day our defenseless attitude, and meanly makes it out a thousand times worse than it really is. Missouri can put into the field to-day 20,000 men better armed than our fathers were who won our independence. If you can I should be very glad to see you here on Tuesday evening. I hope you will fully comprehend my whole policy, and without undertaking to shadow it forth specifically or in detail, I only ask that you will defend me from the false position in which Paschall and Price seem disposed to place me. Call on every country paper to defend me, and assure them I am fighting under the true flag. Who does not know that every sympathy of my heart is with the South? The Legislature, in my view, should sit in secret and touch nothing but measures of defense. Let the measures of Mr. Sturgeon, Mr. Paschall, Mr. Taylor & Co., in regard to their railroads all go by the board. I have not the patience or time to talk of such matters now. Let us first preserve our liberties and attend to business matters afterward. Let all our energies and all our means be applied to our defense and safety.

Yours, truly,

C. F. JACKSON.

MISSOURI HISTORICAL SOCIETY,
Saint Louis, April 29, 1884.

I certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original letter of C. F. Jackson to J. W. Tucker, on file in the archives of this society.

[SEAL.] OSCAR W. COLLET, Keeper of Archives.

I shall not comment upon this letter except to say that General Blair as a Union man was right in taking and making those early and active preparations which did more than all else to secure Missouri to the cause of the Union. Missouri and Kentucky did, in the language of Governor Jackson, act in concert; but it was not in the cause which he championed. Had it been otherwise than it was, and those two great States had acted in concert at that early period of the rebellion, and the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers become the lines of separation, results might have been different.

What transpired afterward does not properly belong to this discussion. During the four years of the terrible struggle that followed these events the gallant deeds performed by the heroic commander of the Seventeenth Army Corps belong to history and are chronicled in the archives of the Republic. Devoted to the cause of the Union, which in his inmost soul he believed was necessary to establish justice, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty, he periled all for its maintenance, inspired not by prejudice or passion or sectional animosity, but by a lofty sense of duty; and when the conflict was over and the last armed foe to the authority of the Federal Government had surrendered, he returned to his adopted State of Missouri to find a large number of Missourians disfranchised by unconstitutional acts of oppression and the conditions of surrender ruthlessly and shamefully broken by those whom the fortunes of war had placed in control of political affairs in the State. He at once made himself the champion of his oppressed fellow-citizens and their defender against the outrages practiced against them in the name of loyalty. He became the defender of those who had so lately been his enemies—the defender I should rather say of plighted faith, of law, and of justice, and of honor—for proud as he justly was of his own great achievements in the cause to which he had devoted the best years of his life, he would not then, nor would he ever in the subsequent years of his life, lend his name or his fame or his influence to the cause of injustice, or suffer it to be used for the purpose of keeping alive the prejudices and passions engendered by the struggle through which the country had passed. He had met a gallant foe in open combat; that foe had surrendered, and thenceforward he was his fellow-citizen and his equal, and a wrong done to him was a wrong done to the cause of justice.

History furnishes but few examples of such lofty natures, but his was one of the—

> Great souls who would have died for truth and left their fame
> To be the watchword of another age.

For I know and Missouri knows that he did in the tumultuous scenes which followed the war in that distracted State often peril his life in defense of those who were disfranchised by test-oaths and unconstitutional legislation, and the records of the highest court in this Government show that he offered himself as a sacrifice to test the validity of such acts in times of peace.

But this is no time to pronounce such a eulogy upon his character as it justly merits. The proposition before you is a business proposition. This Government owes a debt for money expended and services performed which was not paid to him and is justly due to those he has left behind him, and which ought to be recognized by all who are now participating in its benefits and have to do with the management of its affairs.

Now, to show the esteem in which his memory is held by his fellow-citizens of Missouri, I ask leave to have read an extract from an article in a paper edited by a man who served through the war in behalf of the confederate cause, and who was perhaps one of the most ultra men engaged in that conflict. He was with General Shelby during the whole of his career in the West; at the time he was commander of a brigade:

There is a bill before Congress to pension the widow of General Frank P. Blair, and grant to her certain arrearages of pension which are justly due. A more righteous measure was never proposed. Mrs. Blair is poor, very poor. Her husband gave thousands upon thousands of dollars out of his own pocket to arm and equip Federal soldiers, not one dollar of which was ever paid back to him. Preceding General Lyon's occupation of Jefferson City, the skirmish at Boonville, and the desperate fight at Wilson's Creek, General Blair, using what money he had at his command and pressing his credit to get more, made five full regiments ready for battle and hurried them to the front at a time when everything depended upon speed, discipline, and organization.

In a pecuniary sense, General Blair never took a moment's heed to-day of what to-morrow would bring forth. He might have made millions, but his high sense of honor and his scrupulous integrity forbade him to speculate upon the needs and distresses of his country, and he died penniless. He was more than a soldier, because he was also a chief, a leader, a free-soil apostle, and a prophet among his people. He saved Missouri to the Union, and in doing so he did what no other man in the whole Commonwealth could have done. It is but simple truth to declare that if Frank Blair had espoused the cause of the South and thrown into it the same skill, energy, impetuosity, and audacity which characterized every act of those first stormy and momentous days in Missouri, the confederacy to-day might have been an accomplished fact. He would have seized the Saint Louis arsenal. He could have carried with him 100,000 volunteers, and 100,000 such soldiers as those Missouri did produce would have whipped the fight.

We speak of these things simply to prove the extent of the obligations this Government is under to General Blair, and to show how just and how righteous is his widow's demand for a pension.

What has occurred since the events to which I have alluded of course has no place in this discussion, but it is proper that I should speak of the character of this man and of his exploits. The question before us is whether, after the money and means which General Blair furnished for the purpose of raising troops to sustain the cause of the Union, and for which he asked no recompense from his Government, we are now willing to grant what this bill proposes for his impoverished widow.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to present any additional reasons to those already submitted to the committee why the pending bill should be favorably reported, but a sense of its justness and a knowledge of the interest felt by the people of Missouri in anything affecting the family of General Blair forbid that I should remain silent.

Of all the great men who have reflected honor upon the State of Missouri no one was held by her people in more affectionate regard than their model statesman and dauntless soldier, Francis P. Blair, jr. His record of self-abnegation and uncalculating devotion to the cause of his country from the beginning to the close of the war has been presented by my distinguished colleague, Mr. BROADHEAD, his life-long friend and admirer, and although, Mr. Chairman, when the war came on the sons of Missouri in about equal numbers rushed to the Army of the Union and to the army of the South, and shared the reverses and fortunes of war until it ended, there is no fair-minded citizen of that great State, be he an ex-Federal or ex-confederate soldier, be he Republican or Democrat, who would not echo all my friend has said.

All the people of Missouri are proud, and they feel that they have a right to be proud, that Frank Blair cast his home in their midst; the men who loved the Union, because of the invaluable service rendered their cause and his unselfish sacrifices made in its behalf; the men who loved the South, because when their flag went down in eternal night and they returned to their homes they found in him a man who said by his conduct: "In the ashes of all bitter remembrances let the animosities engendered by the war be eternally buried, and let us all indulge the fond hope that this grand country of ours is but in the springtide of its glorious career."

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the people of Missouri loved General Blair while living, and they cherish and revere his memory now that he is dead. Always active in politics except when in the Army, bold, fearless, and aggressive, strange to say he made few, perhaps no enemies; and the beautiful tribute paid to Sheridan by Moore could most justly be applied to him—

> Whose fancy, as bright as the fire-fly's light,
> Played round every object, and shone as it played;
> Whose wit in the contest, as gentle as bright,
> Ne'er carried a heart-stain away on its blade.

Always engaged in politics, as I have said, serving in the Legislature of Missouri or in this Hall or the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, unlike some who have engaged in similar service, Frank Blair lived, Frank Blair died a poor man. He was in the public service a few years ago when the waves of temptation rolled over the land, and many strong men fell before them, but against Frank Blair they dashed into spray as the waves of the sea upon the rock-bound coast.

The bill before us as introduced by my colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] provided for the payment of arrears of pension to the widow of General Blair; in that form, in my opinion, it ought to have been reported by the committee; in that form it ought to have been enacted into law.

If Frank Blair had been granted a pension or had even made application for one, his widow, without any special legislation on the part of Congress, would have been entitled to pension under the law of 1879. That is a strange, strained construction of that law that precludes the widows of soldiers from the benefits of the provisions of the act in relation to arrearage, but it is the one placed upon it by the Commissioner of Pensions. Perhaps no such law should have been enacted. About this there may be opposite opinions; but all must agree that the wife of a deceased soldier should not be refused a pension because her husband preferred to support himself and his family rather than invoke the aid of his Government. General Blair's unselfish character is illustrated by his refusal to ask the bounty of his Government which he had served so honorably and with such distinction. But the bill as amended asks simply the payment to his widow of a small part of the money he freely paid out in organizing and equipping troops for the service of the Government. There ought to be no objection to its passage. I trust it may, but I am sure it can not afford the committee as much pleasure to do this simple act of justice to Mrs. Blair as it will the people of Missouri to have it done. [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CLARDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEELE. The law itself providing for arrears also establishes a limitation, that all applications filed after the 1st of July, 1880, should be debarred from the privileges of arrears.

Mr. CLARDY. I understand that.

Mr. STEELE. That is the construction of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. CLARDY. But Mrs. Blair is not denied a pension at the Pension Department on that ground, but on the same ground on which many another widow is denied a pension, because her husband did not apply for and obtain a pension in his lifetime.

A MEMBER. That can not be.

Mr. CLARDY. Yes, sir; that is true. There is now pending in this House a bill which undertakes to bring about an equality between the widows who are drawing pensions from the Government. A similar bill, as the present occupant of the chair [Mr. HATCH, of Missouri] will well remember, was reported in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry my distinguished friends on the other side have occupied so much time in advocacy of this bill, because the country is familiar with the distinguished services of General Blair, and no one gainsays that he contributed a great deal to the cause of the Union. But what I object to is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, while guarding so strenuously the Treasury that they will not in any case, however meritorious, grant arrears of pensions, have notwithstanding, in order to gratify my friends on the other side of the House, undertaken to cover up what is in fact such an allowance by bringing in a bill for supposed claims.

For my part I think that every man and every widow who has applied for a pension since July 1, 1880, if able to connect the disease or disability of the soldier with the service, is just as much entitled to a pension from the date that the disease or disability originated as though application had been made before that time. The history of the Pension Department shows that of the applications for arrears made within the first year after the limitation of time had expired 55 per cent. were from widows who had doubtless been prevented by ignorance of the law from applying in time and obtaining their arrears.

This case is one that would not pass the Pension Department for any amount, because it can not be proved that the disability was contracted in the line of duty.

Mr. CLARDY. I want to inform my friend that Mrs. Blair already draws a pension of $30 a month.

Mr. STEELE. Then I have been misinformed. That being the case, this is a proposition to increase her pension. I am heartily in favor of it, and I am in favor of giving her a pension from the time her husband contracted the disability; but I am not in favor of saying that we will in this case give $5,000 in a lump sum to this widow and that this is not to be considered arrears of pension.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is the gentleman in favor of granting a pension to the widow from the time that the husband contracted the disability, or from the time of the death of the husband?

Mr. STEELE. In the case of the widow from the time of the husband's death, and in the case of the soldier from the time the disability was contracted.

Now I want to call the attention of my Democratic friends who are here to the fact that in all cases of applications for pensions, in all cases where it is proposed to grant to soldiers that which justly and equitably belongs to them, they have the help of this side of the House. I want you to go on record in this matter and say that you are in favor of this being a precedent. We hear a great deal of talk in this House about precedents. I do not care for precedents myself. Whenever we have a meritorious case presented here I am in favor of passing it, precedent or no precedent.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman what politics there is in this case. He talks about "this side of the House" and about "Democrats." How does he get politics into this case?

Mr. STEELE. In this way: whenever on this side of the House we undertake to pass a bill, there is as a rule objection on the other side. But there is never, as a rule, objection to bills of this class on this side.

Mr. BLAND. That is a mere statement of the gentleman which has no reference to this case, and no support in fact.

Mr. STEELE. I should like very much, indeed, if I could——

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Has the gentleman ever voted on a special bill that granted arrears of pension?

Mr. STEELE. I have in committee, and I will here in the House whenever such a bill may come up.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Upon a special bill?

Mr. STEELE. Special or general. I have a general bill which has been reported from the Committee on Pensions, and which I hope will pass this House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That is all news to me.

Mr. STEELE. I can give you a great deal of news if you will come around and see me. [Laughter.]

I am very glad to see so many of my Democratic friends here to-night. I hope they will come every night. I hope they will vote in favor of bills of this class, and not undertake to cover up a matter like this and say that it is not arrears of pension. It is arrears of pension, if it is anything.

There is no itemized statement of account. As a matter of claim it should have gone to the Committee on Claims. I am not going to object, but I do ask gentlemen having it in charge to let it go into the House so we may have a quorum and a yea-and-nay vote on this question. I tell you I will vote for it when it goes into the House.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, I had supposed the Congress of the United States was intended to correct the rigid rules of fixed law, and to do justice and to do right where the law failed either to do justice or right.

I was in a position to watch with great anxiety that terrible and calamitous war. I believed then, as I believe now, that if Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland had gone out of the Union the war might have resulted differently. I believed then, as I do now, that if Virginia had remained in the Union we might have been saved the calamities of that war.

I do not know of any gentleman, of the living or the dead, who rendered more useful and essential service in keeping the great State of Missouri faithful to the Government than Mr. Blair, whose widow is to be the beneficiary of this legislation.

That letter or telegram revived in my memory a part of the history of the war. When that telegram reached me Washington was shut up and I could not communicate with the authorities in answer to a dispatch of such momentous importance, when it seemed to be necessary for positive action to keep a great State in the Union, and it was not until about a year ago that General Schofield learned from me how they got the order to organize troops and seize arms. I was the man, Mr. Chairman, who gave the order. [Applause.] I took it for granted the authorities here would approve of it when communications were established between Harrisburg and Washington. That man received orders in Missouri to organize troops and seize arms necessary to defend the loyal citizens of that State, and he answered with promptness worthy of his manhood. [Applause.]
